THE MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA

D

Dachau, a district of Upper Bavaria northwest of Munich, where Mennonites settled in considerable numbers from 1818 to the middle of the 19th century. Most of the families came from the Palatinate, and settled chiefly in the northwestern part of the Dachau district, founding the Eichstock (q.v.) congregation. Emigration to America and to other places decreased the size of the congregation, so that there are at present (1953) only a few families remaining. (ML I, 384.) E.M.

Dachselhofer, a distinguished family of Bern, Switzerland, who joined the Anabaptists. Some of the family emigrated to Moravia, and their capital, amounting to 9,000 pounds, was confiscated. (Müller, Berner Täufer, 98; ML I, 384.)

Dachser, Jakob (1486-1567), elder of the Augsburg Anabaptists in 1527. Though his work covered only a brief period, yet under his and Siegmund Salminger's (q.v.) leadership the congregation grew rapidly, reaching in a short time 1,100 members and including a large part of the population of the city.

He was born in Ingolstadt (chronicle of Clemens Jäger), served as a Catholic priest in Vienna, was compelled to flee because he had defended Luther's writings, whereupon he returned to Ingolstadt and in 1523 acquired his Master's degree there. He was arraigned before the court of the Duke of Bavaria for improper disputing and defending Lutheran ideas, and was cross-examined by several professors. The cross-examination revealed that he shared Luther's views on the Mass and fasting. On the duke's orders he was taken in chains to the bishop of Eichstätt, and after a period of imprisonment was expelled from the diocese. In 1526 he found refuge in Augsburg, earning his living by teaching. He was baptized here by Hans Hut (q.v.) in February 1527, and was appointed assistant head of the Augsburg Anabaptist congregation, and served with true devotion and increasing success. He baptized the preacher Hans Leopold (q.v.), who was martyred at Augsburg on April 25, 1528. The rapid growth of the congregation aroused the malice of the Lutheran clergy, who persuaded the council to suppress the Anabaptists. In the fall of 1527 numerous individual arrests were made, religious meetings forcibly broken up and the participants arrested. Dachser escaped capture, but not wishing to desert his congregation he presented himself to the mayor; he was so thoroughly convinced of the legality of his teachings and acts that he did not consider the possibility of danger in a Protestant city after an explanation of his position to the council. But on Aug. 25, 1527, five days after the Martyrs' Synod (q.v.), in which he had participated (Keller, Staupitz, 325), he was arrested. The Lutheran preachers Rhegius, Frosch, Agricola, and Keller disputed long with Dachser and his fellow prisoners Hut, Gross, and Salminger, but were unable to make them forsake their convictions. To make them more amenable they were put into the dungeon. Voices were heard in the council recommending capital punishment. It was finally decided to leave them in prison until they recanted out of sheer physical exhaustion.

Dachser's wife Ottilie, who entered the service of Margrave George of Brandenburg soon after his arrest, interceded for his release. The margrave sponsored her petition before the council, but always received the reply that there was no possibility of release for Dachser unless he recanted. Ulrich Heckel, who later became a master of the weavers' guild, also presented petitions to the council, stating that before his arrest Dachser had served faithfully as a teacher in Augsburg, "whose equal will not soon be found; of this I have many honest witnesses at Augsburg among the rich and the poor." When "some of the Anabaptists asserted themselves, prophesied and held peculiar opinions he counseled against it; thus he acquired such disfavor among them that they wished to excommunicate him."

The council was relentless. Finally after confinement of more than three years Dachser yielded to the incessant entreaty of his wife and the persuasion of the clergymen Wolfgang Musculus and Bonifacius Wolfhart, who had been called from Strasbourg, and on May 16, 1531, five weeks after Salminger's recantation, he recanted. It was done in Latin on a weekday, at a time when few persons were present. Because of his "physical exhaustion and the need to earn a living" he requested permission to remain in the city. He would "seek his bread by industrious and faithful instruction of the children of the city in Christian discipline and doctrine as he had done before," and co-operate in the conversion of the Anabaptists. The council consented and appointed him as an assistant at St. Ulrich's Church.

Doubts on the part of the clergy concerning his dogmatic position prevented Dachser from obtaining a regular preaching appointment, though there was no cause for distrust. Dachser avoided the questions for which he had suffered so long, and occupied himself in a field that had thus far received little attention in the Protestant churches, namely, in verse for church singing. In this field he deserves more recognition than he has thus far been given. Even before his imprisonment he had as an Anabaptist preacher composed hymns and must therefore be considered one of the first evangelical poets and hymn writers.

His poems were very early circulated far beyond Anabaptist circles. While he was languishing in the dungeon, some of his songs were published in 1529 in the Augsburg hymnal, Form und ordnung Gaystlicher Gesang und Psalmen, and are among the best in the collection. The second edition, published in 1532, after his release, was the product of at least his co-operation, if not of his sole editorship. The foreword states that Dachser versified several psalms of David (Ps. 54, 103, 116, 138, 142, 143, published in Wackernagel). In the hymnal published in 1537 by Sigmund Salminger (Der gantz Psalter, das ist alle Psalmen Davids, an der zal 150, . . .), there are 42 psalms translated by Dachser into German for church singing; in addition there are several of his songs which had been published in the earlier collection.

In the following year at the request of many friends Dachser published the psalms with notes, titled Der gantz psalter Davids nach ordnung und anzahl aller Psalmen. Several psalms, he remarks in the foreword, which had been previously rewritten, including two by Martin Luther, he left unchanged except to correct them. The greatest significance of Dachser's hymnal lies in the fact that an appendix contains songs written by him for church holidays and ceremonies, making it the first practical Protestant hymnal. When the Augsburg clergy in 1555 published a Gsangbüchlin (new enlarged edition in 1557), not only all the psalms, but also the appendix of Dachser's book were included.

At this time Dachser was no longer in Augsburg. In August 1552 he and two other preachers (Johann Flinner and Johann Traber) were ordered by Charles V to leave the city, "because they spoke, acted, and practiced all sorts of things that might lead to sedition, revolt, and all mischief"; the fact that one of these preachers "had been an Anabaptist," would be sufficient reason for distrust (Briefe und Akten zur Geschichte des 16. Jahrhunderts III, 316). Dachser's wife was permitted to remain in Augsburg because of age and ill health; but the Bishop of Arras made the stipulation "that she practice nothing at all with anybody, and hold no meetings in her house." Dachser betook himself to Pfalz-Neuburg; he died in 1567 at the age of nearly 81. His name is in the Index of Venice (Reusch, Der Index, 231). According to Schottenloher, Dachser is the author of the anonymous publication, Eine göttliche und gründliche Offenbarung von den wahrhaftigen Wiedertäufern, mit göttlicher Wahrheit anzeigt (1527). This booklet was for a long time ascribed to Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.). It was printed by the clandestine Augsburg printer (Winkeldrucker) Philipp Ulhart, and was refuted by Urban Rhegius (q.v.) in Notwendige Warnung wider den neuen Tauforden . . . (1527). Dachser also published in Augsburg in 1526 a medieval mystical writing, Aus was Grund die Lieb entspringt, to which he wrote the preface. Copies of this booklet as well as Rhegius' Notwendige Warnung are in the Goshen College Library.

Daele, van (van Daelle, van Dale, van Dalen), a family name rather common among the Flemish-Dutch Anabaptists and Mennonites. Four martyrs bearing this name were executed in Belgium: Lijntgen (Linken) van Dale (q.v.) and Heynderick van Dale (q.v.), both executed at Antwerp in 1562, and Guillaume van Dale (q.v.) and Maurissus van Dale (q.v.), both executed at Gent, in 1562 and 1573 respectively. In the early 17th century members of the van Daele family were numerous in Aardenburg and Cadzand in the Dutch province of Zeeland. They were engaged in farming, and some of them were deacons of the church. Bartholomeus van Daele (van Dale), a farmer, moved from Etichine near Oudenaerden in Flanders, Belgium, to Cadzand, where he became a preacher about 1629. This family name was also found in Rotterdam and Haarlem, Holland. In Haarlem some of the van Dale (van Dalen) family were deacons, while Anton van Dale (q.v., 1638-1708) was a preacher there, as also was Mathys van Dalen (d. 1707), for whom his colleague D. Voorhelm held a funeral sermon, Lyck-Reden (Haarlem, 1707). Jacob Cornelisz van Dalen (q.v., 1608-64) was a preacher in Amsterdam. It could not be determined whether the bearers of this name were related or not. vdZ.

Dahlem, Valentin, one of the leading South German Mennonite preachers in the early 19th century, b. Dec. 26, 1754, at Erbesbüdesheim near Alzey. Before he was six years of age he lost his father. Under his stepfather Heinrich Borkholder, who settled in the principality of Nassau-Weilburg with other Mennonite families and in 1773 took over the court estate near Mosbach, he acquired an excellent agricultural education. He was an outstanding farm manager, and was one of the first to introduce scientific use of the soil in the Nassau region. After his marriage with Barbara Hüthwohl of Harxheim he leased the Koppensteiner estate at Wiesbaden and introduced scientific farming there, setting an example for the rural population. With amazement they saw that Dahlem planted potatoes, which were still unknown and were considered poisonous by many, sowed the "rank weed" clover and thus made use of fallow ground, but still always had the best crops.

Duke William offered Dahlem the Koppensteiner estate as a gift in recognition of his contribution to agriculture, but Dahlem was too modest to accept it. His services to agricultural science were also fully honored in a report by the Nassau ministers of State to the regent in June 1808, which states, "The grand theories of other countries are not found here; but in practice there is life and activity. Especially our Anabaptists set a good example—neighbors of the Lower Palatinate—and in competition with them progress is made along every line. Cultivation of clover has been of benefit. Fallow land has been decreased, and animal husbandry is thriving."

By private study Dahlem acquired an amazing general education. He showed great proficiency in ancient languages, especially Latin and Greek; he could also use Hebrew fluently. When a Mennonite congregation was formed near Wiesbaden in 1790, Dahlem was chosen their preacher; he was well qualified for this office by his talents and his knowledge. At first the congregation met on the Borkholder farm at Mosbach, then in Steiner's Mill near Wiesbaden (today the house at 32 Walram Street) and in Massenheim. For a time Dahlem also served the church at Neuwied.

Dahlem's influence extended far beyond his own congregation. He devoted his energy to re-establishing strict discipline among the South German Mennonites; moral conditions were dubious in many places as a result of the Napoleonic war. With Peter Weber, the elder at Neuwied, he called a meeting of the leaders of the congregations on the left bank of the Rhine, which was held on June 5, 1803, at Ibersheim (q.v.) near Worms. The conference resolved no longer to tolerate sinful pleasures among the members and to stem the growing influence of fashion on dress.

The value his brethren in office placed on his capability is expressed in the resolution passed by this conference, appointing Dahlem to prepare a handbook for the use of ministers, especially beginners, in church services. Up to this time the South German churches had had no compilation of addresses and prayers for religious observances. Some preachers, of course, used a manuscript translation of the Formular of the Dutch Joannes Deknatel (q.v.), but it was not in general use. Dahlem worked out a manual which he presented at a second conference at Ibersheim on June 5, 1805. To this conference Dahlem had also invited the leaders of the churches in Baden and Württemberg. The manual was approved by all and was published two years later with the title, Allgemeines und vollständiges Formularbuch für die gottesdienstlichen Handlungen, in denen Taufgesinnten, Evangelisch Mennoniten-Gemeinden benebst Gebetern zum Gebrauch auf alle vorkommenden Fälle beim öffentlichen Gottesdienst wie auch die Formen und Gebetern unsrer Brüder am Neckar (Neuwied, 1807, 336 pp.). It was introduced in the Palatine and Hessian churches and served as a model for later manuals.

In his spare time Dahlem enjoyed writing poetry. "His verses," writes his great-grandson C. Spielmann (d. 1918) in Wiesbaden, "are simple but have good rhythmic form and thoughtful content, not to be classed with the rhymes of poetasters. He liked to write pastoral poems. It is a pity that his poetry has not been preserved. Spielmann published two of Dahlem's poems as specimens: "Vergiss mein nicht, du Gott voll Güte" and "Noch immer fand ich nicht die Ruh."

The church that he led so long split after his death, which occurred on Jan. 23, 1840. Apparently there had been neglect in ordaining young ministers. Individual members lost connections and moved away or joined other churches. Dahlem's descendants married members of the state church; their children did not adopt the Mennonite faith.

Dale, Anton van, b. Nov. 8, 1638, at Haarlem (Holland), d. Nov. 18 or 28, 1708. Up to the age of 30 he was a merchant; then he studied medicine, received his doctor's degree, and became a physician. At the same time he studied classical languages, becoming a Latin scholar of importance. As physician in the civic charity hospital in Haarlem he won high recognition for his unselfish service. He was always cheerful and jovial, and liked to tell anecdotes combating superstition. For a time he was a Mennonite preacher, but because he wove too much Greek and Latin into his sermons, they found little acclaim; he therefore resigned his office. It is not quite clear in which congregation van Dale served, but presumably it was that of the Waterlanders. An anonymous letter written to Marten Schagen (found in DB 1863) indicates that van Dale was at first a member of the Flemish congregation of den Blok, but left this congregation about 1665 to join the Waterlanders. He wrote Boere-praetje tusschen vijf Persoonen....Handelende of Galenus te recht voor een Hypocrijt is beschuldight . . . (1664); Aanmerkingen over het Tractaatje van de heer J. Verryn (Remonstrant preacher) omtrent den waterdoop (1685), Verhandeling van de Oorspronk en Duuring van de Waterdoop (1704); Historie van 't Predik-ampt en het wapenvoeren (1674 and 1704); De Oudheid van 't Alleen spreken . . . verdedigd (1670), written against the Collegiants, which P. Langedult answered with Het apostolisch oude gebruik vrij te spreken (1672); Dissertatio super Aristea de LXX Interpretibus. Additur historia Baptismorum (1705); De oraculis ethnicorum (1683), and a translation, Verhandeling van de Oude Orakelen der Heydenen (1687), in which he explains that the oracles were merely priestly deception. This work was used by the wise Fontenelle and opposed by the German Möbius. An attack by two Jesuits caused him to publish the booklet anew with the title, De Oraculis Veterum Ethnicorum (1704). In addition to these he wrote Dissertationes de Origine et Progressu Idololatriae et superstitione (1691); Dissertationibus ex antiquitatibus (1702).

Dalen, Jacob Cornelisz van, b. 1608 at Rotterdam, d. 1664, a noted Mennonite surgeon and preacher of the Waterlanders at Amsterdam, 1639-62. Operations he performed on facial abscesses are described and illustrated by C. E. He collaborated with Denys van der Schure in writing Korte verthooninge van de onware beschuldingen (1640), which was answered in the following year by Joost Hendricks. In 1652 he wrote Oorciersel en Cieraet van de Godsalige vrouwen, opposing fashion and championing very simple dress. In 1662 he wrote Spiegel der Dischgenooten Christi (repr. 1729) with an important foreword, a communion sermon which was reprinted in 1729 in G. Dallas, Ore., a town (pop. 5,000) in Polk County, in the northwestern part of the state. Mennonites have been living here for about 45 years. There are now in and around Dallas about 1,000 Mennonites, of whom about 300 live in town, and who belong to the M.B., E.M.B., and G.C.M. (Grace Mennonite Church) branches, each of which has a church in the town. Dallas also has a home for the aged, the Dallas Rest Home (capacity 26 guests), owned and operated by the M.B. Church. The leading industry of the town is a large lumber mill. W.L.P.

Dallas Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church, located in western Oregon, had a membership of 320 in 1954. The first E.M.B. settlers moved into the area in 1890, and in 1912 the first pastor was installed. The first church, built in the country in 1916, was moved to Dallas and enlarged in 1924. In 1922 the church was incorporated. In 1927 Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Bartel were ordained as missionaries to China. Ministers who have served the congregation are Solomon S. Ediger, 1912-20; H. H. Dick, 1920-27; John J. Schmidt, 1927-28; J. H. Quiring, 1928-41; D. P. Schultz, 1941-47; A. C. Wall, 1947-48; A P. Toews, 1948-52; and Arno Wiebe, 1953- . The following missionaries were ordained for the foreign fields: Mary Quiring to China in 1946, Tina Friesen to Africa in 1951, Harvey Ratzlaff to Africa in 1949, Irene Claasen to Japan in 1951, Mr. and Mrs. Hugh Gookin to Venezuela in 1952, and Anna Fast to Africa in 1952. Dallas Mennonite Brethren Church, at the corner of Washington and Hayter streets in Dallas, Polk Co., Ore., is a member of the Pacific District Conference of the M.B. Church of North America. The church, an outgrowth of the North Dallas M.B. Church, which had started in 1905, was organized under the leadership of Abraham Buhler, on Dec. 21, 1919. In 1934 the first church was replaced by the present frame structure, which was remodeled in 1949. Its parsonage at 518 Hayter St. was procured in 1944.

On Jan. 7, 1923, the North Dallas M.B. Church membership was received into the Dallas church. With population increase in the Willamette Valley, the church membership increased. Some members who lived in Salem organized the West Salem Mennonite Brethren Church in 1941. The present membership (1954) in Dallas is 346, approximately half of whom are rural people.

Ministers who have served the church are D. A. Peters, G. G. Wiens, P. H. Berg, Abr. Buhler, P. E. Penner, Frank F. Friesen, Herman D. Wiebe, F. F. Wall, N. N. Hiebert, J. J. Toews, Henry Hooge, and the present minister, W. L. Penner. Mr. and Mrs. A. F. Kroeker of this church are serving as foreign missionaries. G.H.J.

Dalmeny (Ebenezer) Mennonite Brethren Church, located approximately 20 miles northwest of Saskatoon, Sask., a member of the Canadian Conference of the M.B. Church, was organized on Feb. 28, 1902, with 15 brethren present. Abram Buhler came from Mountain Lake, Minn., to serve as the first leader. In October of the same year Jacob Lepp was chosen to the ministry and was installed as church leader in 1907; he served in this capacity until his retirement in 1941. He was replaced by Henry Baerg. George Dyck is the present pastor (1954), and the membership is 229. The first meetinghouse was built in 1902, but had to be enlarged in 1907, with the coming of more settlers. In 1945 the church was thoroughly remodeled to seat approximately 400.

The first M.B. missionaries to leave from the Canadian Conference for the M.B. foreign missions were Mr. and Mrs. Bergthold, the latter being a daughter of the Mandtlers of this congregation. Only one year later Mrs. Bergthold died in India. In February 1945 Emma Lepp, daughter of Jacob Lepp, left to serve in the same field. J.H.E.

Dalton, Ohio, is a village of nearly 1,000 located on U.S. Highway 30 in the heart of a rich farming and dairy community of Sugar Creek Twp., Wayne County. Mennonite pioneers from eastern Pennsylvania, such as the Martins, Eberlys, Horsts, and Buckwalters, settled on territory north of Dalton early in the 19th century, organizing the Martin's Church (MC). Many of their descendants still live there. The rolling territory southwest of Dalton was chosen by Swiss Mennonites who immigrated to this section as early as 1819. This prosperous Swiss community has since been known as Sonnenberg (q.v.). Within a ten-mile radius of Dalton are located nine Mennonite congregations with approximately 1,600 members and representing five different branches of the church. S.M.

Dam, the name of a Dutch Mennonite family, from the 17th century found in Giethoorn (q.v.), where many of the members were deacons and (lay) preachers of the congregations both of Giethoorn-Noord and Giethoorn-Zuid. The last preachers of this name here were the brothers Harm Wichersz Dam and Albert Wichersz Dam, both serving in Giethoorn-Zuid 1809-25. Shortly after 1800, when a number of peat-diggers moved from Giethoorn to Tjalleberd (q.v.), province of Friesland, to break up the peatmoors around this town, there were among them many Mennonites, among them Harm Roelofs Dam, who, like many of his descendants, was a pillar of the Tjalleberd congregation, founded in 1817.

There have been a number of Mennonite ministers with this family name, whose relationship, if any, with the Giethoorn Dam family could not be determined. Kornelius Jansz Dam was a preacher at Dokkum 1710-*ca.*50. Two of his sons went into the ministry, Jelle Kornelis Dam serving at St-Annakerk and Oudebildtzijl 1739-54 (?), and Jan Kornelis Dam at Bolsward about 1735-38 and Workum 1738-82. In 1742 he married Grietje Keimpes Boothamer of Workum. Their son Keimpe Jansz Dam (d. April 24, 1810), educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, served at Makkum 1771-73 and Rotterdam 1773-1810. vdZ.

Damas, an Anabaptist leader of Hoorn, Dutch province of North Holland, a weaver by trade, who was listed with Jacob van Campen (q.v.) and Cornelis wt den Briel (q.v.) as one of the most prominent Anabaptists by Reynier Brunt, attorney-general of the Court of Holland, in a letter dated March 24, 1535 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 113). Damas baptized a Thomas Thomasz at Monnikendam (Grosheide, Verhooren, 127). He must also have been active in the province of Zeeland (DB 1917, 103). According to Vos (ibid., 103-4), the man called David van Hoorn in the Confession of Obbe Philips (BRN VII, 132) was actually Damas, "David" being merely a slip of the pen. If this is the case, Damas was one of the 12 apostles sent out by Jan Matthijs (q.v.) to proclaim the imminent kingdom of God. After his activities of 1534-35 to spread the revolutionary ideas of Münsterite Anabaptism he disappeared and nothing more is known about him. (Mellink, Wederdopers, see Index.) vdZ.

Damas Jacobsz, a native of Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, a barber, one of the fanatical Anabaptists. He was probably a follower of David Joris (q.v.) and was beheaded at Delft, Holland, on Jan. 10, 1539 (not 1538 as G. Brandt, Hist. der Ref. I, 1677, 133, states). Dämberschitz, a village in Moravia southeast of Austerlitz, where the Hutterian Brethren set up a Bruderhof in 1550. In the disturbances of war several buildings, including the pottery, were burned down in September 1619, and in 1622 they had to flee from Dämberschitz losing all their possessions. They settled in Echtelnitz. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 198, 374, 408, and 409; ML I, 387.) Hege.

The introduction contains a blunt warning against Schwenckfelders, Photians, and Anabaptists. The booklet would have some value for Anabaptist history if the assertion that Niclaus Kuntz of Husum "who studied in Amsterdam" was an Anabaptist were correct. But of this there is no possibility, judging by what is said about his faith. Perhaps he and Lohmann were Weigelians. (ML I, 387.) Neff.

Damian, an Anabaptist martyr of Allgäu, executed at the stake at Ingolstadt in 1543. He was apparently a Hutterite. On the way to the site of execution he addressed the crowd in such a way that a student said, "One thing must be true. This man has either a devil or the spirit of God, since he knows so much when he is apparently a humble person." The judge was also conscience-stricken. Damme, Elysabeth van (nee van Blenckvliet), a member of the Flemish Mennonite congregation of den Blok at Haarlem, Holland, who together with her husband Jaques van Damme founded the Zuiderhofje (an old people's home) there in 1640, and after the death of her husband contributed liberally to the orphanage of the Flemish congregation here. According to another tradition she was the founder of this (first Dutch Mennonite) orphanage. The remarkable "ordere van 't weeshuys van den Block," signed May 15, 1643, is found in the archives of the Haarlem congregation. vdZ.

Daniel van der Campt (or Vercampt, Verkampt), an Anabaptist martyr of Kortrijk (Courtrai), Belgium. He was a weaver and unmarried. After a cross-examination by the Inquisitor Pieter Titelman, the dean of Ronse, and by a certain Polet, he was burned in Kortrijk on Dec. 12, 1559. Van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, relates that Daniel's mother, who was still a Catholic, was also examined and threatened with severe punishment, because she had hidden her son, knowing that he was a heretic. But she said that he was an honest young man and not a thief or a rascal and that she had hidden him for maternal love. She defended herself so well that she was set free. (*Mart. Daniel de Paeu (Pau, Pou), an Anabaptist martyr, a cobbler of Eeclo in Belgium, was burned at the stake at Gent, Belgium, on Dec. 29, 1568, together with Daniel van Vooren and Passchier Weyns (q.v.). In the first song of the supplement to the old Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (ed. 1578, BRN II, 649 ff.) the names of these three martyrs are also found. Particulars are lacking. (*Mart. Dannenberg, a former Mennonite congregation in Lithuania (q.v.). There are a number of documents and letters pertaining to the Dannenberg congregation in the Archives of the Amsterdam Mennonite Church (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1074-79, 1085, 1582-93; II, 2, Nos. 743, 755, 784). These letters show that this congregation in Prussian Lithuania belonged to the United High German, Frisian, and Flemish Mennonites. In May 1724 they were obliged to leave the country, but soon returned. In 1731 they numbered 47 families and asked the Amsterdam congregation for financial help, which was given. Their ministers were Hans Jantzen and Thies Ewerdt. Elder Jakob Denner of Altona arrived in November 1731 to spend the winter with the church at Dannenberg. On Feb. 22, 1732, by order of King Frederick William I of Prussia, they were expelled again. They had to leave Dannenberg before June 8 of this year. Most of them (with some other Mennonites) emigrated by ship, via Königsberg to Amsterdam, 110 souls in all. They were supplied with houses and land at Wageningen and on the island of Walcheren near Middelburg by the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs. This colonization proved to be a failure. (See DB 1905, 112-68; 1906, 93-138.) Beginning in September 1736 they gradually returned and settled in the environs of Danzig and Elbing. The exact relation of this congregation to the other Mennonite settlement (begun in 1714) and congregations is not clear. In any case it had only a short existence under the name Dannenberg. vdZ.

Dantumawoude (shortened form Damwoude), a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, the seat of a Mennonite church, situated between Dokkum and Veenwouden. The time of the origin of the congregation is uncertain. Blaupot ten Cate places the date between 1580 and 1600. Practically nothing is known of its early history. The church records go back only to 1728. In 1767 the present church was erected; it was substantially enlarged in 1910. Until 1812 the congregation was served by lay ministers. The last of these was the well-known Uilke Reitses Dijkstra (1775-1823). Since that time the church has had trained ministers, the first of whom was Jan ter Borg, 1810-19. At this time a number of members of the Reformed Church were admitted into this congregation without rebaptism (DB 1882, 107).

The Mennonite Church of Dantumawoude is one of the most thriving rural churches in Holland. The Mennonite Bible studies and especially preaching services are attended also by people of other faiths. The church board manages the considerable capital of the church, assisted by an inspector. The congregation is a member of Ring Dantumawoude. The membership figures are as follows: 1695, about 150; 1838, 207; 1861, 277; 1898, 275; 1921, 270; 1954, 249. Ministers during the past half-century were U. J. Reinders, 1899-1916; F. H. Pasma, 1916-21; L. Bonga, 1921-26; J. IJntema, 1926-31; L. D. G. Knipscheer, 1931-35; H. H. Gaaikema, 1935-46; G. Kater, 1946-51; E. Daalder since 1951. The congregation has a Sunday school for children, a women's organization, a youth organization, and a club of catechumens, called Menniste Bouwers. (F. H. Pasma, Onze Vermaning 1767-1917, Gedachtenisrede; ML I, 389.) F.H.P., vdZ.

Dantumawoude Ring, an association of Mennonite churches in the Dutch province of Friesland. After Ring Akkrum and Ring Bolsward were organized, the need for a similar federation in northeast Friesland became apparent. D. Plantinus, preacher of Holwerd and Blija, invited delegates from the church to meet at Dokkum on Aug. 6, 1850, to discuss and adopt a preliminary constitution which he had drafted. Representatives of nine congregations appeared: Surhuisterveen, Veenwoudsterwal, Dantumawoude, Ternaard, Holwerd-Blija, Oudebildtzijl, Hallum, and Ameland (Flemish and Waterlander) who formed a temporary union, "in order to support one another with regular preaching service in the event of sickness or a vacancy." The union was soon joined by the combined congregations of Rottevalle and Witveen. Dragten and Leeuwarden thanked Plantinus for the invitation; the latter promised to give as much service as possible to the Ring, but felt it did not need it itself. St. Anna-Parochie joined in 1872, and Berlikum in 1874.

On Sept. 6, 1855, the Ring began its work. Nes and Hollum on Ameland received special terms. In 1916 the congregation known as Kring Zwaagwesteinde, which does not have a preacher, was granted Ring service. The church at Dokkum, since it had more Mennonite members than Remonstrant, was received into the Ring in 1917 with full rights and obligations.

For a minister incapacitated by illness the service of the Ring lasts not more than a year, unless a majority of Ring members decide otherwise. For the widow or minor orphan of a deceased minister the service continues for six months. At present (1954) the Ring comprises 12 congregations: Ameland, St. Anna Parochie, Berlikum, Hallum, Holwerd, Oudebildtzijl, Rottevalle, Surhuisterveen, Ternaard, Veenwouden, and Zwaagwestcinde. Dantzig, Hans van, a Mennonite deacon at Amsterdam, concerning whose life little is known. Apparently he or his father was from Danzig. The following books, of which he is the author, have been preserved: Een corte bekentenis van den eenighen Godt, vader, sone ende heyligen Gheest (Alkmaar, 1605); Een tafereelken ofte aenwijsinghe van eenighe schriften der Belofte Gods (Haarlem, 1609); Een vaderlijcke waerschouwinghe, gedaen aen sijne kinderen, daerin dat hij se vermaent tot een Godtsalich leven, waarachter opgesteld staat; een corte bekentenisse des gheloofs (Haarlem, 1610); Een vaderlijcke vermaninghe uyt den grooten schadt der heylige schrift (Haarlem, n.d.). All of these treatises were reprinted in Amsterdam in 1714 (Catalogus Amst., 227). Hans van Dantzig is the compiler of the Dutch hymnbook Pruys Liedtboek (q.v.). (ML I, 390.) J.L.

Danzig, a government district (Regierungsbezirk) of the province of West Prussia, before the partition in 1918 containing nearly one third of the Mennonites living in Germany, most of them in the triangle formed by Danzig (city), Elbing, and Marienburg. Whereas in the townships of Marienburg and rural Elbing the number of Mennonites decreased after World War I, it rose in the townships of Danzig-City, Danzig-Lowland, Danzig-Heights, and Elbing-City. Also in the township of Neustadt, particularly in Zoppot, more and more Mennonites settled.

Census figures show the following Mennonite populations in the various parts of the district:

The district contained the following congregations up to the evacuation of all Germans under the Polish occupation: Fürstenwerder with 561 souls (in 1921), Heubuden 1,623, Ladekopp with Orlofferfelde 1,150, Tiegenhagen 823, and Thiensdorf-Markushof 1,083, Elbing-City 400, Elbing-Ellerwald 736, Rosenort 718, Danzig City 1,360, and Danzig-Lowland-Quadendorf 50. Parts of Fürstenwerder and Tiegenhagen also belonged to Danzig-Lowland.

From Jan. 20, 1920, to August 1939 the old district of Danzig was displaced in part by the Free City of Danzig, a politically independent state under the League of Nations. In 1939-45 it was called "Regierungsbezirk Danzig," and was part of the "Reichsgau Danzig-Westpreussen." With the conquest of Germany by the allied powers in 1945 and the reconstitution of Poland, the area was incorporated into the Polish governmental system, with the Polish name Gdansk.

In 1947 the Mennonite Central Committee established a relief program in the Danzig area, to which it had been directed by the Polish government, with headquarters in Tczew (Dirschau), conducting relief until the fall of 1948 when the Polish government in effect compelled the transfer of the work to Nasielsk near Warsaw. During the 1947-48 period many Mennonites were aided together with the general population. In 1947 there were still over 200 Mennonites in this region, nearly all of whom were permitted to go to Germany in 1947-49. A few individuals and one or two families of Mennonites have remained in the city or its environs. (ML I, 390.) HEGE, H.S.B.

Danzig, Free City of. The Treaty of Versailles (effective Jan. 20, 1920) placed the city of Danzig and its immediate vicinity (ca. 790 sq. mi.) under the protection of the League of Nations as an independent state, in an attempt to solve the conflict between the principle of self-determination (the city was German) and the need of Poland for a free port of access to the Baltic. From Nov. 7, 1920, the city had its own government with an elected senate of 21 senators and a president. It contained besides the city proper also the rural township of Danzig Heights, Danzig Lowland, and Elbing, the townships Neustadt and Marienburg, and the towns of Zoppot (pop. 15,000), Tiegenhof (3,000), and Neuteich (2,400). The total urban population was 225,000, the rural population 125,000. Of these, 220,000 were Protestants, 120,000 Catholics, 6,000 Mennonites, and 4,000 Jews.

were Mennonites. The constitution gave the Mennonites equal rights with other citizens, and in addition permitted them to substitute an affirmation for an oath. The Mennonites in the Free City belonged to the following congregations: Danzig, Fürstenwerder with its subsidiary Neunhuben, Ladekopp-Orlofferfelde, Tiegenhagen, Rosenort, and Heubuden. Heubuden was divided, only that part lying west of the Nogat belonging to the Free City.

The history of the territory was a turbulent one after the accession of Hitler to power in 1933. In 1934 Hitler arbitrarily denounced the German-Polish nonaggression treaty, and demanded the return of Danzig to Germany, which was naturally refused. From that time on, the Nazi party agitated and terrorized the population until by 1937 the Gestapo was in complete control of the city. Even a terrorized election of 1935 failed to secure the necessary two-thirds majority for the Nazis (they received only 57.3 per cent). In August 1939, by a coup d'etat, Forster declared himself head of the state, and shortly thereafter Hitler reincorporated Danzig into the Reich. The war with Poland was occasioned by this act, and was followed by World War II.

Danzig was first under the Teutonic Order, until 1454, when it voluntarily came under the protectorate of Poland 1454-1772. It joined the Hanseatic League in 1391, and under the Polish regime was to all intents an independent free city. In 1772 (fully only in 1793) it became Prussian, remaining so until 1920. It accepted the Reformation 1523-57. (ML I, 390.) H.G.M., H.S.B.

Danzig Mennonite Church, the largest city Mennonite church in East Germany, which had more than 1,100 baptized members in 1921. The late Danzig church was formed in 1808 from a union of the Old Flemish congregation (founded in 1569) and the Old Frisian congregation (founded about 1600).

The date of the coming of the first Mennonites to Danzig is not certain. Individual Anabaptists found their way here about 1530, especially from Holland. It is fairly certain that Menno Simons came to Danzig at least once, when he journeyed into the Baltic region and looked up his scattered brethren in and beyond Polish Prussia, and wherever possible organized them into congregations. In 1549 he wrote to the "children of God in Prussia," stating that he had been there that year. After Menno's death Dirk Philips came here again, and according to the tradition of the Danzig congregation was its first elder. He lived in Schottland near Danzig (Cramer, "Mennoniten," in HRE, 607) and worked with Hans Sikken several years—until 1567 or 1568—preaching and administering baptism and communion. Since during these very years Alba's reign of terror caused a greater influx of Dutch refugees to Danzig, they may have played a part in the formation of the congregation, which has existed in organized form since 1569. The list of elders and preachers is without a gap. The names of the founders are all Dutch—Hans van Amersfoort, Gijsbert de Veer (b. May 14, 1536, in Amsterdam), van Eyck, Beulke, van Buygen, van Almonde, Symons, van Dyck, Janzen, Maal (Mahl), van Beuningen, van Berynghuysen, etc. Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.), who visited Danzig in 1563-65, baptized only three persons here.

The divisions that had taken place in Holland were, of course, transferred to the new locality; thus a Flemish and a Frisian congregation existed here side by side. The points of difference were maintained for a long time in Prussia, sometimes more emphatically than in the mother country. Until 1786 it was customary to rebaptize members of the Frisian group who wished to join the larger Flemish group. The latter, the more important congregation, considering itself beyond question the real Danzig Mennonite Church, kept in live communication with the strictest wing of the Old Flemish (q.v.) in Holland, especially in Amsterdam, Haarlem, and Rotterdam. Its influence was so pronounced in Holland that a part of the Old Flemish there in the 17th century were called the "Old Danzig" group. That the Flemish congregations called themselves the "fine" is generally known; it is not so well known that they were also known as the "clear" (Klare, unambiguous), which gave rise to the term "Klarichen" or "Klärichen," in Low German "Klarken" or "Klerken" (q.v.). The Frisians, on the other hand, who were more liberal, were called the "coarse" (Grobe) or "worried" (Bekümmerte). Connections with Holland, by correspondence and by visits, remained intact as long as the Dutch language was used in church and home (1600-1750). The well-to-do Danzig congregation sent its young sons to Amsterdam to complete their education and learn a business, as well as to share youth instruction in the church and return to Danzig after receiving baptism. The Danzig baptismal registers of the 17th and 18th centuries nearly always contain an appendix of those who were baptized in Holland. In 1725, at the urgent request of the Old Flemish in Rotterdam and Amsterdam, Dirk Janssen, a Danzig preacher, was chosen by lot as elder to succeed Adriaan van Gameren, was ordained in Danzig, and was sent to Amsterdam. He left Danzig with his family on Dec. 7, 1725, and returned eight years later, serving as elder in Danzig with Isaac de Veer and then alone until his death on Nov. 25, 1750.

Evidence of these contacts between the Mennonites of Danzig and Amsterdam is found in a large number (more than 300) of documents in the Mennonite Archives of Amsterdam (see bibliography). Most of these are letters, received from or sent to Danzig. They are a rich source of information about conditions in the Danzig congregations, both Flemish and Frisian. They give information on such things as measures of the Danzig government against the Mennonites, hardships because of war, fire, and floods, the considerable sums received from the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs, and the spiritual conditions of the Danzig Mennonites. About 1730, when a quarrel arose between the Danzig Flemish congregation and its Elder Heinrich von Dühren (q.v.), two Dutch ministers, first Abraham Koenen and later Jacob Ouwejans, were sent to Danzig to settle the quarrel.

As shipping and trade between Holland and Danzig had already been active in the 14th and 15th centuries, the refugees from Holland did not flee into the unknown. At first, to be sure, the Lutheran clergy had induced the council to close its gates to them but the bishop of Cujavien, who had possessions near the city, received them in Schottland (today Altschottland), and gave them religious liberty and an opportunity to follow their trades. In the course of time the Polish kings granted them solemn letters of protection (W. Mannhardt, Wehrfreiheit) which of course did not prevent all oppression by self-centered officials or hostile clergymen, and especially by envious competing city guilds. Here as elsewhere the government took a friendly attitude toward the Mennonites on account of their civic virtues, and their industry and skill in trades and business; but the citizenry and the clergy opposed toleration. During the entire Polish period (until 1772) they suffered almost continually from hostility and arbitrary oppression, in many cases unabashed extortion by high-ranking persons. The notes (1667-92) of Elder Georg Hansen in the church archives cite numerous instances in which sometimes the elder or the ministers or individual members were summoned before the bishop's officer who had religious jurisdiction in the city on charges of false doctrine, Socinian connections, and the like. A more or less heavy fine was usually imposed. Fortunately the Mennonites were frequently defended from exploitation by the city council. But the council was not always able to protect them against attacks. From 1749 to 1762 a regulation was enforced by the small dealers in the city, prohibiting Mennonite merchants in the suburbs from selling anything but brandy (see Alcohol). This measure, added to the protection fee of 5,000 florins arbitrarily imposed on Mennonites living in or near the city (Jan. 14, 1750), impoverished a number of respected members. The fee was later reduced to 3,000 florins, then to 1,200.

In 1793, when Danzig passed into Prussian hands, much of the pressure was released. In 1800 the Mennonites were given the rights of citizenship, which permitted them to buy land without employing an agent. But this was also the beginning of their struggle to maintain their nonresistance, which lasted until 1867, and its aftereffects decades longer.

The Flemish group had its church before the Petershagen city gate, and the Frisian group before the Neugarten gate. In 1648 the Flemish purchased a lot in the city (title was not transferred to them until 1732) on which they built a church, and beside it the customary home for the poor, with room for about 30 persons. In 1734 the city was besieged by the Russians for two months, during which time the many Mennonites in the southern suburbs had to flee from their homes into the city proper. Church, poorhouse, and some private dwellings were destroyed. With aid from the Dutch and Prussian Mennonites and a legacy, the congregation was able to rebuild the church and the poor-home. Seventy years later, in 1805, the church was completely remodeled and an organ added against the wishes of an important minority. But in 1813, during a siege by the Russians, both were destroyed by fire.

The Frisian group, considerably smaller than the Flemish, also had a poorhouse beside their church, which was built in 1638 before the Neugarten gate. It was remodeled in 1788, but was destroyed in the French siege of 1806. After this event the two groups worshiped together and until 1813 used the Flemish church within the city limits. After the war this church was not rebuilt, for most of the members had meanwhile moved into the city. A suitable lot was bought in the city in 1816 and a poorhouse erected on it; then in spite of general impoverishment brought on by war and foreign occupation, the congregation proceeded to build the church, dedicating it on Sept. 12, 1819. Beside it they added a parsonage in 1884. The short street in front of the church was called "Mennonitenstrasse."

The Flemish group had from the beginning included the Mennonite settlers in the Danzig Werder. In 1768 this minority, finding the roads to the city church impassable, requested that occasional services be held among them; this was feasible, for two of the preachers lived in the Werder. In 1791 this group became independent of the city church, except that the elder of the city congregation had the oversight over them. Then in 1826, when the city group engaged a salaried elder, the Werder congregation broke away and became a subsidiary of the Fürstenwerder church. In 1844 they built a small church at Neunhuben (q.v.) and have since been known by that name.

At first the Danzig Mennonites used the Dutch language in their services and in private. By 1750, with a decline of contact with Holland, High German began to take its place in church and Plattdeutsch mixed with many a Dutch word for daily speech. After the death of Hans van Steen (q.v.), who spoke and wrote exclusively in Dutch, the change made more rapid progress. Dutch songbooks were in use in the congregations of Danzig until about 1780. Then a German hymnbook was introduced, in 1908 replaced by Gesangbuch zur kirchlichen und häuslichen Erbauung (Danzig, 1908).

Strict church discipline was one of the fundamental tenets of the Danzig Mennonites. But it was inevitable that as contacts with the world destroyed their isolation their simplicity of dress and life would gradually give way. Nevertheless, the church records tell us that even in the 19th century the church council opposed fashionable clothing, luxury, dancing, and cards. Disciplinary action in the case of moral lapses tended to become censoriousness, and church confession became a rather external affair.

It is difficult to determine the number of Mennonites in Danzig in the early days. The elders were reluctant to hand in names to the authorities, lest their number be found too great. Complete records of baptisms, marriages, and deaths have been preserved only from 1668 on. Very likely the membership was highest between 1690 and 1750. A list (probably incomplete) of Mennonite residents in Danzig in 1681, found in the city archives, names 180 families. In 1709 the plague carried away 160 adult members and 230 chlidren of the Flemish church. Notwithstanding this the records of the next ten years show an annual average of 17 births, 20 candidates for baptism, and 16 marriages. In 1749 Hans van Steen enumerates 240 households, excluding rural homes. Statistics of the Frisian group are quite uncertain. When the two groups merged in 1808, the Frisian portion numbered 166 souls, the Flemish about 700. A membership list of January 1831 counts a total of 635; the membership apparently declined during the war and after principally by emigration to Russia, but also by rejection of mixed marriages and refusal to admit members of other faiths. In 1852 the number of baptized members had declined to 410. Not until 1867, when the church abandoned its practice of excluding those who married outside the church and admitted members of other faiths, did the membership begin to rise. In 1882 it reached 488 baptized members. After World War I it had climbed to 1,130 baptized members, some of whom had moved in from the country. The last statistics (1940) show 1,020 baptized members, 173 unbaptized children.

Among the 20 elders and 38 preachers in the Flemish group before 1808, there were several who merit special mention: Kryn Vermeulen (q.v.), who issued a fine edition of the Bible; Georg Hansen (q.v.), a simple craftsman who competently championed Mennonite rights, but who took a narrow-minded attitude toward the painter and elder Enoch Seemann (q.v.); Hans van Steen (q.v.), distinguished by his education and vigor, some of whose valuable historical notes have been preserved. In the 19th century Jakob Mannhardt (q.v.) in his long service, 1836-85, guided his church through the difficult transition from nonresistance to acceptance of military service, and was influential in drawing the Mennonites in all parts of Germany closer together by founding the Mennonitische Blätter (q.v.). Hans Momber (q.v.), a respected preacher and hymn writer, was influential in uniting the two factions in 1808.

H. G. Mannhardt, nephew of Jakob, had a long and influential career as preacher and elder 1879-1927. He wrote a history of the congregation, which was published in 1919. He was followed as pastor and elder by Erich Göttner, who was taken as a prisoner of war to Russia in World War II, since when no further news of him is known.

The last constitution was in use from 1886; the congregation was incorporated in 1887. The congregation was a member of the Vereinigung (q.v.) from the time of its organization in 1886, and was an active participant in its founding.

In addition to the lot on which the church, the parsonage, the cemetery, and the hospital built in 1902 were located, the congregation also owned two houses near by. The hospital contained the residence of the sexton and eight small apartments for aged individuals or couples, a chapel for instruction and meetings, and the church library and archives. The costs of the upkeep and management of this property were met by interest from investments and by voluntary contributions. The church property suffered some damage during World War II, and during the hard winter of 1946 all the furniture and woodwork was torn out of the church building for fuel. The library and archives were in part plundered, and in part rescued and brought to the United States by American Mennonites who worked on cattle boats bringing relief cattle and horses to Poland via Danzig in 1945-46. In this way some church record books were saved and brought to the Bethel College Library.† (Vol. I) H.G.M.

Danzig Old Flemish Mennonites (Dantziger Oude Vlamingen), a branch of the Flemish (q.v.) Mennonites which arose shortly after 1630, when most Old Flemish Mennonites wished to merge with the (Young) Flemish. They were found in the Netherlands and in Prussia. In the Netherlands they sometimes were called Huiskoopers (q.v.), and in West Prussia Clercken, Clarichen, or Klerkschen (q.v.). In 1740 this group had congregations in the following towns: Haarlem (op de Smallegraft), Amsterdam (bij de kruikjes), Rotterdam (in de Lombardstraat), Blokzijl, Giethoorn (Noordzijde), Zuidveen (Oude Huis), and Oldemarkt; in former times this group had other congregations which died out before 1740, as Brielle, Oud-Beyerland, Landsmeer, and perhaps a number of other churches now unknown.

In Prussia the following churches belonged to the Danzig Old Flemish: Danzig (op het Schotland), Elbing, the Grosse Werder (later forming the four congregations of Rosenort, Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, and Fürstenwerder), Heubuden, and Königsberg. There was some contact between these Prussian churches and the Dutch congregations; occasionally conferences of representatives were held, mostly at Danzig; Dutch elders of this group visited Prussia in order to hold baptism services and to ordain elders. And in 1725, when the elder of the Amsterdam congregation had died and no Dutch preacher was available for the eldership, Elder Dirk Janssen came from Danzig to Amsterdam and served this church for nearly eight years; then the Dutch preacher Isaac de Veer was appointed elder of the congregation of Amsterdam, and Janssen returned to Danzig. Most of these Danzig Old Flemish churches had only a small membership; that of Amsterdam, which was the largest of all, numbered in 1741 only 70 members. The Dutch congregations of this group all died out or merged with other Mennonite congregations during the 18th century. The Danzig Old Flemish congregation of Rotterdam died out shortly after 1750; that of Amsterdam merged with the Zonists (q.v.) in 1788, and that of Haarlem with the United Mennonites in 1789. The Danzig Old Flemish Mennonites were different from other conservative groups such as the Groningen Old Flemish in the practice of footwashing, not practicing it in connection with the communion services, but practicing it toward elders and members coming from other places (Rues, 19 f.). In 1743 they published their first printed confession: Pieter Boudewijns, Onderwyzinge des Christelyken geloofs, volgens de Belydenis der Christenen, die men de Oude Vlaamsche Mennoniten noemt . . . (printed at Haarlem, 1743).

Danzig Refugees. The exact beginning of Mennonite history in the Vistula area in northern Europe cannot be determined, but it is known that by 1549 several congregations had been organized, for Menno Simons, who had worked among them, addressed them at that time as "the children of God in Prussia." Dirk Philips followed Menno as a worker among these churches and in the region of Danzig until 1568. These migrations may have taken place as early as 1529.

However, the larger migrations took place somewhat later following a special invitation extended by Simon and Hans von Loysen, owners of large undeveloped estates in the Lower Delta at Tiegenhof in 1562. Because of their experience in dike-building and in draining swamp areas the Dutch Mennonites were given a special invitation with the promise of liberal rights both religious and economic.

As the migrations continued, the settlements spread across the swamp lands of the wide Vistula and Nogat delta until prosperous communities and congregations had been established throughout the region of Marienburg, Schwetz, Graudenz, Culm, and Thorn. In succeeding generations these broadened out into surrounding territories.

For some two centuries the settlements enjoyed comparative liberty and freedom unhampered by restrictions until they became prosperous and influential. However, under the reign of Frederick William II (1786-97) the situation changed. Economic and religious restrictions were set up which made it clear that both state and church were determined to stop further growth of Mennonitism. In the midst of a period of anxiety and increasing distress came the invitation of Catherine II of Russia, inviting these people to come to her land, with an assurance of liberal privileges and opportunities. During the next half century almost half of the whole delta Mennonite population emigrated to Russia. This article confines itself to those who remained behind in the Vistula, especially in the Danzig area. Before World War II there were approximately 10,000 Mennonites living in the lower areas along the Vistula River. Two thirds of these lived in the territory of the Free City (State) of Danzig. The rest were in East Prussia and Poland. They were organized as the Conference of the East and West Prussian Mennonites. Preceding World War I they had attained a high level of economic prosperity, although spiritually they suffered in the loss of some of the old Anabaptist principles. Following World War I the economic picture deteriorated until the rise of Hitler, under whom a short-lived period of prosperity again flourished.

In the summer of 1944 the tragic evacuation of the entire area began; the German army began to retreat before the onslaughts of the Russian army. By early fall thousands of refugees were fleeing from East Prussia. Many fled to Western Germany; others concentrated in the Free City of Danzig, hoping they would escape the terrors of war. Among these great masses were thousands of Mennonites leaving all their possessions in the hope of saving life itself. Most of the evacuation was completed by February 1945, but in the spring of 1948 there were still some 200 left in the Danzig area.

Those fleeing into Western Germany met with hardships and horrible experiences as they were overtaken by the Russian armies. Western Germany was already overcrowded with refugees and the coming of these additional groups only aggravated the situation. Here in this densely crowded area, living under most trying conditions, these brethren in the faith lived until resettlement plans could be formulated and successfully carried out. The United States and Canada were not ready to accept German nationals; Paraguay was looked upon with disfavor by the Prussian group. The danger of being moved back to the Russian Zone constantly faced them. Earnest efforts on the part of Gustav Reimer, Sr., on their behalf for settlement in France failed completely. So it was not until 1948, when some 450 Prussian Mennonites from the British Zone together with 300 Prussian Mennonites of the Danish internment camps arrived in Uruguay, that the doors began to open for new life.

Not all of the Mennonites of the Vistula area fled into Western Germany. Great masses fled into the area of Danzig, only to discover soon that even there they were not safe. With the retreat of the German army in the presence of the onrushing Russian tanks and artillery, Danzig, the beautiful homeland of Mennonites for over four hundred years, became a mass of flame. Countless thousands of helpless men, women, and children were herded upon ships by the German army and transported into safer regions. Great numbers went down into a watery grave in the flight; many leaped from flaming decks into the waters while others were burned to death, unable to escape. A remnant was saved and brought to the shores of Denmark, which was then occupied by Germany. The close of the war found this small nation of four million people with over 200,000 homeless, despised Germans upon its hands, confronted with great problems of housing, feeding, and clothing them. Of these, approximately 1,500 were of the Mennonite faith.

With the close of the war, when Denmark recovered her sovereignty, she attempted to solve the problems caused by having these refugees within her borders. Internment camps were established throughout the land, ranging in size from some 20,000 to a few hundred in population. At one time, approximately 40 camps were in existence, which were later consolidated. All were encircled with barbed-wire fences and posted with armed guards day and night to see that no one entered or left the camp without the proper papers. Thus these refugees became virtual prisoners of war. It was not until more than three years had elapsed that the last of these camps were finally closed and provisions had been made for the removal of these unfortunates into lands where they could begin life anew.

In the late fall of 1945 C. F. Klassen, returning from a three-month tour of Europe as special commissioner for displaced Mennonites, included in his report these 1,500 Mennonites in Denmark. Plans were formulated to aid these along with other refugees in Europe. It was not until late in the fall of 1946, however, that any work could actually be undertaken in their behalf. At that time Walter Gering and Elma Esau were sent as an MCC unit to work within the camps, with headquarters at Copenhagen. Their program was to be one of spiritual and material aid. Food was provided by the Danish government; however, clothing and shoes were distributed by the unit to Mennonites and non-Mennonites. Gering, as a minister, was to arrange for religious services and spiritual nurture of the Mennonites.

Mennonites were found scattered in the various camps—at one time in 34 different camps, often in very small groups. Attempts to bring these together into several camps were only partially successful. The MCC unit made its headquarters in Copenhagen, where the largest of the camps was located. From here they went out on regular tours of the country, visiting the various camps and distributing two shipments of clothing, totaling 25 tons and 4,000 pairs of shoes, among the refugees. The Danish government had agreed to this distribution under the condition that half of the goods be distributed by the camp officials to non-Mennonites. The other half could be distributed by MCC workers to the Mennonite internees. Elma Esau was in charge of the distributions while Gering arranged for and conducted Bible studies, worship services, and individual contacts of a spiritual nature. Bruno Ewert and Bruno Enns, elders from the Danzig area (Heubuden and Orlofferfelde) and fellow internees, were associated in the work of the MCC unit. Later Mr. and Mrs. P. S. Goertz, with Susie Peters, succeeded the first MCC workers.

While the problems of the work were such as are common to all refugees, yet the greatest one was that of instilling hope for the possibility of a new beginning. The total loss of all possessions including the loss of members of the family, the prolonged period of internment and the hardships of camp life, all contributed to create a spirit of hopelessness and despair. Together with this came the decision of MCC that while resettlement of these Danzig refugees was to be a part of the general program of resettlement, yet the first obligation should be that of providing for the Russian Mennonite refugees. The reason for this decision can be understood in the light of the danger in which the Russian Mennonites found themselves. However, this meant further delay for the Danzig Mennonite refugees, a delay which brought increased despair to them as they waited in uncertainty as to what their future held for them.

It was on Oct. 7, 1948, that the Volendam (q.v.) sailing from Bremerhaven carried with it 751 Prussian Mennonites (a small number were former Galicians, not Prussians), 284 coming directly from the Danish internment camps and the rest out of the British Zone in Germany. These were known as the Danziger Mennonites. They had been assigned to Paraguay, but the doors of Uruguay opened in a dramatic manner just as the refugees were about to embark. So it came about that the Volendam unloaded the 751 at Montevideo on Oct. 27, 1948, and the first group began the settlement of a new land. In October 1951 another group of 430 Mennonite refugees, largely from the Danzig group, landed to join the group which had come in 1948.

Since the granting of visas came unexpectedly for the original group in 1948 there was no time to make resettlement preparations in advance. The immigrants were housed in two camps, one at Colonia and the other at Arapey, where they were supported by the MCC until they found work or were settled on the land. In May 1949 the MCC with the help of a government loan purchased a land site known as "El Ombu" (q.v.), a tract including 2,962 acres on the main highway between Montevideo and Paysandu. In 1953 another large tract was purchased at Tres Bocas, 50 miles from El Ombu.

All this took time, as can be expected. In the meantime many of the immigrants secured work outside the camps and a number also succeeded in locating land themselves which they could rent with the possibility of purchase later. Gradually all those who were able to work left the camps.

The land at El Ombu was divided into 30 parcels, three families living on each parcel. Each of the three families was made responsible for the development of the land within its parcel and the payment of the debt against it. A co-operative was organized to transact the business of the colony. Some land was set aside for Mennonite couples who in later years will want to live with their own people. The development is along the line of diversified farming, the land being best suited for this.

While most of the families settled finally on the El Ombu colony tract, yet some who had found work of a permanent nature in the cities preferred to stay where they were. A goodly number of single girls found work doing housework in the city of Montevideo. For these and other Mennonites in the city, MCC opened a center which conducted sewing circles, Bible study, choir practice, and Sunday church services. Also a guest house was opened for Mennonites coming to the city on business.

W.G.

The door of emigration to Canada was opened for the Danzig refugees in 1951, and a total of over 200 emigrated to that country with the aid of the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization 1951-52.

The great majority of the Danzig refugees, however, have been resettled in Germany. Over a thousand, chiefly from the Denmark camps, were moved to the Palatinate-Hesse region, also to the region around Neuwied (Niederbieber, q.v.) in 1949. Others have since been resettled in small projects in Espelkamp (q.v.), Backnang (q.v.), Lübeck (q.v.), and Enkenbach (q.v.), where with the aid of the German government and the MCC new homes have been built. However, most of the refugees have taken care of themselves as best they can, locating in widely scattered areas through all four zones of Germany, with over 1,000 in the Russian Zone. These latter have the most difficult time.

Unfortunately the wide scattering has made it most difficult to provide pastoral oversight or to organize congregations in the new locations. Some are now attached to the older established congregations, but the following new congregations have been organized: Göttingen (1945), Bremen (1947), Bergisches Land (1948), Uelzen (1948), Kiel (1949), Lübeck (1950), together with the unorganized congregations of Nord-Schleswig, Holstein, and Westphalia. Three homes for the aged have been established, filled largely with Danzig refugees: Leutesdorf a. Rh. (1948), Enkenbach (Pfalz), and Pinneberg-Rellingen near Hamburg. These homes are operated by an association called Mennonitisches Altersheim e.V. (q.v.), organized in 1948. The old organization of the West Prussian conference has been reconstituted as Aeltestenausschuss der Konferenz der west- und ostpreussischen Mennonitengemeinden, and the Vereinigung has organized a relief program, Hilfswerk der Vereinigung der Deutschen Mennonitengemeinden (organized 1946). It is estimated that the total population of Danzig refugees remaining in Germany is about 7,000 including unbaptized children and adherents. Emigration had practically ceased by 1953, the situation having apparently stabilized. The prospects of retention of the scattered families and young people in the Mennonite fellowship are not good, since regular Mennonite worship and religious instruction are as yet insufficient; already numerous cases of transfer to the state church have been reported.

Dariusleut (Dariusgroup), the name of the smallest of the three Hutterite kinship groups which make up the total Hutterite brotherhood in North America, the other two being the Schmiedeleut and the Lehrerleut. On Dec. 31, 1950, the Dariusleut had 29 colonies or Bruderhofs with a total population of 2,522—25 Bruderhofs in Alberta, and 4 in Montana. A complete list with census is given at the end of this article. The bishop (Vorsteher) in 1954 was John Wurz of Wilson Siding Colony, Lethbridge, Alberta.

The origin of the three groups took place as follows. Until 1857 the entire Hutterite brotherhood had only one bishop or president and had been living in noncommunal form for 32 years since 1842 in a separate village, Hutterthal, in the Molotschna settlement about 12 miles from Melitopol, Russia, near the Tashchenak estate of Johann Cornies. Elder George Waldner, ordained in 1846, desired to restore the communal form, but his endeavors led only to a division which frustrated his attempt. He made an actual attempt in 1857 at Hutterdorf near Orechov in Ekaterinoslav; it failed; he died shortly thereafter. Meanwhile three new Hutterite villages had been established: (1) Johannisruh (in 1853-57), 2½ miles from Hutterthal, (2) Neu-Hutterthal (in 1857), 80 miles northwest of Huttertal, (3) Dobritcha (location not clear). In Hutterdorf after Waldner's death three preachers were chosen. One of these, Michael Waldner, successfully established a communal Bruderhof in 1859 in one end of Hutterdorf village. A second preacher, Darius Walter, founded another Bruderhof in the other end of Hutterdorf in 1860. The third preacher finally joined the Walter group.

The two above Bruderhofs became in America in 1874-75 the mother Bruderhofs of two groups, Schmiedeleut and Dariusleut. Tendencies toward establishing a communal Bruderhof in Johannisruh in 1864 ff. failed to materialize. But in 1877 a few of the Johannisruh families, led by Jacob Wipf, one of the preachers there, left for South Dakota and established a third communal Bruderhof there. The remaining Hutterites from all the villages also emigrated to South Dakota, but did not establish Bruderhofs; they formed regular Mennonite congregations which ultimately all joined the General Conference Mennonite Church (the last in 1940).

The Michael Waldner group came to the United States in 1874 and settled Bon-Homme Colony near Yankton, S.D. With its descendants it has since been called the Schmiedeleut, since Waldner was a blacksmith (Schmied), Darius Walter's group also arrived in 1874, and in 1875 established the Wolf Creek Bruderhof, and have since been called the Dariusleut. In the 1880 census 137 souls were registered for this group. The third group, led by Preacher Jacob Wipf, left Johannisruh in 1877 and established the Old Elmspring Bruderhof near Parkston, S.D. They were called Lehrerleut, because Jacob Wipf was a teacher in Russia and also in South Dakota.

The differences between the three groups are very minor, such as the wearing of buttons by the men of the Lehrerleut in contrast to the hooks and eyes of the other two groups. There are no differences in faith or practice and no breach of fellowship, but most marriages are among members of the same kinship group, as are likewise business contacts and visiting. Recently a general conference of all three groups was held in Manitoba. The Schmiedeleut Bruderhofs are all in South Dakota (one in North Dakota) and Manitoba, the Dariusleut mostly in Alberta with four in Montana, the Lehrerleut mostly in Alberta with seven in Montana. Each group is completely separate in ecclesiastical organization (having its own Vorsteher or bishop, and preachers) as well as in economic matters. The Lehrerleut left the Old Elmspring Bruderhof in 1932.

In the last few decades, a few Hutterites left Dariusleut colonies to form dissident colonies. The split usually was based on personality differences between some of the adults, but as the years went by, the dissidents have shown a tendency for rapid assimilation. One such group near Lethbridge formally severed its ties with the Hutterite group, which excommunicated them, and joined the Mennonite Church, forming the Stirling (MC) congregation in the Alberta-Saskatchewan Conference with 23 baptized members (1954) and John Hofer as preacher. Another group of a few families at Felger Colony, near Lethbridge, also is not in good standing with the Hutterite Church, but no formal break has occurred. (Zieglschmid, Klein-Geschichtsbuch.)

Darlington Mennonite (GCM) Mission station among the Cheyenne (q.v.) and Arapahoe (q.v.) Indians. Darlington is a village near El Reno in central Oklahoma, once the center of the government agency for these tribes. The government built its first Indian schools here, and here several religious bodies began their mission work with these tribes. In 1880 S. S. Haury (q.v.) became the first teacher in the mission school opened at Darlington by the General Conference Mennonite Church. The government granted the station many material favors, such as the wood from the near-by forest, the use of the governmental sawmill, and 40 acres of good land. The mission home was opened in August 1881 and a school for 25 pupils opened in the same autumn. Instruction in the school was conducted in English, whereas work with the adults was done in the native languages of the Indians, at first through interpreters. Food, clothing, and other necessities were furnished by the government.

This encouraging beginning justified bright hopes for the future. But on Feb. 19, 1882, the beautiful new building burned down with practically all its contents. The only son of the Haurys and three Indian children suffocated in the smoke before they could be reached. In spite of the shock of the tragedy, a new brick building was put up before the close of the year, twice as large as the original building.

Since the station at Cantonment (q.v.) had been planned in the meantime and the Haurys were stationed there, the work at Darlington was assigned to the Schultzes, and six months later to the H. R. Voths, together with a staff of workers to care for the 50 pupils in the boarding school. Evangelization was carried on among the adult Indians in their camps. In 1889 Mrs. Voth died, and three years later the J. S. Krehbiels were put in charge of the station.

About this time the Indians began to move away to other places, and the school was taken over by the government. The church withdrew from the station, Voth transferring to the work with the Indians in Arizona (q.v.). No congregation was ever organized at Darlington. In 1889 the first baptism took place on one of the older girls in the school; another who was to have been baptized died the week before. Others were baptized at Halstead, where they had gone for further education. Many of the children and adults of this station died of tuberculosis, some of them in faith in the Lord Jesus, but too suddenly to be received into the church. Some of the Indians later joined other churches (ML I, 395 f.) H.R.V.

Darmstadt, capital of Hesse, Germany, had a Mennonite congregation in 1910-35. Its members came from the Rhine Palatinate, Hesse, Baden, and Württemberg. Until the outbreak of World War I the church register listed 41 members who lived in Darmstadt or in Frankfurt and vicinity. The congregation was served by the Conference of South German Mennonites. The congregation now meets in Frankfurt (q.v.). (ML I, 395.) HEGE.

Darney, the name given for a time (1933-41) in the Gemeinde-Kalender to the French Mennonite congregation living widely scattered in the region of which Epinal is the approximate center. Before 1933, and in the reissued Gemeinde-Kalender, the name is given as the Vosges (q.v.) congregation. The history of this congregation is given in Christ Seul for August 1930, 5-8. In recent years the congregation has been very small, 25-50 souls, and has met only once per month in the homes of the members. vdZ.

Dartmouth Avenue United Missionary Church, located in Flint, Mich., was organized in 1936. In 1953 the congregation had 65 members, mostly factory workers. J. A. Bradley served as pastor. B.W.P.

Dathenus (Daten, Dalten, Daets), Petrus, b. 1531 or 1532 at Mont-Cassel, near Hazebrouck, French Flanders, d. March 17, 1588, at Elbing, Prussia, a Calvinist theologian, who as chaplain of Elector Frederick the Pious, the first German prince to accept Calvinism, established this creed in the Palatinate. As a young man he entered the monastery of Yper, but soon fled to embrace Calvin's teaching. After a short residence in England (1553-55) he became preacher of the Flemish congregation at Frankfurt. Dathenus was frequently involved in disputes with the Lutheran clergy of the city. On April 23, 1561, the magistrate denied the Dutch further toleration, and Dathenus found refuge with Elector Frederick III of the Palatinate, who offered him and the 60 families exiled from Frankfurt the buildings of Gross-Frankental, the dissolved Augustinian monastery, and in 1566 or soon after made Dathenus his chaplain. Sijbolts, "De Doopsgezinden te Middelburg" in DB 1908, 1-64, says that Dathenus was largely responsible for the severe Calvinist persecution of the Mennonites (Theol. Jahresbericht 1909, 28, 391). But Sijbolts is wrong: Heidanus, not Dathenus, was responsible.

In his new position Dathenus soon came in contact with the Anabaptists who were seeking new converts through emissaries sent out from Moravia. The government had three traveling evangelists summarily thrown into prison and under this pressure tried to convert them. The charge that the government was persecuting the Anabaptists without first inquiring about their faith gave the elector some concern. He therefore summoned the Anabaptist preachers to a public disputation with the Reformed clergy to be held at Frankenthal (q.v.) on May 28, 1571. Dathenus was the chief spokesman for the Reformed church; his colleagues scarcely got a word in. Thomas Erastus, who had recently been a member of the Palatine church council and was opposed to this disputation, wrote to Heinrich Bullinger in Zürich: "Their spokesmen are uneducated, immature young men, who have never seen a meeting of this kind. The affair will come to a ridiculous end and will dishonor the Prince. But he will not let himself be dissuaded." Frederick hoped that the Anabaptists would be won to his church by instruction and become a valuable addition to it (K. Sudhoff, C. Olevianus und Z. Ursinus, Elberfeld, 1857, 319).

The Reformed theologians took Martin Bucer (q.v.) as their model. Some of the doctrinal points discussed were the same as those the Strasbourg reformer had considered 33 years before in Marburg with the Hessian Anabaptists. But what Bucer succeeded in doing in two days, viz., converting the Anabaptists to the state church, Dathenus could not do in 19 days with two sessions daily beginning at six o'clock in the morning and two o'clock in the afternoon. With dialectic skill he was able to help himself over the most difficult points and objections of his opponents. On many points they agreed. But he should not have expected these simple people to agree with his sophistry on other points. The Anabaptist preachers, who in their simple piety were unwilling to pick to pieces Bible passages that seemed clear to them, refused "to try to fathom those things which God alone had in His power." Hence his frequently very artificial expositions of Scripture and argumentation on unfathomable theological issues made little impression on them. The negotiations were doomed to failure.

In the following years Dathenus apparently made no Anabaptist contacts, for he is never mentioned in connection with them. Throughout his life Dathenus was a restless personality; he spent much time in traveling. In December 1566 he presided at the Antwerp (Belgium) synod. In 1572 he was again in the Netherlands and also later made many trips to Holland and Belgium. He also visited Switzerland. After the death of Frederick III, whose son was Lutheran, he again accepted a position as preacher in Frankenthal; but in 1578 he was presiding at the Reformed synod in Dordrecht, Holland, and somewhat later in Gent, Belgium. Later on he became involved in a quarrel with William of Orange, perhaps because he felt that the prince was too tolerant of the Roman Catholics. In 1583 Dathenus was imprisoned for 50 days because of his attitude. Later Dathenus was in Schleswig-Holstein (Husum, and in 1585 Staden), where he also practiced medicine. During this period he apparently came somewhat under the influence of the Davidjorists. In 1587 he was in Danzig, and soon afterward in Elbing, where he practiced medicine until his death in 1588.

In 1566 Dathenus translated the Psalms from the French rhymed version by Clement Marot and Beza into Dutch. Dathenus' verse Psalms were adopted into the Reformed Church in Holland, and in spite of their shortcomings were used until 1773.

When the Mennonites of Holland in the early 17th century sang their Schriftuurlijke Liedekens less and less, using the Psalms instead, they also used Dathenus' version. The Lamist congregation in Amsterdam used them until 1684, in Haarlem until 1713, and the Zonist congregation in Amsterdam until 1762, and many other congregations until well into the 18th century. Dau, a Mennonite family name of Frisian origin, appearing in the Frisian congregations in West Prussia, first mentioned in 1598 at Montau, 1601 at Orlofferfelde. In 1776, 13 families carried this name in West Prussia (without Danzig), and in 1935 (without Elbing) 30 persons. Outside Prussia the name is hardly known. G.R.

Dauphin County, Pa. When Lancaster County was formed in 1729, Peshtank and Derry townships took in most of the present Dauphin County, which was not organized until May 4, 1785. When the Lancaster-Harris Ferry Road was laid out in 1737, many Mennonites moved into this area, among them Andrew Hershey, Felix Landis, Jr., the Nissleys, Reesers, Mummas, and Stricklers. The Stauffer congregation existed as early as 1780. The present congregations in the county are Stauffer, Shope, Strickler, and Steelton, with a total membership of 278 (1954). Noah W. Risser and Clarence E. Lutz are the bishops in charge of these churches. In addition to the local ministry, the rural congregations early were served by ministers traveling to Juniata County and points west and southwest. I.D.L.

David van Hoorn, a Dutch Anabaptist leader: see Damas of Hoorn.

David Joris (ca. 1501-56), a Dutch Anabaptist, "in a single person prophet, apocalyptic, spiritualist, and mystic" (Kühn, 271), founder of the Davidjorists (q.v.). There are various versions of his name; besides David—named thus after the Jewish king, a role which his father George (hence Georgii or Joriszoon-Joris) is said to have played in the Rederijkerskamer—also Jan, after his maternal grandfather (Jan van Brugge was his pseudonym after 1544). The rank of his parents is debated. The city of his birth is given as Delft, Brugge, and Gent. Little is known of his youth. He is said to have been weak physically, and inclined to fanaticism. In glass painting he developed great skill, but by the death of his father he was compelled to support his mother as a merchant. In this calling he traveled from Antwerp through France and England. In 1524 he married in Delft and settled there. No particulars are known about his wife, Dirkgen Willems.

The Reformation made a deep impression on Joris. The earliest of his writings and hymns preserved to us are dated 1529; they reveal unusual Scriptural knowledge. Kühn says of Joris (p. 272): "There are probably few uneducated writers who have made more versatile use of the Bible." He was bold and open in his opposition to Catholic priests, and by 1528 had suffered various severe punishments (lashing, having tongue bored through, and banishment from Delft for three years).

During his exile Joris became acquainted with the Anabaptists of Holland, and was deeply moved by their martyrdom. After some hesitation he joined them, was baptized by Obbe Philips (at Delft, about September 1534), and ordained to the ministry. The songs he wrote in 1535 and 1536 reflect the excited mood of the harassed, fugitive Anabaptist (at Pentecost in 1535 he was in Strasbourg), but are very far removed from the revolutionary spirit of Münster; "he could not sanction attacking with the sword." He openly opposed Batenburg (q.v.). After the Münster catastrophe he tried vainly to unite the various factions at a conference convening at Bocholt, August 1536.

Soon afterward, inspired by the fanatical words of Anneken Jans (q.v.) and by fantastic visions, he began to consider himself a Spirit-anointed prophet, a third David. Borne by the utmost self-confidence, he preached deepest humility and self-denial; though living in rigid asceticism, he has been charged with moral lapses. A dangerous mysticism appeared in him, which could and did, at any rate among some of his followers, lead to antinomian, libertinistic views and moral errors.

Joris, supported by friends and relatives, now devoted himself entirely to the service of the Spirit. His followers had visions which centered around him. He established a large party of his own. In January 1539, the government took definite steps against him and his party. On Feb. 21, 1539, his mother was beheaded and his family fled from Delft. Until 1544 he stayed in various hiding places in Holland, East Friesland, and Belgium, everywhere in acute danger, and everywhere winning followers, most of them among the Batenburgers after the fall of their leader in 1538, and the Münsterites. With the moderate wing of the Anabaptists he met twice, at Oldenburg and at Strasbourg. But they were becoming suspicious of him and his doctrine, whereas his own followers glorified him more and more.

Success as well as resistance strengthened Joris' consciousness of his calling as a prophet and reformer of the whole world. In 1539 he sent a bold self-defense to the court of justice in Holland, and a prophetic writing to Philip of Hesse by his messenger, Jurriaen Ketel (q.v.), enclosing a letter to the emperor and the other estates. To Countess Anna of East Friesland-Oldenburg he sent a long defense, trying to reply to 25 charges, chiefly against his personal attitude and his expectations of the future, and closing with a long mystical confession of faith. It is also known that he wrote to Luther, warning him of his self-derived wisdom and reason.

Joris considered it a dead-letter faith to treat the Bible as the sole authority. Nothing definitive could be decided by the letter in religious disputes; it was necessary to look about for the "Son," to whom alone it is revealed, and who, as Joris is said to have written for the Regensburg Disputation in 1541, was to come from the Netherlands, whose type was Egypt. Whereas on the whole the Anabaptists held to the Scriptures as a principle, Joris rejected them and made a principle of mystical experience. "To the mystic Joris historical revelation was merely a matter of the senses; his religious experience lay outside it" (Kühn, 300).

In 1542, the year he published his principal work with the characteristic title: 'tWonderboeck, waer in dat van der Werldt aen ver sloten gheopenbaert is. Wie een der Ick (secht de Heere) senden sal, ontfanght in mynen Naem, die ontfanght my; wie my ontfanght, ontfanght den die my ghesonden heeft. Hoochghelovet moet hy syn, die als een Ambassatoer gesonden komt, in den Name des Heeren, the difference between Joris and Menno Simons burst into a violent dispute. Menno had already in his Fundamentboek (1539) warned against the false prophet. Joris then attacked Menno in a fiery letter: "Gird on your sword, Menno Simons, . . . arm yourself with the most powerful Scriptural weapon! . . . Who advises you, Menno, to appear so boldly before the Lord, that you elevate yourself above all? Do say, dear man, what spirit or witness advises you to teach? Who has sent you? . . . I will show you (however firmly you may think you have it) that you do not know it, nor do you know what is truth and wisdom, except after the letter." Violently Joris attempted to make Menno recognize his divine mission; but Menno rejected "imaginations, rhetorical tricks, and other deceptions of the devil" which Joris substituted for the Gospel; he said Joris was correctly taken for the "anti-Christ, the man of sin, the son of perdition, a false prophet, murderer of souls, deceiver and falsifier of the divine truth and the commands of Christ." It was evidence of devilish pride and anti-Christian foolishness, that Joris "elevates his visions and dreams above the wisdom of the Holy Spirit, who has taught the apostles and prophets."

Without doubt Menno hit the crux of Joris' fateful error when he said, "Under the pretext of humility he promotes devilish defiance and under the name of perfection, chastity, and other virtues he promotes various vices and shameful deeds." Menno refused to carry the dispute any further.

Offended by Menno's sharp words, Joris protested in a leaflet which he tried to distribute among the Mennonites of East Friesland. For a long time Menno had difficulties with Davidjorists in his own camp; especially Blesdijk (q.v.) rose in defense of his future father-in-law, though he later deserted him.

After a violent debate between the Davidjorists and John a Lasco, the superintendent of the established church in East Friesland, principally on the subject of the authority of the new prophet, which a Lasco in spite of a tolerant nature would not grant, Joris secretly went to Basel in 1544 before the persecution against his group began in East Friesland and lived there with his family under the name of Jan van Brugge as a Reformed refugee, a wealthy and respected citizen.

Meanwhile he continued to influence his followers by innumerable letters to Holland, Belgium, Friesland, Holstein, Denmark, and other countries. His concealment he justified by the example of "Christ, who was likewise concealed in Egypt." He advised his followers against open confession; this course Menno and others called outright hypocrisy. But Joris outwardly held to the Reformed faith, lived in wealth and comfort, and at the same time preached to his followers to flee "false prophets and the wise and mighty in the world."

One remarkable feature of his teaching was his fight for unrestricted religious liberty. In Basel he wrote a petition to the Swiss cities on behalf of the "good and pious Servetus." He carried on a friendly correspondence with Schwenckfeld and Castellio, Calvin's famous opponent. On the other hand, at the end of his life he was on unfriendly terms with his own son-in-law, Blesdijk, who, formerly his warmest adherent, now became his most violent opponent.

Joris died on Aug. 25, 1556, and was buried with full honors in St. Leonard's church in Basel. But two and one-half years later quarrels within the Jorist party led to the discovery of his fraud. The family was summoned before the pastor and the magistrate; eleven men, relatives and friends, were taken to prison. A great number of books and letters, also a picture of Joris, were confiscated and given over to a learned commission for examination. The Jorist errors were compiled on the basis of Blesdijk's already published critique in eleven articles. His family claimed to know nothing of these doctrines, condemned them, and were released under certain conditions, including a public confession in church. But Joris' corpse and his books were publicly burned outside the city on May 13, 1559.

This execution, however, by no means eliminated the Davidjorists, who tried to refute Blesdijk and the Baslerites, and continued to challenge the official church and the theologians to bitter disputes. Examples are Coornhert's feud with the Davidjorists at the end of the 16th century and Ubbo Emmius's polemics against Huygelmumzoon (a pseudonym, perhaps identical with the anonymous opponent of Coornhert). In the 17th century the Davidjorists in Holstein became prominent; Moldenit and his son-in-law Jessenius wrote extensively against them. Gottfried Arnold, on the other hand, defended David Joris, and preserved extremely valuable source material in favor of the much calumniated man in his Unparteiische Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie.

The numerous writings of Joris, especially in the Basel period, and the old literature about him, are compiled in van der Linde, who has evidence of 264 religious tracts. The older literature for and against Joris contains a long series of unresolved contradictions. G.H.

R. H. Bainton, David Joris, Wiedertäufer und Kämpfer für Toleranz im 16. Jahrhundert (Arch. f. Ref.-Gesch., Texte und Untersuchungen, Ergänzungsband VI) (Leipzig, 1937) is the definitive work which supersedes all others, supplements the Joris bibliography of van der Linde, brings Nippold's bibliography up-to-date, and prints 110 pages of Joris documents. An English condensation appears in Bainton's The Travail of Religious Liberty (Phila., 1951) 125-48; P. Burckhardt, David Joris und seine Gemeinde in Basel (reprint from Basler Ztscht f. Gesch. u. Altertumskunde XLVIII, 1949, 5-106) suspects Joris guilty of bigamy; Johannes Kühn, Toleranz und Offenbarung (Leipzig, 1923) 271-301; W. J. Kühler, Geschiedenis I; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 3, 148, 203, 205, 208-10, 254, 269, 277, 309, 443, 767-70; Fr. Nippold, "David Joris, sein Leben, seine Lehre und seine Sekte," in Ztscht f. d. hist. Theol., 1863 and 1864; Gottfried Arnold, Unparteiische Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie (Frankfurt, 1699. B. XVI. C. XXI. 44 ff.); P. Burchhardt, David Joris, in Basler Biographien I, 1900; Biogr. Wb. IV, 575-82; ML II, 433-35.

Davidjorists, the followers of David Joris, must have been very numerous in the Netherlands. In 1539 a group of Davidjorist Anabaptists were put to death at Delft (q.v.), where David Joris himself had lived and been an elder. In this town followers of David Joris were still found in 1544 and even in 1596 traces of Davidjorism existed here. Elsewhere Davidjorism was also spread widely. In 1587 it was said that in the province of Overijssel the followers of David Joris were rapidly increasing (DB 1911, 40). They lasted until the 17th century (Ned. Archief v. Kerkgeschiedenis II, 1903, 272; Biogr. Wb. I, 310 f.).

Some martyrs, though included in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, were Davidjorists, for example, Anneken Jans (q.v.), executed in 1539, and Maria and Ursula van Beckum (q.v.), executed in 1544. In 1544 Jurriaen Ketel (q.v.), an ardent disciple of David Joris, who had edited his books, was put to death at Deventer. It seems that the Davidjorists were very active during this time, for in many records mention is made of their activity. In those records they are often called Davidjorists or Batenburgers, as for example the notorious Münsterite leader Cornelis Appelman (q.v.). (See Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 265.) The identification of Davidjorists with Batenburgers is, however, wrong. Davidjorists, like David Joris himself, were averse to violence; the Batenburgers were not. The principles of the Davidjorists were the same as those of their leader; they were not loyal to the strict principles of Christian discipleship, which often resulted in suffering and martyrdom, and avoided "the oppression and affliction because of the Word of the Lord." As Menno Simons summarizes, they tolerated dissembling with the world in order to live safely (Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 219-29). The accusation that they were as a group libertinists and guilty of sexual immorality has not been proved, though some Davidjorists confessed to horrible debauches (Brandt, Historie der Reformatie, 1677, 134), and though there are a few cases of conjugal disloyalty among the Davidjorists. David van der Leyen (or Verleyen), an Anabaptist martyr, who was executed with Levina Ghyselius (q.v.) at Gent, Belgium, on Feb. 14, 1554, by burning at the stake. The first information we have about these two martyrs is found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren (1562) where they are celebrated in a song (No. 7) beginning: "Ghy Christen al te samen, bereyt u tot ten strijt" (You Christians all together, prepare for the conflict). It is also included by Wolkan. Another song about David and Levina is found in the Nieu Liedtboecxken (1562 and later editions): "Och Heere ic moet u claghen" (Oh Lord, I must complain to Thee), also found in Wackernagel. The later accounts including that of the Martyrs' Mirror, are prose adaptations of these songs. The Liedtboecxken song says that David was a young man who firmly confessed his faith and steadfastly suffered all vexations both of body and mind, and that after the fire had gone out, David was miraculously still alive.

Many members of the van der Leyen family at Gent were suspected of heresy and some of them died as martyrs: Tanneken (q.v.) on Aug. 27, 1555, at Antwerp; Franchois (q.v.) on April 28, 1558, at Gent; Laureys (q.v.) on Nov. 8, 1559, at Antwerp. According to an old chronicle of Gent David's father was also a Mennonite, but because he was dangerously ill, the count gave up further persecution. The noted von der Leyen (q.v.) family of Crefeld does not stem from the Flemish van der Leyens, as has sometimes been asserted. vdZ.

Daviess County (Ind.) Old Order Amish Mennonite Settlement, near Montgomery, began in 1868. Bishop Jacob Graber came from Allen Co., Ind., and the families of Isaac Yoder and Daniel Gingerich came from Wayne Co., Ohio. Deacon John Wagler, formerly from Germany, moved to Montgomery from Wellesley, Ont., and Jackson Knepp came from Hickory Co., Mo.

The first ministers in the church were Jacob Graber, bishop; John Graber, Peter Stoll, Joseph Gingerich, ministers; and John Wagler, deacon. Succeeding bishops who served were Joseph Wittmer, Peter Wagler, and Amos Yoder. The latter moved to Defiance County, Ohio, in 1943. In 1955 the settlement consisted of five church districts with two bishops serving, namely, Amos Wittmer and John L. Graber, and a membership of 400.

The Berea Mennonite Church (MC), organized in 1921, largely of Amish, had 230 members in 1955. Amos Weldy, a Mennonite deacon of Nappanee, Ind., was influential in organizing the congregation, and Edd Shrock serves as elder. In 1948 a group of the Old Order Amish Mennonites organized the Odon congregation of the "Beachy Amish" type and built a meetinghouse. Their ministers are Jacob Gingerich, William Yoder, and Ben Wagler; the 1955 membership was 165. J.W.

Davis County, Iowa. Amish Mennonites settled in this southern Iowa county in 1854. In 1892 their one congregation, Pulaski (q.v.), became affiliated with the General Conference Mennonite Church. In 1955 it had 125 members. M.G.

Davlekanovo, cultural and economic center of the former Mennonite settlement in the Russian province of Ufa, located between the Volga and the Ural Mountains on the Dyoma.

The first Mennonites settled near Davlekanovo about 1890, coming from South Russia and from Samara, the province adjoining Ufa. In 1893 there was already a small congregation in Gortchakovo (q.v.), which by 1914 had grown to several hundred members. At Berezovka (q.v.) another congregation was organized, which had a Mennonite school with a boarding house for poor children (Armenschule) and a large church in which general harvest festivals, song services, missionary meetings, etc., were held. More and more families settled alone or in small groups on separate farms (Khutor) around Davlekanovo at the beginning of the 20th century; others formed villages (Karanbash, Morozovka, Udryak, Golyshevo, etc.). Some of the isolated farms were the scene of violent attacks by robbers, who wiped out entire families.

About 1900 some Mennonite families settled in the Russian Tatar village of Davlekanovo. which was situated on the railroad. In a few years two fairly large congregations were organized here, one each of the Mennonite Church and the Mennonite Brethren. A seven-class Zentralschule for boys and girls developed under the leadership of Franz C. Thiessen and J. P. Perk into a nine-class secondary school, attended by about 200 Mennonite students, and in 20 years became a cultural center for the entire settlement around Davlekanovo.

Until the outbreak of World War I the colony enjoyed an extraordinary economic growth. Several large mills powered by steam or water power, business houses and warehouses, factories and shops were owned by Mennonites. Until the Revolution of 1917 half of the village bore a German and Mennonite character with its large school, church, and many beautiful homes surrounded by thriving gardens.

The war and the Revolution brought catastrophe to the prosperous Mennonite settlement. Repeatedly hordes of the "Reds" and the "Whites" flowed through the settlement, plundering and finally communizing the enterprises. In 1920 and the following year many villagers fell victim to starvation and typhus. In 1923-25 numerous families emigrated to the United States and Canada, while others were banished to North Russia or to Siberia. To avoid compulsory collectivization many fled in 1929 and reached Moscow, but the larger part of them were forcibly transported back to the East. Very few were able to return to Davlekanovo. Since the beginning of World War II (1939) there has been no word from the settlement. G.H.

In addition to the Armenschule, founded by Jacob Martens, an evangelist, Karl Friedrichsen, a teacher in the Zentralschule, operated a small Bible School in 1923-26 (see Mayak Bible School). In 1926 the Mennonite population was 1,831, distributed over 19 "villages" and estates, farming nearly 30,000 acres of land. (See also Davlekanovo Mennonite Church. For the Davlekanovo M.B. Church, see Gortchakovo Mennonite Brethren Church.) C.K.

Davlekanovo Mennonite Church, Ufa, Russia, also called the "Ufimer" Church, was founded in 1898, and in 1905 had a membership of 153 with a total population of 401. The leading minister at that time was Gerhard Dyck, leader since 1902. Other ministers were Jakob Gerbrandt (q.v.) and F. F. Martens. The latter was ordained minister in 1909 and later as elder. Karl Friedrichsen (q.v.), who for a number of years operated the Davlekanovo Bible School (see Mayak Bible School), was also a minister of the congregation. (See also Davlekanovo Mennonite Settlement.) C.K.

Davlekanovo Mennonite Settlement, province of Ufa, Russia, near the Ural Mountains, was established near the station Davlekanovo on the Samara-Ufa railroad about 1894 by individual Mennonites who purchased large tracts of land and established large farms there. Although the settlement was not divided into the customary villages, groups of the landowners settled around the places named Karanbash, Golyshevo, Urtau-Tau, Gortchakovo, Berezovka, and Kulikovo. Some of the large estate owners were Tiessen, Reimer, Dyck, Martens, and Neufeld. Soon some Mennonites settled in and near the town of Davlekanovo and there established businesses such as agriculture machinery, a co-operative, and flour mills. Davlekanovo also had a Zentralschule and later a Bible school. In Berezovka was located a "school for the poor" (Armenschule), founded by Jacob Martens, an evangelist of the community. In 1926 the Mennonite population was 1,831, distributed over 19 "villages" and estates, farming nearly 30,000 acres of land (Der Praktische Landwirt, May 1926, p. 2). Little information is available pertaining to the beginning and the final phases of the settlement. Davlekanovo Zentralschule, Russian province of Ufa, opening in the fall of 1908, was founded by the brothers K. G. and G. G. Neufeld. The former took charge of the administration and was its first principal and one of its first two teachers, while G. G. Neufeld organized a society for its financial support. The Davlekanovo Zentralschule was a new type of secondary school among the Mennonites of Russia. Although its curriculum was similar to that of other Mennonite Zentralschulen, it differed from them in the composition of its student body. All the other Zentralschulen had only boys as students, and girls attended separate schools. Before 1870, to be sure, a few girls had been admitted to the Zentralschulen, but then the school authorities and the Committee for Public Welfare (Fürsorgekomitee) prohibited this practice. This was thus the first truly coeducational Zentralschule in the history of Mennonite education in Russia. After a few years of operation this type of school was not only approved by the parents of its immediate constituency, but schools in other parts of the country followed its example. The Davlekanovo Zentralschule had students, Mennonite and Lutheran, from several parts of Russia, but chiefly from the provinces of Ufa and Samara and from Siberia. It had the usual four-year course, to which a teachers' training course was added. Since this school also had an elementary school connected with it, the teaching staff usually consisted of 8 to 10 teachers. Among these teachers were F. C. Thiessen, D. P. Enns, G. J. Gaede, and Karl Friedrichsen. J. P. Rogalsky of the present (1953) Tabor College faculty was connected with this school from its very start until his departure to the United States in 1922. Dax, Leonhard, a Hutterite preacher, a native of Munich, was a Catholic priest for 15 years, his last office being in Tschengels (Tirol). Attracted by the moral earnestness and loyalty of the Anabaptists, he joined them in 1558. He was present at the execution of Hans Mändl (q.v.). In Moravia, at Nemschitz near Prälitz, he was ordained to the ministry by the Hutterian Brethren in 1564, and in 1567 was sent to the Palatinate to visit the brethren there. Early in November he was arrested for his work of evangelization and detained through the winter with his wife and other Anabaptist men and women in the castle prison at Alzey. The Calvinist superintendent, probably Gerrit Dircks Versteghe (q.v.), cross-examined him repeatedly, and Dax defended his faith with skill, resisting all attempts to convert him to the Reformed faith. He boldly voiced his opposition to the use of force in matters of faith. He could not be moved by threats or bribes, and declared to the astonished superintendent, "I am ready not only to defend my faith and God's pious people with words, but also to suffer death for them." On Feb. 25, 1568, they were all released. Dax kept a record of his disputation with the city pastor of Alzey, manuscript copies of which are found in the libraries at Gran, Pressburg, Olmütz, and Budapest. An extract from it is printed in Sammlung für die Geschichte, vornehmlich zur Kirchen- und Gelehrtengeschichte (Nördlingen, 1779) 380-99. Dax died Aug. 4, 1574, at Dämberschitz (q.v.) in Moravia.

The account of the imprisonment of Dax as found in the Hutterite chronicle (Zieglschmid, Chronik, 424 f.) states that Dax also wrote several hymns. These have, however, not been found. HEGE.

Dayton (Ohio) United Missionary Church began in 1896 as a mission appointment. After the flood of 1913, the church was established at its present location, East Fourth and McGee streets. In 1952 the congregation had 127 members, with Forest L. Huffman serving as pastor. M.G.

Deacon, a direct derivative of the N.T. Greek word diakonos meaning minister or servant, used in Phil. 1:1, and I Tim. 3:8-13, where Paul states the qualifications for the office. Although Acts 6:2-5 does not use the title of deacon, it marks the beginning of the office of deacon in the early church. In later church history and modern Protestantism, particularly in the Anglican and other hierarchical churches, the office often became merely the lowest order of the clergy, whereas in the Anabaptist-Mennonite groups of both Swiss and Dutch origin the office was primarily one of caring for the poor and needy of the congregation and had to do largely with the material side. Hence the titles have been Armendiener or (Dutch) Armendienaer (minister to the poor), and Almosenpfleger (keeper of the alms). In Reformation times, however, both Lutheran and Reformed movements established the office of deacon as that of minister to the poor, the needy, and often the sick as well.

The early Anabaptist-Mennonite movement universally established the office of deacon as an important ordained office and thus created a threefold ministerial order; namely, bishop or elder, preacher or minister, and deacon. This threefold ministry has been maintained by all the groups in Europe except in Holland and Northwest Germany, as well as by the more conservative groups in America, particularly the Mennonite Church (MC), the Amish groups of all kinds, the conservative groups of Russian extraction, and the German-speaking groups of the General Conference. In the General Conference (GCM) English-speaking churches, the Mennonite Brethren of both English and German language usage, and the smaller groups such as Evangelical Mennonites, Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, and Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, the pattern of the one-pastor, one-order ministry is gradually being established. In Northwest Germany (Hamburg, Crefeld, Emden, etc.) the one-order ministry has long been established, and the deacon office dropped; but here in compensation the unordained office of Vorsteher (chairman of the congregation) has become very important.

The Concept of Cologne (1591) states: "Deacons shall be chosen according to the example of the Apostolic Church, to whom is to be assigned the care of the poor. They are to distribute to the poor the gifts received for this purpose, so that the giver shall remain unknown, as Christ teaches." Other Anabaptist-Mennonite confessions always mention and emphasize the office of deacon, down to modern times. For instance, the West Prussian Confession of 1895 says: "We also hold fast to the Apostolic arrangement according to which, along side of elders and preachers, deacons or alms-keepers (Almosenpfleger) are maintained in the church, who support the poor through the alms which are given by generous hearts, supply the wants of needy members, practice mercy with gladness, and otherwise lend a helping hand in the church in order that it may be well administered." The catechism (Lehrbüchlein, 1878) of the Badischer Verband makes similar statements about the deacon office and adds that he is to support the elders and preachers in their work and to share with them in the discipline (Zucht und Ordnung) of the church.

In the Netherlands the development of the deacon's office was as follows: The Waterlanders (q.v.) decided in 1568 (DB 1877, 71) that the preachers (vermaner) should also take care of the poor, but the deacons, if they should have the gift of speaking, should also preach, while the preachers should be chosen from among the deacons. Thus by 1568 the threefold ministry no longer existed in its strictest sense among the Waterlanders. In the 17th century it was not maintained by any of the Dutch Mennonites, except among the most conservative Jan Jacobs group (q.v.) and the Groningen and Danzig Old Flemish (q.v.), among whom it lasted until the middle of the 18th century. In both Lamist and Zonist congregations all members of the church board were called deacons (diaken), and the care of the poor has generally been a matter to be discussed and resolved by the entire church board, except in a few larger congregations like Haarlem and Amsterdam. Only in a limited number of congregations are the deacon's funds now separately administered; in most congregations there is only one treasury, from which all expenses of the church, such as the minister's salary, repair of the meetinghouse, etc., are paid, as well as the payments to the poor.

All American Mennonite groups officially maintain the office of deacon, though not every congregation actually has a deacon. Earlier all deacons were ordained, and served for life, the number of deacons varying with the size of the congregation. Now, in some cases, particularly in the General Conference (GCM) congregations, deacons are elected for short terms, and not ordained, and several (often three) serve together. The Central Conference (formerly Central Illinois), which merged with the General Conference in 1949, has always had only elected deacons, usually three in number.

The work of the deacon is much the same in all groups and includes (1) service to the poor and needy members, including usually the administration of the poor fund or alms monies, (2) assisting the bishop or pastor in the administration of the ordinances of baptism and communion (the deacon usually provides the bread and wine or grape juice), as well as providing the arrangements for footwashing, (3) assisting the bishop or pastor in visiting the sick and erring members, as well as helping to overcome or arbitrate difficulties between members, serving on the ministerial council of the congregation in matters of church activities and discipline, (4) reading the opening Scripture lesson and offering the opening prayer at the regular worship services, as may be directed by the minister in charge, and having charge of the entire service in the absence of the minister. Among the Old Order Amish as well as certain other groups of Amish background the deacon may preach on invitation, and frequently does, but in most groups he is not allowed to preach. In the eastern districts of the Mennonite (MC) Church, the deacon is often a very influential and weighty official, where it is commonly held that the bishop and deacon shall take care of church discipline, while the preachers only preach. In some congregations the deacon maintains the church membership record. In some groups the office of deacon is in a transition period and the older patterns are changing somewhat. (ML I, 433.) . NEFF, H.S.B.

Deaconess, the office in the Christian Church committed to women for the alleviation of physical and spiritual need, especially in the care of the sick. It is of apostolic origin. In Rom. 16:1 we read: "I commend unto you Phebe our sister, which is a servant of the church which is at Cenchrea." It is possible that Phebe's service was a voluntary work of charity. But I Tim. 5:9, 10 shows that the early church chose women for church service: "Let not a widow be taken into the number under threescore years old, having been the wife of one man, well reported of for good works; if she have brought up children, if she have lodged strangers, if she have washed the saints' feet, if she have relieved the afflicted, if she have diligently followed every good work."

Among the Anabaptists the deaconess office was always based on the apostolic pattern. Elisabeth Dirks (q.v.), the martyr of Leeuwarden, was a deaconess (de Hoop Scheffer in Menn. Bl., 1886, 74). The Dordrecht Confession of April 1632, Art. 9, Section 5 says, "Also that honorable old widows be ordained and chosen as servants, who besides the almoners, are to visit, comfort, and take care of the poor, the weak, the afflicted, and the needy, as also to visit, comfort, and take care of widows and orphans; and further to assist in taking care of any matters in the church that properly come within their sphere, according to their best ability."

In several Dutch Mennonite congregations the office of deaconess has been preserved from the beginning, e.g., at Sneek (DB 1890, 112; Th. Schäfer, Weibliche Diakonie, 289 ff.). In most congregations it continued until the middle of the 19th century. Barclay reports that the Amsterdam congregation had a deaconess and three deacons, all about 60 years old. "She visited the sick and the feeble, especially the women, and when necessary provided girls to stay with them and help them and if they were poor she furnished support given by those who could afford it, or reported it to the deacons, and she was obeyed as a mother in Israel and a servant of Jesus Christ." This institution influenced the Brownists, the Plymouth Brethren, and other English Independents, as well as the entire modern deaconess system. In the Amsterdam Mennonite Church there are five deaconesses, one of whom retires each year and is not eligible for reappointment for five years. They are appointed by the church board. In former times only married women or widows could be appointed to this office. In recent years two may be unmarried. The term "Mother-Deaconess" is still very commonly used. Similar arrangements exist in other Dutch Mennonite churches, as Haarlem and Utrecht. Among the deaconesses there are some who have had training for this vocation.

The German Mennonite churches also had the office of deaconess for a long time. Gerhard Roosen (q.v.), the noted preacher of the Hamburg-Altona Mennonite Church, wrote that his grandmother, Rischen Quins (d. 1626), was a deaconess in the congregation for many years during her widowhood; the last deaconess of the congregation was Mayken Govens (d. 1672), the widow of Hans Govens. In Danzig the office was maintained even later; the Flemish church almost always had a deaconess. The widow Magdalena von Kampen, who was appointed as deaconess in 1788 and served until her death (1810), was the last congregational deaconess among the Mennonites of Germany. The small size of the congregations in South Germany apparently made the office of deaconess unnecessary among them; wherever there is today an active deaconess service, it is patterned after the Fliedner institutions.

The idea frequently found in Mennonite circles that Fliedner (q.v.) became acquainted with the office of deaconess among the Dutch Mennonites and simply adopted it is false. When he visited the Amsterdam church to raise funds he became acquainted with a deaconess system that had nearly died out, and was thereby inspired to establish his deaconess system, which developed into a flourishing institution. He wrote, "There are in the Dutch Mennonite churches still some deaconesses who are chosen by the church board, work under it, and are engaged in the care of poor women. They visit the cottages of the poor, distribute the clothing given for that purpose, help the girls get positions as maids. Neither they nor the deacons receive a salary, and are members of the most respected families in the congregation, and therein subject themselves to great sacrifice of time, etc., with great willingness. This laudable primitively Christian institution should be imitated by other Protestant faiths." But Fliedner's creation was something quite different from the Biblical-Mennonite institution of deaconess. Not the single congregation, but in a sense all Protestantism became the bearer of this work of charity. He organized large associations and established "mother houses" to give a thorough training for this vocation. It was imitated on every hand, and everywhere new mother houses arose. In 1836 at Kaiserswerth, Fliedner founded the first modern deaconess home. In 1921 there were over 100 such homes, with about 20,000 deaconesses. These deaconess houses bear a denominational stamp. As a rule the sisters take communion in their own mother houses and remain closely attached to them. The conditions set by the deaconess union at Herborn (district of Wiesbaden) with its seat at Berlin, are freer. Its purpose is to provide women without a vocation with vocational training and sure employment for life, thereby also promoting deaconess service. The only qualification for admission is membership in a Protestant church (Menn. Bl., 1894, 60 ff.).

In Germany the Baden Verband instituted deaconess service among the Mennonites in 1904. While a Mennonite girl was in training in Kaiserswerth in 1894, the publisher of the Gemeindeblatt, Ulrich Hege, issued a suggestion that a Mennonite deaconess home be established. This suggestion was never carried out, and the sister in question went to America. Ten years later the matter was presented to the Aeltestenrat of the Verband. In March 1904 it was decided to look for a deaconess home that would be suitable for a Mennonite girl to receive training for the work. The deaconess homes in Strasbourg, Speyer, and Karlsruhe all made very favorable replies. The last of these was chosen, because there were already friendly relations between this house and the Mennonites of the Verband and because it was more centrally located. By 1918 six others had received their training there and then served in the hospital at Kochendorf, having lived for six years in Lautenbach near Neckarsulm. With Kochendorf as a center they served in all the South German Mennonite congregations, wherever they were called. They continued to return to the mother house in Karlsruhe when they were needed there and could be spared at home. Two sisters also helped with the nursing of wounded soldiers behind the front in World War I. The management of the work was in the hands of a committee of five brethren. Funds to carry on the work were contributed. No charge was made for nursing care, though the family served, if able to do so, made a contribution.

Since the Kochendorf hospital could not give the sisters a permanent home, the Verband in 1919 bought a house in Böckingen near Heilbronn as a home for retired sisters. But because of the great shortage in residences, only two sisters had been able to make their home there up to 1921. Later the deaconess work was transferred to the Bibelheim Thomashof near Karlsruhe. The Deaconess Committee still functions, although it has remained much restricted because of the small number of candidates.

In 1931 the Bavarian Mennonite relief organization Christenpflicht (q.v.), having received a house in Regensburg for the purpose of deaconess service, established a Mennonite deaconess work there with Sister Elise Hochstetler in charge, under the supervision of the Hensoltshöhe (Middle Franconia) mother house. Because of a lack of Mennonite candidates this work never developed.

The Mennonites of Russia founded a deaconess home of their own called Morija (q.v.) in Neu-Halbstadt in the Molotschna settlement in the Ukraine. It was a private undertaking and was built primarily with the funds furnished by Peter Schmidt of Steinbach. It was supported by voluntary contributions. It was opened on Dec. 3, 1909, for the purpose of training deaconesses and supporting them in sickness and old age. As long as they remained in the association they received their education free of charge and were provided with all other necessities (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 659; II, 96). By 1918, 89 sisters had been received. The Revolution brought them a time of suffering; the house was completely plundered. Nevertheless precisely in that time they were able to render a great service in the epidemics and other sicknesses accompanying the disturbances (record of the Bundeskonferenz held at Lichtenau on June 30 to July 2, 1918, p. 21). Deaconess work among the Mennonites of America represents the continuation of a practice among the Mennonites of Russia and had its origin among the General Conference Mennonites in the United States with the work of David Goerz of Newton, Kan. He read a paper before the General Conference in South Dakota in 1890 in which he warmly advocated the deaconess work as a branch of home missions. In 1893, the General Conference in Ohio discussed the subject again, and the Board of Home Missions received instructions from the conference to further the cause. In 1898, the Bethesda Hospital was erected at Goessel, Kan., and in the next year the conference advised that if local conditions in any community within the conference became acute, the community should act as it seemed best. Bethesda Hospital assumed the responsibility of inaugurating deaconess work.

In 1900 Frieda Kaufman (q.v.) offered herself to Elder David Goerz as a candidate for the deaconess cause. He arranged to have her enter Bethel College for preparatory study. In 1901 Bethel College made the deaconess cause a part of its program, intending to establish or affiliate with a deaconess institution. In 1902 the Board of Directors of Bethel College made arrangements for deaconess candidates to continue their education for specific service at the interdenominational Deaconess Hospital in Cincinnati, Ohio, entering Frieda Kaufman as their first candidate. The following year Martha Richert enrolled in the same institution. In 1905 Catherine Voth was accepted as a candidate and also entered the Deaconess Hospital for a course in nursing. In the same year Ida Epp entered the Evangelical Deaconess Home and Hospital in St. Louis, Mo. Upon completing the two-year course in nursing, Martha Richert was ordained by Elder Peter Balzer as a parish deaconess in the Alexanderwohl church near Goessel. She served that community as well as the Bethesda Hospital until 1907 when she was married and, with her husband, Elder P. A. Penner, went as a missionary to India. Sister Frieda Kaufman, Sister Catherine Voth, and Sister Ida Epp were ordained when the Bethel Deaconess Hospital was dedicated June 11, 1908. They were the first three deaconesses of this mother house.

Since that time, 62 sisters have become members of the Bethel Deaconess sisterhood, 26 of whom are associated with the sisterhood at the present time. The deaconesses of this institution wear a special garb and are ordained by the church. Each sister has her place in the mother house, receives full maintenance, a monthly allowance, an annual vacation, and a vacation allowance. She is expected to remain loyal and faithful to her calling but does not take an oath of celibacy. Should a deaconess change her mind, believing it to be God's will that she serve in some other sphere apart from the sisterhood, she presents her resignation and receives an honorable discharge.

The Mennonite Deaconess Hospital in Beatrice, Neb., was dedicated July 16, 1911. Sister Elise Hirschler and Sister Maria Wedel, deaconesses of the Western District Conference, and Sister Katie Penner were the first deaconesses to serve here. Other deaconess candidates have furthered their education here and have been ordained by the Mennonite Church. Seven deaconesses serve in the Mennonite Deaconess Home and Hospital in Beatrice at present.

The Salem Home and Hospital in Hillsboro, Kan., was founded by the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Conference in 1918. Several sisters had served as parish deaconesses prior to this but were transferred to the hospital when it was completed. A number of candidates entered for preparatory work and were ordained as deaconesses. They served in the hospital and in the home for aged. The school for both sisters and nurses has been discontinued. In the fall of 1937, the last two of the deaconesses active in the hospital left the work. Two sisters have continued in the Salem Home for the Aged at Hillsboro, Kan.

Not all deaconesses of the General Conference Mennonite churches are members of a sisterhood or serve in institutions. There are also a considerable number of congregational deaconesses without special training who do not wear a garb and who are elected rather than ordained. The Eighth Street Mennonite Church of Goshen, Ind., has three deaconesses with duties corresponding to those of a deacon. In the constitution adopted in 1947, their duties are stated as assisting the pastor in caring for the spiritual welfare of the church and the observance of the communion. The deacons and the deaconesses together with the pastor comprise the spiritual council of the church.

The appointment of deaconesses in the Mennonite Church (MC) varies considerably, although very few congregations have deaconesses. The purpose of female servants in the church has been one of good works and counseling rather than of exhortation in the church services. In certain areas, deaconesses are elected by the congregation, in others the church council gives a charge privately, and still in others the work of a deaconess is assumed without any official commission. Also the pledge of loyalty and helpfulness which is required of a deacon's or minister's wife at her husband's ordination has been regarded by some as a commission to the services of deaconess work. In no case is a congregational deaconess in this church given support. Her service is not regarded as a full-time occupation. There is no record of organized deaconess institutions in this Mennonite group. However, the Virginia Conference has had some deaconesses. L.M.S.

Dechtitz (Magyar, Dejte), a village in Hungary, where Hutterites expelled from Moravia settled in the 17th century. Their Bruderhof was ruined on Sept. 3, 1663, by Turkish troops; 35 inmates, mostly women, were carried away and some were killed. In the spring of 1664 the Bruderhof was ravaged by imperial troops, so that nothing was left to sustain life. In consequence of the continued molestation by soldiers in the summer and autumn they had to leave their desolate home. On Aug. 15 and 16, 1683, it was reduced to ashes by Turks and Tatars. Descendants of the Anabaptists who remained are still living in Dechtitz; they are Catholics. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 427, 508, 517, and 541; ML I, 397.) HEGE.

Deck, Ulrich, an Anabaptist of Waldshut, Germany: see Teck, Ulrich.

Decker (Dekker) is a Mennonite and Hutterite family name of Old Flemish background in West Prussia. It was first mentioned at Schönsee (Sosnovka) in 1695. From here it spread to Poland and Russia. The name is now found among American Mennonites of Polish and Hutterite background. The Klein-Geschichtsbuch (ed. Zieglschmid, 1947, 369) gives a brief account of how the Deckers joined the Hutterites. In 1783, two Hutterite brethren from Russia visited the Mennonites in Prussia, and were well received by Elder Gerhard Wiebe of Ellerwald (q.v.). From there they traveled along the Vistula to visit Abraham Nickel, deacon of the Schönsee Mennonite Church (now Poland). It was at this place that 15 Mennonites joined the Hutterite delegation to unite with their community at Vishenka, Russia. Among these 15 was Els Decker, a widow with five small children. The Klein-Geschichtsbuch mentions particularly Benjamin Decker as a member of a delegation to the authorities in Odessa, petitioning for more land (about 1842). When the Hutterian Brethren began their emigration to the United States in 1874, a Johann Decker is named among the first group to leave Russia. These people then settled in South Dakota, known there as the Schmiedeleut Hutterites. Today (1955) David Dekker, a grandson of Johann D., is the Vorsteher of the Tschetter Bruderhof, Mount Olivet, S.D., which is also the home of four other Dekker families (Michel, Paul, Jacob, Joseph). Another Dekker family was among the pioneers of the Old Elmspring Colony (q.v.), founded by the Lehrer-Leut Hutterites. A Samuel Dekker is preacher at Rock Lake Colony, Alta. R.F.

Deenik M.Lzn., Albertus Agathus, a Dutch Mennonite pastor, b. 1835 at Haarlem, d. 1903 at Veenwouden, Friesland. After finishing his studies at the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam, he served for nearly 40 years in the congregations of Ternaard (1860-81) and Stavoren-Molkwerum (1881-99). He had a weak constitution, which made it impossible for him to serve larger congregations; but though a minister of two small churches, he had some influence through his publications, which appeared in a number of Dutch periodicals. He was editor of a popular religious periodical, 1868-72, De Nieuwe Richting in het Leven, bladen ter godsdienstige Volksontwikkeling. From the beginning he was an ardent champion of Liberalism, with a tendency to radicalism. He translated publications of radical French and German theologians into the Dutch language: e.g., E. Renan's Life of Jesus (1863), and D. F. Strauss, The Old and the New Faith (n.d.). In addition to a number of theological books, he also translated a large number of German and English novels. (De Zondagsbode, XVI [1903] No. 50; Biogr. Wb. II, 404 f.) VDZ.

Deenik, Marc Leonard, a Dutch Mennonite pastor, son of the former, b. at Ternaard, Friesland, Dec. 9, 1865, d. at Leeuwarden, Aug. 4, 1947, educated at Amsterdam (university and Mennonite seminary), served the congregations of Irnsum-Poppingawier in 1893-97, and Leeuwarden in 1897-1931. Like his father he was by principle a liberal; he played an important part among the Freemasons of the Netherlands. Among the Mennonites he was a very influential man, especially in the province of Friesland, where he was secretary of the Friesche Doopsgezinde Sociëteit (Mennonite Conference of Friesland) from 1899 to June 5, 1941. Through his thorough knowledge of Mennonites and his keen interest in Mennonite congregational life he was very helpful to many congregations in Friesland, especially the small ones, for whom he was a fatherly adviser. After he retired, he lived in Leeuwarden till his death. VDZ.

Deep Creek (Va.) Mennonite Church (MC) is located near the village of Grossfield, in Norfolk County. The congregation is largely a result of recent colonization to this area. Land was purchased for a church in 1937, which was dedicated on Feb. 12, 1939. The congregation is a member of the Virginia Conference. In 1954 it had a membership of 102, with Eli Kramer as pastor. H.A.B.

Deep Run Mennonite Church (MC), the oldest Mennonite congregation in Bucks Co., Pa., is located near Bedminster and is affiliated with the Franconia Mennonite Conference. The original log building erected in 1746 was also used as a school until it was razed in 1842. One of the preachers, Samuel Godshalk, was an influential teacher and music instructor in this school. Deep Run has ever since had a strong group of choristers who have left their impress upon congregational singing. Later meetinghouses were erected at the same location in 1842, 1872, and 1949.

The first preacher and bishop at Deep Run was Abraham Swartz, who served over 50 years. Deep Run, being the oldest of the circuit of three Bucks County congregations, has always been the meeting place for the small conference (Kleine Rath) held each spring before the regular conference (Grosse Rath) held at Franconia. It has the distinction of being the only Mennonite Church in the Franconia Conference holding services every Sunday as early as 1847.

Sunday school was not organized until 1904. The German language was continued in services, although English had been introduced much earlier, until the death of John Leatherman in 1925. The Oberholtzer schism of 1847 took some 50 or 60 members, who organized a congregation bearing the same name (q.v.) and built a meetinghouse only a short distance from the old meetinghouse. In 1927 a number of members joined an independent group. Though in its earlier history the congregation suffered because of its slowness to change, more recently its leadership has encouraged youth and extension activities. The membership (1955) of 376 is served by pastors Wilson Overholt, Erwin Nace, and Abram Yothers. (J. C. Wenger, Hist. of the Menn. of the Franconia Conf., Telford, Pa., 1937.) Q.L.

Deep Run Mennonite Church (GCM) of the Eastern District Conference is located in Bedminster Twp., Bucks Co., Pa. At the time of the 1847 division in the Franconia Conference, a group at Deep Run withdrew from the old congregation in 1847 or 1848, but did not organize until May 14, 1849. Its charter, which fixes the official name of the congregation as the Mennonite Society of Deep Run and Plumstead, amended in 1913 and 1950, remains to the present day as the constitution of the congregation. Locally the congregation is known as the "New Mennonite" Church to distinguish it from the original Deep Run Mennonite (MC) Church. In the summer of 1849 the present brick meetinghouse was built near the meetinghouse of the original congregation. An addition was made to it in 1949.

Known ministers and their terms of service are: Martin Fretz, 1849-51; Joseph D. Rosenberger, ca. 1851-70; Enos F. Loux, ca. 1851-ca. 65; Jacob S. Moyer, 1871-83; Allen M. Fretz, 1883-1943; Russel Mast, 1940-45; Herbert Fretz, 1945-53; Claude Boyer, 1953- .

The present Sunday school was organized about 1876, and in 1892 a Christian Endeavor was organized. The membership in 1849 was about 60, in 1899 it was 140, and in 1954 it was 244. The common names today are Myers, Moyer, Mill, Fretz, Wasser, Wismer, Hunsberger, Charles, and Derstine. J.H.F.

Deer Creek (Okla.) Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Western District Conference. It was organized on Aug. 22, 1899, by Mennonite pioneers in the settlement of the Cherokee strip which was opened in 1893. The first settlers came from Halstead and Moundridge, Kan., and Donnellson, Iowa, and were mostly of South German background. Some of the common names are Stauffer, Dester, Krehbiel, Hohmann, Goebel, and Lichti.

The group first worshiped in a schoolhouse; it built its first church in 1902, and enlarged it in 1931. On Nov. 30, 1952, a new church was dedicated. The congregation was organized by Elder Wilhelm Galle and the first minister was Chr. H. Goebel, followed by M. S. Moyer, J. C. Peters, F. M. Moyer, J. Lichti, Richard Ratzlaff, Carl Landis, and W. G. Unrau (1954). In 1920 the congregation had a membership of 72 and in 1954, 128. Most of the 40 or more families live within a radius of five miles of town, and approximately 25 per cent live in town. (ML I, 390; Menn. Weekly Review, Jan. 1953, 4.) E.A.D.

Defiance County (Ohio) Old Order Amish Settlement, located near Hicksville and Mark Center, originated in March 1914, when 12 families of Sugarcreek, Ohio, moved in; their names were Schrock, Barkman, Mullet, Yoder, Miller, Coblentz, and Kurtz. The 1954 membership was 67. A congregation was organized in April 1914, and Bishop Moses A. Coblentz served as the only preacher for one year. Succeeding bishops were John Bontrager, David S. Bontreger, and (1954) Amos Yoder.

A Conservative Amish Mennonite congregation was organized by members leaving the Old Order Amish in 1922, led by Bishop John Bontrager and Deacon John F. Helmuth. Their number was increased by families from Allen Co., Ind. After four years the congregation was dissolved, and the members moved to other states.

In 1944 a "Beachy Amish" church was organized by members of the Old Order Amish congregation with the aid of Bishop David Burkholder of Nappanee, Ind. It was dissolved two years later, many of its members having moved to other states. J.A.H.

De Kalb County, Ind., located on the Ohio line near the northeast corner of the state, was first settled in 1833 and organized in 1837, with a population of 1,000. Beginning at least as early as 1862 a small Mennonite settlement existed in the northern part of the county and the southern part of Steuben County, to the north of De Kalb. In 1861 Anthony Freed moved to Steuben County from Pennsylvania after a brief stop in Stark Co., Ohio. His wife was Elizabeth Benner. In 1864, Peter Freed moved to De Kalb County with his son Henry from Virginia after stopping for several years in Columbiana Co., Ohio. Other families known to have lived there were Fretz, Myers, Brand, Bechtel, Beck, and Hunsberger. The congregation seems not to have built its meetinghouse, known as Pleasant Valley, until after 1869. In that year Daniel Brenneman preached the funeral sermon for Barbara Myer at the home of Jacob Brand. Ministers in the congregation at an early date were James Coyle and Eli Stofer, who usually preached in the English language. The latter was born in Columbiana Co., Ohio, and moved to De Kalb County in 1864. He was ordained to the ministry in 1871. Daniel Smith, who had been a deacon in Putnam Co., Ohio, was ordained a minister at Pleasant Valley. The meetinghouse and cemetery were located at Fairfield Center. Although the congregation never was large, at one time in the early '80's eight young people were baptized into the church. The congregation, being small, seems to have been unable to withstand the encroachment of worldliness. J. S. Coffman visited the congregation at numerous times, and at one time baptized a class of young people. Others would have united with the church but were unable to decide in favor of a plain church. Many of the descendants of the early Mennonites are now members of the United Brethren Church. A small Brethren in Christ congregation maintains a place of worship in the western part of the county. Some of the members of the Leo Mennonite congregation in Allen County live near Spencerville in the southern part of De Kalb County. In 1908 the congregation was still in existence, for in that year it asked the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference, of which it was a member, for ministerial help. As late as 1913 students from Goshen College assisted in conducting services there. J.S.U.

Deken, Agatha (Aagje), b. 1741 at Amstelveen near Amsterdam, d. 1804 at The Hague, a noted Dutch author of poems and fiction. Her parents, members of the Reformed Church, died when she was very young, and she was brought up in the Oranjeappel, the Collegiant orphanage in Amsterdam. In 1760 she united with the Collegiants, being baptized by immersion at Rijnsburg (q.v.). In 1769 she became a member of the Amsterdam Mennonite Lam en Toren congregation without rebaptism. In 1767 she left the orphanage to make her own living, and soon began to write religious verse and later short stories. In 1776 she met Elisabeth Bekker (1738-1804), the wife of the Reformed pastor A. Wolff, and became her very close friend. After Wolff's death the following year they lived together at Beverwijk near Haarlem, writing and publishing conjointly. They were warm friends in spite of fundamental differences in temperament, Elisabeth Bekker (or Betje Wolff, as she was usually called) being lighthearted and Aagje serious. Betje had already written some verse and a novel. Their best novels were De Historie van Sara Burgerhart (1782) and Historie van den Heer Willem Leevend (1784-85). Their novels, most of them written in the form of letters, describe the times in which they were living with a lively wit and gentle criticism. They were both opposed to the low moral standards of the time, as well as to the sterile formal orthodoxy of the Reformed Church; they were pious, but averse to bigotry; politically they were zealous Patriots (q.v.), filled with ideals of a better age which would be governed by a rationalistic, Christian morality. Aagje was warmly inclined to Mennonitism. She wrote to Adriaan Loosjes Pzn, the Mennonite minister at Haarlem (Jan. 22, 1802), "I should like to have the misinformed people informed that the Remonstrants and the Doopsgezinde are also good Christians," and "I want to help to increase the Doopsgezinde congregation, to whom I am dearly attached." In 1787, fearing the vengeance of the reactionary government for their anti-Orange Patriotism, they went into exile in France for ten years. In 1797 they returned to Holland and lived in The Hague. Their finances, never brilliant, were now rather bad, but they were aided by good friends, such as Pastor Loosjes. On Nov. 5, 1804, Betje Wolff died; eight days later Aagje followed in death and was buried in the same grave.

Besides the books they published jointly, there is a collection (not important) of devotional poems, Stichtelijke gedichten van Maria Bosch en Agatha Deken (Amsterdam, 1775), most of which was written by Aagje. She also contributed at least 74 hymns to the hymnal published by the Haarlem congregation in 1804. It is very probable that Betje Wolff wrote the major and best parts of the novels they wrote together; but Aagje must also have contributed some important passages. H.F.W.J.

Deken, Gaspard (de Decke), an Anabaptist martyr: see Jasper, de Schoenmaker.

Dekker (see also Decker), a family name frequently found among the Dutch Mennonites (not, however, exclusively Mennonite), especially those in the Zaan district (congregations of Zaandam, Koog-Zaandijk, Westzaan, and Wormerveer), who descended from Elder Jacob Dirksz (q.v.) of Wormerveer, while another branch was found in Rotterdam, where members of this family were deacons 1742-1883. They were nearly all merchants, mostly wood- or grain-dealers.

Jacob Dekker was a preacher at Den Helder 1742-47, Hendrik Dekker at Barsingerhorn about 1772-82. Adriaen Pietersz Dekker, a Mennonite of Amsterdam, played a part in the Collegiant (q.v.) movement. He was on the board of the Collegiant Oranjeappel orphanage, when this was founded in 1677. He wrote Aanwyzing van de rechte gronden (n.p., 1685). Samuel Johann Dekker, of Rotterdam, studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Theological Seminary and served as a Mennonite pastor at Broek op Langendijk 1875-84, Monnikendam 1884-91, and Zutphen 1891-1901. His farewell sermon, at the same time a baptismal sermon, entitled Christenbede, was published at Assen (n.d.).

Of recent times mention should be made of Klaas Dekker (d. May 7, 1921), a merchant of Zaandam and deacon of the congregation of Zaandam-West, who first suggested the idea of the Mennofonds (q.v.), and Klaas Dekker Gzn (1850-1922), a wood-dealer at The Hague, who for many years was president of the church board of the congregation at The Hague and was one of the first promoters of the Gemeentedag (q.v.) movement.

The relationship of the different branches of this family could not in every case be determined. Another Dekker family, not related to the above Dekkers, lived on the island of Ameland; most of them were navigators. To this family belonged the (untrained) preacher Jan Douwes Dekker, who served about 1837, and the preacher Dieter Douwes Dekker (b. 1812 at Amsterdam, d. 1861 at Den Helder), who studied at the Amsterdam Seminary and served the congregations of Woudsend 1839-40, Beemster 1840-44, and Den Helder 1844-61. Eduard Douwes Dekker (1820-77) of Amsterdam, who under the pseudonym "Multatuli" wrote a number of well-known novels and plays, was also a member of the family. He, however, turned against the church, inclining to atheism.

It has been thought that the Dutch author Jeremias de Decker (Dekker) (b. 1609 at Breda, d. December 1666 at Amsterdam) was a Mennonite; but this has been denied by J. Geyl, who asserts that he was a Calvinist. At any rate, it has not yet been proved that he was a Mennonite. vdZ.

Deknatel, Jeme (or as he later called himself, Joannes), a Dutch Mennonite preacher, the author of widely used devotional books and the chief promoter of Pietism among the Dutch Mennonites and, through his writings, among the Mennonites of the Palatinate, b. Nov. 1, 1698, at Norden in East Friesland, d. Jan. 22, 1759, at Amsterdam. He was educated 1717-20 at the Remonstrant seminary at Amsterdam, where he studied under Jan le Clerc (Clericus) and Adriaan van Cattenburgh. When his father, a deacon at Norden, lost a large part of his property in a flood, his further education was sponsored by the church council of the Lamist congregation of Amsterdam.

On Dec. 12, 1720, Deknatel became assistant minister of the Amsterdam Lamist church with a salary of 300 guilders. Five years later, on Oct. 20, 1725, he was chosen as the fourth preacher of the congregation with a salary of 1,200 guilders. He preached his sermon of installation on Jan. 13, 1726, on I Tim. 4:16. His colleagues were Dominicus Eekens, Bartholomeus van Leuvenig, and Johannes Bremer (q.v.); in spite of differing views on the church, they worked together very well. Deknatel took an active part in the founding of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary (q.v.), and participated in the establishment of the fund for the support of inadequately paid ministers, which still bears his name (Fonds van Deknatel). He took a special interest in young Mennonite students of theology, caring for them like a father. This is attested by Marcus Arisz (q.v.) in his letters written to Deknatel's son Jan (Menn. Bl., 1859, 12, 29).

In December 1734 Deknatel made the acquaintance of A. G. Spangenberg, the bishop of the Moravian Brethren, who was visiting Amsterdam, an event that was to be of lasting influence upon his character. Two years later he also met Count Zinzendorf, on the occasion of Zinzendorf's visit to Amsterdam from February to March 1736. A warm friendship developed between Deknatel and Zinzendorf and the Moravian Brethren. During Zinzendorf's visit of several weeks in Amsterdam in 1737 he celebrated communion in Deknatel's home. Deknatel alternated with the Reformed preachers in conducting services for the Moravian congregation and attended their conferences in Zeist where they had their center. He translated and published several hymns from the Moravian hymnal. His sons Jan and Jakob he sent to Germany to be educated at the schools of the Moravian Brethren at Lindheim and Marienborn in Wetterau. When he called them home, bad feelings arose between him and Zinzendorf. Deknatel united with the Moravian congregation organized in Amsterdam on Nov. 25, 1738, at the very outset, although he also remained loyal to his own brotherhood. In a letter to Leonard Dober (Dec. 30, 1749), he declared that he and his wife had been drawn closer to the Saviour through their contact with the Moravian Brethren and had rid themselves of much of their self-love and "self-made piety." But from 1751 on, he withdrew more and more from the Brethren. Deknatel thought that they should limit their activity to pastoral work, and not preach or set up a new church. A loan made by Deknatel to Zinzendorf, which Zinzendorf was unable to pay back, also disturbed their relationship. Nevertheless he remained on friendly terms with the Brethren, while at the same time he was warmly attached to his own brotherhood. "I have love for all men, and believe in a common Christian Church. Nevertheless I must testify that I bear my Mennonite brethren upon my heart and above all my own congregation, among whom I have been a member since my youth, and whose salvation (Heil) I seek to promote like my own." His fellowship with many outstanding men of God is attested by his extensive correspondence. In true brotherhood the Lutheran O. Martens wrote him from Copenhagen (March 12, 1737); David Nitschmann, the bishop of the Moravian Brethren, sent him letters from the Ronneburg castle (June 19, 1738) and from Pennsylvania (Jan. 3, 1741). Deknatel exchanged a number of letters with the Swabian pastor Friedrich Christoph Steinhofer in Ehningen near Tübingen, whom he had met at a conference in Zeist (Menn. Bl., 1858), and also with L. Dober (Dec. 30, 1749). John Wesley was a guest in his home in 1738 and relates in his journal that he was received by Deknatel with Christian congeniality and heard one of Deknatel's sermons, which he liked so well that he took notes on it. Deknatel was at this time already a genuinely ecumenical Christian.

Deknatel's influence was great and lasting, extending far beyond the Dutch borders. Concerning his influence on the Palatine Mennonites, see Weber, Peter. Many of his writings were translated into German and were widely read. Some of his sermons were printed in America in the 19th century (Acht Predigten . . ., Allentown, 1835; Eine Reihe von Predigten . . ., Quakertown, 1883).

The Amsterdam archives contain letters written to Deknatel by the Hutterian Brethren of Sobotiste in Hungary (Menn. Bl., 1894, 46). Mennonites of Switzerland traveled to Holland to visit the beloved and noted preacher. Until very recently his sermons were zealously read in Mennonite homes in the Palatinate. His catechism, Anleitung zum Christlichen Glauben, was long used by the Mennonites of South Germany. On March 7, 1757, Deknatel wrote an impressive letter to the Friedelsheim (Palatinate) congregation, which was published under the title, Der Weg zur Seligkeit, geschrieben an die Gemeinde zu Friedelsheim (Menn. Bl., 1857, 56 ff.). Deknatel was attacked by the Dutch Reformed preacher G. Kulenkamp in Aanmerkingen (1740).

Among the Dutch Mennonites Deknatel occupied a unique place. He was a "Pietist among the Mennonites" (Leendertz), and in his experiential piety (Bevindelijkheid) he was quite different from the Lamist group to which he belonged, who were rather inclined toward rationalism. Nevertheless he was on good terms with his Amsterdam colleagues van Leuvenig and especially with Bremer, whose funeral address he delivered. He made many trips, holding revival meetings in many Dutch Mennonite churches. These were not always kindly received. The Mennonite church in Harlingen, of which Joannes Stinstra (q.v.) was the pastor, was denied him. In his house on the Leliegracht in Amsterdam he held regular Sunday evening devotional exercises, which were attended by many members of the Reformed Church, and which therefore caused some trouble in 1749.

Deknatel's writings are: Klaag- en Troostdicht over . . . de zwaare Watervloeden in Oost-Vriesland (Amsterdam, 1722); Lijk-dicht op M. Oosterbaan (1723); a foreword to the new edition of P. van Vloten's Het Waare Bruiloftskleed . . . (Amsterdam, 1726); Lijk-dicht op H. Schijn (Amsterdam, 1727); Voorrede voor M. Symons, Bekenntenisse der Armen (q.v.); an introductory poem for Godts wonderen met zijne Kerke vertoont in een gedenkwaardig verhaal van meest Boheemische en Moravische Broeders . . . (Amsterdam, 1735, 1738); Evangelische Liederen (translation of hymns from the Moravian hymnal with several of his own composition, Amsterdam, 1738, reprinted 1743, 1749), an introduction to Menno Simons' Van de Rechtvaardigmakinge (1737); Aanleiding tot het Christelijk Geloove, Met de Woorden Gods; voornamelijk geschikt voor de Kinderen en Opwassende Jeugd (Amsterdam, 1746, 1747, 1764); German translation, Anleitung zum christlichen Glauben (Amsterdam, 1756; Neuwied, 1790; Worms, 1829; Alzey, 1839); Auf den allerseeligsten Heimgang meines lieben Sohnes Jacobus Deknatel (1748), translated into the Dutch by Deknatel himself; De Beede Christi aan zyne gekochte Zondaars (sermon, 1754, Amsterdam); De getrouwe Raad des Zaligmakers (sermon, Amsterdam, 1755); Menno Simons in't Kleine (Amsterdam, 1753, 2d ed., 1758); German translation of the same, Kurzer Auszug von Menno Simons Schriften (Büdingen, 1758), reprinted (Königsberg, 1765) as Auszug der merkwürdigsten Abhandlungen aus den Werken Menno Simons; Het Evangelium des Vredes (Amsterdam, n.d.); Het Oogmerk van Gods gerichten op aarde (Amsterdam, 1756); Acht Predigten über wichtige Materien (Büdingen, 1757), a collection of sermons published previously as single Dutch prints, but not contained in the following collection of 12 sermons, and reprinted in America at Allentown in 1835, and in part at Quakertown in 1883; Lijkrede . . . op Johannes Bremer (1758); Twaalf Predikatiën over Uitgeleezene Texten (Amsterdam, 1758); Naagelaten Predikatiën, 2 vv. (Amsterdam, 1760 and 1763). Anonymously he wrote De heilige en veilige weg des geloofs. Deknatel is also the author of a service manual for ministers (ML I, 14), which appeared anonymously and is credited with being the basis for all later German Mennonite manuals of this type.†

Delaware, a state on the Atlantic seaboard, first settled by the Dutch in 1631. It became a part of the grant made to William Penn in 1682 and remained under the governor of Pennsylvania until 1776. It has an area of 2,057 square miles and a population of 266,505. Pieter Cornelis Plockhoy (q.v.), a Dutch Mennonite, in 1662 planted a colony in Delaware, but it was destroyed by the English in 1694. The first permanent settlement of Mennonites was established in January 1914 near Greenwood. The Greenwood Conservative Mennonite Church (q.v.) now has a membership of 240 and supports a mission station in Wilmington. It established the Greenwood Mennonite School (q.v.) in 1928. Old Order Amish Mennonites moved into the state in 1915, locating west of Dover, in Kent County (q.v.). By 1952 they had five church districts with 282 members. In 1925 they established the Apple Grove Amish Mennonite School at Dover and in 1938 the Green Hill Amish Mennonite School at Cheswold. The Wesley Chapel Mennonite Mission (MC), established at Newark in 1950 under the Ohio and Eastern Conference, had 47 members in 1955.

Delaware Mennonite Church (MC) of the Lancaster Conference is located in the Juniata Valley, a few miles north of Thompsontown, Juniata Co., Pa.

The congregation meets both in the Delaware meetinghouse and in Lost Creek under the bishop oversight of William W. Graybill, and Donald Lauver as assistant bishop. The ministers are W. Banks Weaver and Raymond Lauver. The membership (1954) is 75. The first meetinghouse was built in 1871. In 1953 a new one was built beside it. The older building is being used for a Christian day school. I.D.L.

Delden, van, a Dutch Mennonite family, originally of Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, and in the 17th century residing at Deventer and Groningen, since the 19th century also in Gronau and Nordhorn, Germany, Jan van Delden, a Deventer merchant, having moved to Germany (see Matheus van Delden). Most of the van Delden family were merchants or manufacturers. In the 17th century nearly all members of this family belonged to the conservative group of Old Flemish Mennonites, and many of them did much for the church, a number serving the church as deacons. Mennonite preachers of this family were: Steven (Berents) van Delden (1672-1757), a rather wealthy merchant, who was minister of the Old Flemish congregation at Deventer from 1722 until his death (DB 1919, 82, 85-87, 97); Albertus van Delden (1748-1810), minister at Sneek, Oude Huis, 1773-97; Pieter van Delden (1763-1818), educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary, minister at Winterswijk 1786-1800, lived at Almelo after his retirement; Mauritz Ernst van Delden (1818-72), educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary, a minister at Franeker 1848-72 (DB 1873, 189). He wrote Leerrede, uitgesproken bij gelegenheid der laatste godsdienstoefening in het oude kerkgebouw der Doopsgezinden te Franeker, 8 Mei 1864, Franeker (n.d.). vdZ.

Delden, Albertus van, Dutch Minister of Finance, b. Feb. 21, 1828, at Deventer, d. Nov. 7, 1898, a descendant of the above family. He never married, but lived with his unmarried sister.

He rendered outstanding service to his native city, his country, and the Mennonite brotherhood. From 1858 until his death he held high and honorable political office in provincial (Overijssel) and national legislative bodies, and finally the portfolio of Minister of Finance in the cabinet. His service to the Mennonite Church in Deventer was equally outstanding. In 1862 he became a member of the church council, and then its treasurer. For some years, when his political duties kept him away from home for long periods, he resigned this position, but after this obstacle was removed, he gave the church his devoted and untiring service as deacon and chairman.

He was a simple man who avoided all show and cared nothing for the applause of the world. He persistently followed the way he felt was right. With his money he was very generous. He fully deserved his place of honor in city, nation, and church. (ML I, 400.) S.L.

Delden, Hendrick Wilhelm van, Dr. h.c. (1872-1950), a leading textile manufacturer of Germany, head of the largest cotton mill on the Continent (at Gronau, Westphalia), in 1938 president of the International Cotton Congress at Cairo, Egypt, b. Gronau, April 20, 1872, d. there Jan. 24, 1950, oldest of eight children of Gerrit and Engelbertha van Delden, older brother of Mathieu van Delden, was active in German Mennonite church organizations. For decades he was a member of the Gronau Mennonite church board and a member of the directors of the Vereinigung der Deutschen Mennonitengemeinden and served as treasurer of the Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein 1933-47. Delden, Matheus (Mathieu) van, an important industrialist of Westphalia, Germany, b. May 26, 1828, in Nordhorn, d. Feb. 10, 1904, in Gronau. He was the son of Jan van Delden, a merchant of Deventer, who moved to Nordhorn in Hannover early in the 19th century. Matheus was the fourth of eleven children. At the age of 16 he attended the school of weaving at Elberfeld, and then learned the trade from the bottom of the ladder. His capabilities were such that he had no difficulty in finding the capital to set up his own weaving firm in Gronau in the 1860's, which went through the entire evolution from hand spinning and weaving (the latter done in the homes) down to completely modernized mechanized methods. In 1914 the factory employed 1,500 workers. He was still active in his business when his final illness overtook him and he died at the age of 76 years. Unfortunately he did not live to see the dedication of the Mennonite church in Gronau, in which he had a sincere interest, and for which he contributed a substantial sum. (ML I, 400.) J.v.D.

Delfshaven, a town in the Dutch province of South Holland, since the beginning of the 20th century a part of Rotterdam. During the rise of Anabaptism this movement had many adherents here. In 1550 the Anabaptists Quirijn and his brother Huig Jorisz of Delfshaven were beheaded at Delft. Leenaert Bouwens baptized 43 persons here between 1551 and 1565. Later there was a Mennonite congregation, probably very small, which met in a private house and of whose history little is known. The congregation, which it is thought belonged to the strict wing of Old Flemish Mennonites, united with that in near-by Rotterdam, ca. 1730. vdZ.

Delft, a town in the Dutch province of South Holland with (1947) about 62,000 inhabitants (263 Mennonites). As early as 1534 there was live Anabaptist activity here. On March 27, 1534, the martyr Jan Evertsz (q.v.) of Middelburg, who had visited Delft shortly before, named nine persons at Delft who had been rebaptized, among them David Joris (q.v.) and his wife. In the fall of 1534 Obbe Philips (q.v.) visited Delft and ordained David Joris as an elder. Early in March 1535 and in December 1535 some Anabaptists were executed whose names are not known. Probably there was a congregation there at this time, which was deeply influenced by David Joris. In January 1539, 31 Anabaptists were put to death, including Maritgen, the mother of David Joris. All these persons were Davidjorists (q.v.). After this terrible execution some Anabaptists must have remained, though David Joris had left Delft. The Mennonite martyr Adriaen Cornelisz (q.v.), executed at Leiden in 1552, lived in Delft (BRN II, 205). And on Feb. 5, 1572, two Mennonites, Jan Hendriksen van Zwartewaal (q.v.) and Martin Jansen Korendrager (q.v.), who are both found in the Martyrs' Mirror, suffered martyrdom at Delft. Martin Jansen is definitely said to have been a citizen of this town. Leenaert Bouwens visited Delft several times in 1563-65 and baptized 30 persons here. Shortly after this there was a Mennonite congregation at Delft, which is said to have attracted some Reformed people. The Mennonites were opposed by the Reformed minister of Delft, Arent Cornelisz, who wrote two books against them: Grondtlich bewijs ende onderricht wt der heyliger Schriftuyre dat het Godts wille ende bevel is, dat men de onmondiche kinderkens der Christenen doopen sal; and Wederlegginghe der voorneemste bewijsredenen. From the records of the Reformed Church it appears that Niesgen Bruyne, the widow of Herman Schinkel and later the wife of Aelbrecht Heyndricksz, had reprinted the Mennonite Offerboek in 1578. This must have been the edition of Het Offer des Heeren of which until now the printer was unknown (edition No. 6, 1578 b; see BRN II, 11-12). In 1599 there existed at Delft a Frisian Mennonite congregation, of which Jan Woutersz was a preacher. Of this Frisian congregation nothing further is known; it may soon have united with the Flemish congregation, of which the origin is unknown but which existed in 1578, in which year Christiaen Adriaensz was an elder here. In 1626 the ministers of Delft, Michiel Jantz, Willem Theunisz, and Adriaen Jansz, signed the Confession of Outerman (q.v.). Representatives of this congregation attended the conferences of the Flemish at Haarlem in 1649 and other Flemish meetings. In 1664 they signed the Verbond van Eenigheid (q.v.) and joined the stricter wing of the Dutch Mennonites, the Zonists (q.v.).

In 1647 there was also a Waterlander congregation in Delft, of which five representatives were present at the general Waterlander conference at Amsterdam. The history of these three congregations is equally obscure; it is not clear when they were founded and only a few facts are given. Even the places where two of these congregations met are not known; the Waterlanders had a meetinghouse in the Huetersteeg. Since about 1630 the Flemish congregation had no minister of its own. For more than 50 years it was ministered to by preachers from other congregations, especially from Rotterdam (buitenmannen); it must have died out at the end of the 17th century. About 1680 the Waterlander congregation joined the Waterlander Sociëteit of South Holland and got a preacher of its own; how long this minister, C. de Wit Jzn, stayed here, is not known. The congregation, which during the 17th century was always very small and of which it is said in 1713 that it was nearly extinct (DB 1918, 69), must have disappeared soon after. At least it is not mentioned in the first Naamlijst (1731).

In April 1907 a number of Mennonites living at Delft founded a Kring (group). J. Dyserinck (q.v.), a retired minister of Rotterdam who was living at The Hague, conducted services once a month in the Remonstrant church; he also gave catechismal instruction and in the spring of 1909 held a baptismal service. The members of the Delft group were registered in the records of the Mennonite congregation of The Hague (q.v.). After the death of Pastor Dyserinck (1912), Pastor G. Wuite of The Hague took care of the Delft Mennonite group. In 1923 this group obtained its own minister, M. van der Vegte Jr. 1923-27, followed by Miss M. T. Gerritsma 1927-29, Miss J. H. van der Slooten 1929-32, and since 1934 until now Miss S. Goossen. In 1925 this group was organized as an independent Mennonite congregation. The membership, which numbered 98 in 1916, 115 in 1927, was 154 in 1954. The congregation has no church building of its own. Meetings are held in the Remonstrant church or in a rented hall. There is a Sunday school for children, a ladies' circle, and a youth group. vdZ.

About 400 members of the Mennonite Brethren and General Conference Mennonite churches live within a radius of five miles of the town. Delpini, a Jesuit priest who was commissioned in September 1764 by Maria Theresa, Queen of Austria-Hungary, to convert the Anabaptists (Hutterites) living at Alwinc (q.v.) in the Hungarian province of Transylvania. With the help of the government and severe measures, such as confiscation of books, compulsory attendance at his sermons, threats, and imprisonment, he tried to make them forsake their faith. In the beginning he was not very successful, but after their preacher Joseph Kohr (or Gor) had been arrested and another preacher, Martin Roth (Ruth), had been forcibly "converted," others followed, threatened by imprisonment or tempted by the attractive promises of the government. A large number of them, however, fled to Russia or Turkey in order to keep the faith. In 1768 Delpini returned; his mission was finished; all but a few who suffered in prison had turned Catholic. Their descendants, many of whom are still living in those areas, are sometimes called Habaner (q.v.). (See also Alwinc, Hungary, Hutterites.) (DB 1910, 41, 69.) vdZ.

Delta Colony, Uruguay, the third Mennonite colony in Uruguay, located in southern Uruguay in Departamento San Jose, 60 miles northwest of Montevideo, and only 3 miles south of the principal Montevideo-Colonia highway, about 150 miles southwest of the two older Mennonite settlements, El Ombu and Gartental, is named Delta in remembrance of the Vistula Delta from which the settlers all originate. The site was selected after careful investigation and after all prospective settlers had registered agreement to the purchase, which was made on Feb. 18, 1955. The tract contained 1,462 hectares (ca. 3,600 acres), which was divided into farms of an average of 75 acres in size, and initially occupied by 40 families. The financial arrangements for the purchase called for a down payment of 250,000 Uruguay pesos, 100,000 of which were supplied by each family paying 2,500, and the remainder coming from North American friends. A mortgage was arranged through the government mortgage bank at 8 per cent interest. Delta Colony is independent of the other Mennonite settlements, with its own organization. The first officers of the colony were elected in 1955 as follows: Pres., Walter Sprunk; Sec., Wilhelm Regehr; Treas., Hans Warkentin; Committee members, Artur Schweitzer, Helmut Wiebe, Gerhard Willy Dueck, and Wilhelm Dueck.

All the settlers originally were refugees from the Danzig area and West Prussia, but came directly from the settlements of El Ombu, Il Pinar, Trinidad, Santa Rosa, Buschental, and Montevideo in Uruguay. The colony co-operative is called "Cooperativa Delta." To some extent the farmers are also operating independently on such products as milk, fruit, and vegetables. The principal farm product of the settlement is wheat, although some sunflowers, potatoes, and vegetables are grown. Slowly the colony will move into more dairying and more extensive production of fruit and vegetables. Marketing facilities are good because of the colony's location on the main road into Montevideo.

The Delta church is a branch of the Montevideo church, but in time it is to become an independent church. At such time, Klaus Dueck is to assume eldership. Willi Jochem, formerly at El Ombu, is the present minister. W.T.S.

Demolition of Dwellings. Among the suppressive measures taken by governments against the Anabaptists of the 16th century was the razing of houses in which the persecuted groups met for worship. The earliest records of such procedure come from the archbishopric of Salzburg, where ecclesiastical and secular authorities were combined in one person. Here Anabaptists were found as early as 1526. On Oct. 18, 1527, Matthäus Lang (q.v.), cardinal and archbishop of Salzburg, issued a mandate against the Anabaptists in his realm, in which he forbade their meeting for worship. A few days later, on Oct. 27, a new mandate was passed, that extended the range of persons liable to the penalty. It says, "No one shall accept, lodge, feed, or give drink in his house to one of the brotherhood of Anabaptists, but get rid of him on penalty of having his house destroyed and the other announced penalties. Let every one guard against secret meetings, corner preaching and mobs" (Loserth, 37). Even those who announced such meetings were threatened in a further edict of April 18, 1528, with losing their homes (Loserth, 41). This threat was carried out in the case of two houses in which the Anabaptists had met. And on Nov. 6, 1527, six Anabaptists were locked into a house and burned to death in it (Loserth, 39).

The penalty of destruction of home was also applied in Lower Austria (q.v.), creating difficulties with the owners, who had no idea of the meetings being held in their houses; also in Tirol (see Oberlehen). In the Netherlands houses in which Anabaptists met were also torn down. This happened in Niedorp in 1535 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 101), and as late as about 1643 the meetinghouse at Visvliet, Groningen, was pulled down when the Mennonites began to hold meetings there. In view of such obstacles to meeting for mutual admonition and worship, there was often no other possibility of meeting than at night or in the open in outlying places. HEGE.

Denbigh, a village (pop. ca. 200) in the city of Warwick, Va. (formerly called Warwick County), in the southeastern part of the state. There are some 300 Mennonites living within shopping distance of Denbigh, all of the M.C. group. Most of these live in a settlement two miles southeast of Denbigh. Mennonites began to settle there around 1898. There are two Mennonite churches in the vicinity, a Christian day school, and a mission in the near-by city of Newport News, which is staffed with workers from the Warwick River congregation, it being the larger church with a membership of 300. Denison Civilian Public Service Camp No. 18, located one mile southwest of Denison, Iowa, was opened in August 1941 and closed in September 1946. A soil conservation camp under the Mennonite Central Committee, it had an enrollment of over 100 men, who were engaged chiefly in erosion control and emergency farm work. The campers were given credit for their help in saving Council Bluffs, Iowa, from destruction by the Missouri River flood of April 1943. During the school year 1944-45, a relief training school for campers who had volunteered for relief work was conducted at the camp. (M. Gingerich, Service for Peace, Akron, 1949.) M.G.

Denk (Denck), Hans (ca. 1500-27), an outstanding leader of the South German Anabaptists, though of the spiritualist type, was born at Habach, near Huglfing in Upper Bavaria; died of the plague in November 1527, at Basel, Switzerland. Denk stated in his confession of faith of Jan. 14, 1525: "I was taught the faith from my childhood by my parents." In 1517 he enrolled at the University of Ingolstadt, from which he received the Bachelor of Arts degree two years later. Later he attended the University of Basel. He was versed in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and was at home in the humanistic circles of the day. Although he may for a time have been a disciple of Erasmus, not much of the latter's influence on him is discernible. For a time he served as literary editor ("corrector") in the printery of the famous Cratander of Basel, later in that of Valentine Curio. At the latter he edited the last three volumes of a four-volume Greek grammar by Theodore Gaza. For some time in 1523 he also attended the lectures of Oecolampadius in Basel on the Prophet Isaiah, but was also not much influenced by Oecolampadius.

The real source of Denk's religious life and thought was in medieval mysticism as represented by Deutsche Theologie (q.v.), which Luther had reissued in 1518. He was also influenced by Thomas Müntzer's mysticism. Denk was burdened for the deepening of his own spirituality and that of the church.

At the age of 23 he was appointed rector of the St. Sebald School in Nürnberg, having been nominated for this position by Oecolampadius. By this time he was also married. Nürnberg was at that time torn between the Lutherans and those who were disappointed in the fruits of the Reformation; also some were returning to the Catholic Church. Denk was arraigned before the city authorities upon the tesimony of an "ungodly" painter, Sebald Behaim, who with several other painters was charged with unsound remarks about baptism and the communion, and who reported certain conversations with Denk which cast doubt upon Denk's doctrinal soundness. The result was that Denk was banished from the city, although he was not yet an Anabaptist.

Denk had by this time come to challenge the Lutheran doctrine of justification by faith which seemed to guarantee the standing of a believer with God regardless of the character of his life. Denk's whole emphasis was put instead on discipleship to Jesus. Indeed his motto was: "No one may truly know Christ except one who follows Him in life." Denk and the Lutheran Osiander were in sharp disagreement in spiritual matters. Osiander was, in fact, present at Denk's trial before his banishment from Nürnberg. At this trial the city council demanded a confession of faith from Denk, which he submitted in two installments, the first on Jan. 14, 1525, two weeks after his trial, and the second during the following week. In the former he made the following confession: "I, Johann Denk, confess that as far as my hereditary nature is concerned I am a poor soul, subject to every sickness of body and spirit. . . . For a time I prided myself as possessing faith, but I have finally become convinced that it was a false faith, because this faith did not overcome my spiritual poverty, my inclination to sin, my weaknesses and my sickness; on the contrary, the more I polished and adorned myself when I had such a nominal faith, the more severe became my spiritual sickness. . . . I do not venture to assert that I now have the faith which translates itself into life, although I see clearly that my unbelief cannot continue before God. Therefore I say: Yes, in the name of the Almighty God whom I fear from the bottom of my heart: Lord, I have the desire to believe; help me to come to faith. . . . When Christ the sun of righteousness arises in our hearts, then the darkness of unbelief is overcome for the first time. That has not yet taken place in me. . . . He who does not hearken to the revelation of God in his own breast (i.e., who does not receive illumination from God's Spirit) but undertakes of himself to give an exposition of the Scripture—which only the divine Spirit is able to do—makes of God's secrets which are contained in Scripture a desolate abomination, and misuses the grace which he has received from God." At the end of the confession Denk added: "All unbelief is sin; it is this which wrecks the righteousness of God by law. Only when the law has fulfilled its role, i.e., when self-seeking is conquered, does the Gospel find room in the heart. Faith comes by hearkening to the Gospel. Where there is faith, there is no sin; where there is no sin, there the righteousness of God dwells. The righteousness of God is God Himself; sin is that which is contrary to God. All believers were at one time unbelievers. To become believers they had to have their passions, their earthly man, die in the sense that it was no more they themselves who lived, as they had done when still in unbelief, but God lived in them through Christ; they no longer had their walk here on earth, but in heaven, as Paul says. All this I believe. May God break down my unbelief."

The second confession of Denk (submitted several days after the first) deals with baptism and communion. He distinguished between an outer and an inner baptism; the former is not necessary to salvation, while the latter is. Water baptism is of value only when it is performed as a covenant with God. The inner baptism is the one meant where it says, He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved. (The verdict of the Nürnberg clergy on Denk's confession is printed in Keller, Johann von Staupitz, 404-11.)

The magistracy of Nürnberg issued its verdict on Denk on Jan. 25, 1525. He was compelled under threat of imprisonment to swear never to come closer to the city than 10 miles the remainder of his life, and was thus banished from his wife and children, for whose support his property was appropriated. Denk swore the oath and left the city a deeply shaken man. Where he spent the next few months is not known.

In June 1525 Denk was staying at the home of an Anabaptist in St. Gall, where he attended also the Anabaptist meetings. It is said that his belief in universalism (q.v.) gave offense to the Anabaptists there.

From September 1525 until October 1526 Denk was in Augsburg in South Germany. He earned a living by teaching Latin and Greek to the children of two noblemen who took him into their homes.

Soon after his arrival he had to give account of himself because news of his banishment from Nürnberg had reached Augsburg. Nevertheless he was not banished.

Spiritually Augsburg was badly divided: Lutherans and Zwinglians were combating each other, and there was also a Catholic minority. Moral conditions were bad. Yet there was apparently a small group in the city, perhaps of Zwinglian inclination, whose members lived a life of strict morality and presumably formed the nucleus of the Anabaptist congregation established in 1526 by Hubmaier (q.v.). To this group Denk was attracted, and was baptized by Hubmaier. After Hubmaier's departure for Nikolsburg in Moravia, Denk became the leader of the Augsburg Anabaptists. He in turn won for the brotherhood such men as Hans Hut (q.v.), and perhaps Siegmund Salminger (q.v.), Jakob Dachser (q.v.), and Eitelhans Langenmantel (q.v.). It is estimated that about 1527 the Augsburg Anabaptist congregation numbered 1,100 souls. (This number has, however, not been substantiated.)

But Denk's stay in Augsburg was destined to come to an end soon: Urban Rhegius (q.v.), the reformer of the city, became his powerful opponent. This led to a disputation between Denk and the Lutheran clergy, to be followed by a second and this time public disputation. But before this could take place, the weary Denk left the city.

By November 1526 Denk was in Strasbourg. Here he enjoyed the friendship of the Anabaptists. But the presence of such an outstanding "heretic" as Denk in Strasbourg was disconcerting to Capito (q.v.) and Bucer (q.v.), the Protestant leaders of the city. Once again Denk had to participate in a disputation, this time with Bucer. He was thereupon expelled from Strasbourg and left the city in December 1526. Following brief residences in Bergzabern and Landau in the Palatinate—and another disputation at the latter city—he located briefly in Worms, where he helped Haetzer (q.v.) finish the translation of the Old Testament Prophets. They were published in April 1527 at Worms, and are therefore known as the "Wormser Propheten." They were possibly used by Luther and the Swiss theologians in their German translations of the Bible. Denk then visited Anabaptist congregations in South Germany and Switzerland, and presided at the Martyrs' Synod (q.v.) in Augsburg on Aug. 20, 1527. It was there decided to send Anabaptist preachers and evangelists as emissaries to South Germany, Switzerland, and Austria. Denk was in a group of three commissioned "to comfort and teach" the brethren in the Zürich and Basel areas of Switzerland.

In late September 1527, near the end of his life, Denk arrived in Basel and found refuge in the home of a friend. He was sick in body and spirit, weary of conflict and persecution, longing for rest and peace. He therefore wrote an appealing letter to Oecolampadius, asking permission to stay in the city (Comeniushefte 1898, 230-43; ML I, 409). Oecolampadius seems to have taken a kindly attitude toward the sick Denk; he visited him repeatedly and engaged in many discussions with him. At Oecolampadius' request Denk wrote a brief statement of his views, which Oecolampadius published under the somewhat misleading title, Hans Denks Widerruf (Recantation). In ten points Denk covered the following topics: Scripture, Christ's "payment," faith, free will, good works, separation and sects, "ceremonies," "baptism, bread and cup of communion," and the oath. The whole thrust of Denk's position is on the utter necessity of the inner life with God; everything outward is secondary if not useless. "Faith is obedience to God." Also, "God sees the faith and the good works, is pleased by them, and rewards them. Not that they have their source in us, but that we do not receive the grace which is offered us in vain. Everything comes from one source, and that is a good one, namely from the Word which was with God from the beginning and in the last times became flesh. And happy is the man who does not despise the gifts of God." Denk confessed freely that he had erred in the past, and still erred. He also expressed no particular objection to infant baptism, and promised never again to baptize anyone. In reference to his own activity in baptizing he remarked that the zeal of the Lord had sent him out, and had again brought back his understanding. It is evident that his mysticism, a spirit foreign to the Swiss Brethren, had largely undermined his Anabaptist convictions—indeed he fully approved of oaths in this same confession. It was of the essence of authoritative Anabaptism to insist on an open testimony and commitment with baptism as its outward symbol. In agreeing to abandon baptism, Denk abandoned Anabaptism in a sense and approached the position of Schwenckfeld. But it is also true that Denk was now a broken man, crushed by the harsh measures which his religious opponents succeeded in having the magistracy take against him, and his sensitive soul was unable any longer to bear the load. At any rate, Denk had now returned to his original mysticism. He died of the plague in November 1527.

Denk has been accused by his enemies as well as modern scholars such as Dunin-Borkowski of being an anti-Trinitarian (see Anti-Trinitarianism). Modern Unitarian historians claim him as a spiritual ancestor, e.g., F. L. Weis and E. M. Wilbur, who calls him "a pioneer of our movement." However, the characterization of him by Schwindt as "a beginner of undogmatic Christianity" is more accurate. The final word has not been said on the matter of Denk's presumed anti-Trinitarianism and may never be able to be said because of lack of evidence in Denk's own writings.

Hans Denk is the author of the following items, given in chronological order: (1) The Confession of Faith of January 1525; (2) Wer die warheit warlich lieb hat . . . (1525), a discussion of 40 paradoxes in the Bible. His conclusion is that only the inner Word of God which comes through the Holy Spirit is the authoritative, infallible guide. (3) Was geredet sei, das die Schrift sagt, . . . (1526), a treatise on the freedom of the will in the form of a dialogue between the author and the reader. (4) Vom Gesatz Gottes, Wie das Gesatz aufgehoben sei und doch erfüllet werden muss (1526), a plea for genuine holiness of life on the basis of Paul's ideas as expressed in Romans; man must strive to attain love for God and faith in God. (5) Ordnung Gottes und der Creaturen Werk (1526). This is one of Denk's most important works. It is principally a second treatise on the freedom of the will. In 12 chapters he discusses such questions as predestination, hell, heaven, the Trinity, idolatry in the pomp of the churches, and the peace of God. (6) Von der waren Liebe (1527), a sequel to the preceding work, deals with the love of God for man, as it is revealed in Jesus. The man who loves God has no need for institutions, which can blind his soul. This is Denk's masterpiece. It was reprinted at Elkhart, Ind., in 1888, edited by John Horsch, together with Hans Langenmantel's pamphlet on the Lord's Prayer, under the following title: Von der wahren Liebe .... Auslegung des Vaterunser .... Zwei altevangelische Schriften aus dem Jahre 1527. (7) Hans Dencken Widerruf (1528), which is a restatement of his original position and an abandonment of certain Anabaptist ideas, rather than a true recantation, given shortly before he died. (8) Gespräch H. Dencks mit Joh. Bader über die Taufe, which is preserved only in Bader's publication, Brüderliche Warnung vor dem neuen abgöttischen Orden der Wiedertäufer (1527), (9) Micha, der Prophet, aus rechter hebräischer Sprache verdeutscht und wie den Denk auf diese letzte Zeit verglichen hab (1532), a German version of Micah's prophecy. (10) Etliche Hauptreden . . . , also known by the title, Wie Gott einig wäre .... The former is the title in the appendix to the 1528 edition of the Deutsche Theologie (q.v.). (11) Alle Propheten nach hebräischer Sprache verdeutscht von Ludwig Haetzer und J. Denk (Worms, 1527).

Denk's contemporaries recognized his significance as a leader. Bader spoke of him as "the famous Hans Denk"; Bucer called him the "pope" of the Anabaptists; Rhegius called him their "abbot"; Haller spoke of him as their "Apollo"; Bullinger, as their "Rabbi"; and Vadian spoke of him as a highly talented youth. Yet it should be noted that Denk stood somewhat apart from the main theological stream of Anabaptism, and that he cannot be regarded as the spokesman of the group in those areas where he held to his peculiar emphases. His major contribution lay in the earnestness with which he contended for Christianity as discipleship, and in the beauty of his sincere Christian spirit. He is one of the few personalities of the 16th century who never indulged in controversy except with a heavy heart; not a trace of abusiveness or unfairness is to be found in his writings.

A critical edition of Denk's complete works, prepared by Walter Fellmann, appeared as Quellen zur Geschichte der Täufer, Vol. VI, Part II, in Quellen und Forschungen zur Reformationsgeschichte, Vol. XXIV (Gütersloh, 1956). Part I of this volume, published in 1955, was George Baring's exhaustive Bibliographie of Denk's writings.

Denmark. Lutheran teaching found early entry into this country and soon became the established faith. But Anabaptism was unable to gain a foothold here. Melchior Hofmann was appointed as Lutheran preacher in the Nikolai Church in Kiel. But because he expressed views on the communion contrary to Lutheran doctrine, he was expelled from the country after the signing of the Peace of Flensburg in 1529. In the next year he joined the Anabaptist congregation in Strasbourg.

About the middle of the 16th century some Anabaptists expelled from the Netherlands came to Denmark, and since there were among them some skilled tapestry makers and goldsmiths and they were well behaved as a group, they were welcomed by private citizens at a number of places. But in 1554 King Christian III issued a warning to all clerical and government officials to be on their guard to prevent the infiltration of Anabaptists and ordered that every immigrant should be thoroughly questioned regarding his origin and religion. In the following year the order was repeated in sharpened form, to avoid the disturbances prevalent in Germany.

Thus most of the immigrant Anabaptists were expelled; they had, however, won some followers. Two clergymen who joined them were Christopher Michelsen of Odense, and Laurentius Hellissön, provost of Lundeherrad. They were censured by a Lutheran bishop and warned by the "spiritual convent" in 1551. Nevertheless Hellissön baptized his grown son publicly at the beach near the Bridge of St. Anna. In 1557 they were arraigned in Copenhagen before a conference of bishops, professors of theology, and the King himself, and were declared guilty of the capital crime of lese majesty. The sentence was modified to life imprisonment, and they were incarcerated in Schonen and later in Soröe (Zeeland).

In 1562 King Frederick issued the "Lüneburg mandate," which again urged and commanded the Holstein authorities to exercise careful vigilance to prevent the coming of Anabaptists. Apparently some slipped in, for in 1569 he issued 25 articles, making it mandatory for all immigrants to answer very pointed questions and to be watched by the police for some time after their arrival.

After this there were no more Anabaptists in Denmark proper. In 1711, when the king of Denmark invited the Mennonites to settle in his country, they refused (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1324, 1331). (See also Schleswig-Holstein.)

In the spring of 1945 some 1,500 Mennonite refugees from East and West Prussia and Danzig were evacuated with some 200,000 German refugees from this region, to Denmark, by the German army and navy. At one time Mennonites were found in 34 different camps in Denmark where they remained for the most part until 1950. A small number went to Uruguay in 1948, and few to Canada, but most of them were finally allowed to enter Germany, a large part settling in the Palatinate. The Mennonite Central Committee served the refugees through a unit established in Copenhagen from December 1945 to January 1949. In 1947-48 the Mennonites were found chiefly in 9 camps as follows: Oxboel (near Vaarde), several hundred; Aalborg-Ost and Aalborg-West, 150-200; Grove (15 miles from Herning), 75-100; Rye (6 miles from Silkeborg), 100 or more; Frederikshavn, 18-25; Krudttarnsvej (near Copenhagen), 15-20; Dragoer (near Copenhagen), about 12; Gedhus (near Herning, 4 miles from Grove), about 20; Rom, a family of 5; and a group of 7 in an old people's home in Aalborg. For further information see Danzig Refugees.

The Danish historian, Fr. Hammerich, in his book, Den Kristne Kirkes Historie (1891), claims that Mennonites have been in Denmark since 1787. They supposedly came from North Germany and first settled near Frederikstad in Soenderjylland and Fredericia. They practiced immersion and called themselves "Mennonit Broederkirkens." The movement spread as far as Sweden. The first congregation in Copenhagen was established in 1871. It once had four meetinghouses, two in Sweden and two in Denmark, but lost them because of small numbers. A report by H. H. Janzen concerning contacts with this group in 1950, when it claimed 50 baptized members in Denmark, plus 25 in Sweden, 17 in Norway, and 3 in Finnland, appeared in Mennonitische Rundschau 73 (1950) Sept. 27, p. 3, and Der Mennonit IV (1951) 7. Later information indicated that this mysterious group really was not a genuine Mennonite group. NEFF, H.S.B.

Denner, Balthasar, b. Nov. 15, 1685, at Hamburg, d. April 14, 1749, at Rostock, one of the most important portrait painters of his time. His father was Jakob Denner (q.v.), the well-known Dompelaar (q.v.) preacher of Hamburg-Altona; his mother was Katharine Wiebe. In 1710 Offenbach relates that among the important persons he visited in Hamburg was the Denner family; concerning Denner's parental home he remarks, "They [the Mennonites] in general all seem to be very fine and pious people." One of his best pupils was Dominicus van der Smissen, who married his sister Katharina.

Wichmann reports in his history of Altona that Balthasar Denner had to paint an annual portrait of Countess Reventlow in payment for the use of the church in which his father preached for the Dompelaars. H.vdS.

Denner, Jakob (1659-1746), Mennonite-Dompelaar preacher of Altona near Hamburg, Germany, author of pietistic devotional books of wide circulation. His father was an elder of the "small" Mennonite church of Altona and a zealous champion of the Dompelaars or immersionists. In his youth Jakob learned the dyeing trade and studied mathematics and astronomy. He made long trips all over Europe. On Sept. 26, 1684, he was ordained minister of the Mennonite church in Altona, but he also preached in Lübeck (1687-94), Friedrichstadt (1694-98), and Danzig (1698-1702). Then he returned to Altona to preach for a time in the "large" Mennonite church, on the condition that he was not to preach any particularly Dompelaar doctrines. In 1708 Ernst Goverts, a wealthy Hamburg merchant, who was a deacon in the Mennonite church, helped him build a Dompelaar church. In 1732 Denner bought this church and requested the congregation to make contributions to pay for it.

Denner's strongly emotional sermons were widely acclaimed, and were attended by members of all Protestant groups. His delivery was called "gentle and sincere," and his personality "charming and pleasant." The nobility of Holstein and Denmark associated with him, and the later king of Sweden frequently attended his sermons. He never held the Lord's Supper in his congregation, and he performed the ceremonies of baptism and marriage only on his own children. Some of the orthodox Lutheran clergymen of Hamburg passionately opposed his activities (the new Pietism) and preached against him. (For an account of the open opposition in the Marienkirche, see Schultze, Daniel Severin and Menn. Bl., 1880, 71 f.) His son Balthasar Denner (q.v.) was a well-known portrait painter, and his son-in-law Dominicus van der Smissen was likewise a painter. After Denner's death the Dompelaar congregation, declined, and the church was taken over by the Moravians.

Denner's writings exerted a tremendous influence in and beyond the Mennonite church, and did much to promote pietistic tendencies among the Mennonites. His extremely long and emotional printed sermons served both as devotional reading and as material to be read verbatim from the pulpit at Sunday services. He published two main sets of such sermons: (a) Eenige Christelyke Uitbreidingen over verscheidene Schriftuurlijke Texte (Amsterdam and Danzig, 1706), containing 24 sermons on texts of the Old and New Testaments (at that time preaching in Hamburg and Danzig was still done in the Dutch language). Against this book Daniel S. Scultetus published his Wohlgemeinte Warnung an die Evangelischen in Hamburg vor der Gemeinschaft des Gottesdienstes der Mennoniten (Hamburg, 1706) (Menn. Bl., 1880, 71). (b) The Wysheid des Heeren (Amsterdam and Danzig, 1707), containing some 50 sermons on the Gospels for every Sunday and holiday. Also against this book a violent attack was published by the Hamburg Lutheran pastor E. Neumeister (Menn. Bl., 1880, 71). (c) Both these books were then republished in the same year as one volume under the title, Eenvoudige predicatien . . . (Amsterdam, 1707). A second edition of the combination book appeared in Hoorn, in 1771, entitled LXXI Predicatien.

In 1730 the first German edition of the complete sermon collection was published in Hamburg under the title, Einfältige und christliche Betrachtungen . . .; Part I: Erbauliche Betrachtungen über die Sonn- und Festtagsevangelia (1,366 pages, the sermons of book b), and Part II: Einfältige und christliche Betrachtungen über einige Texte des Alten und Neuen Testaments (352 pages, the sermons of book a). It is a book of 1,718 pages quarto size. In spite of its bulk the book had a tremendous appeal to Christians of all types, there being no less than five German editions (besides the two Dutch ones), and one attempted English edition. The German editions are: 1730 and 1739, Hamburg; 1751, Königsberg; 1792, Frankenthal am Rhein; and 1860, Philadelphia. The English edition was planned in 1901, the translation was completed, the first proof sheets were published (for use in promotion), yet the undertaking eventually stopped due to lack of funds and subscribers. All posthumous editions contain besides the sermons of (a) and (b) also three sermons on the Lord's Prayer and a meditation on the nobility of the conscience. An engraved portrait of Denner is used as a frontispiece.

The story of the 1792 edition is particularly revealing. Two laymen in the Franconia (Pa.) Mennonite Conference, Johannes Herstein and Johannes Schmutz, undertook in that year the hardship of a voyage across the Atlantic to Germany for the sole purpose of procuring an edition of the big book for the brethren of their conference. When they returned they brought along and quickly sold no fewer than 500 copies of this work (Wenger, Franconia, 323). It demonstrates the strong pietistic interests and longings of the Mennonite church of that time and even later (1860, 1901). The book is still to be found in many Mennonite homes in the Palatinate, in Pennsylvania, and in the prairie states. NEFF, R.F.

Denomination, a form of church organization in American church life, to be contrasted both to ecclesiastical institutionalism (state church type) and the brotherhood type of church life. In England with its established Anglican church, the analogous though mainly negative term is "Nonconformism"; in Germany likewise the Freikirche is distinguished from the Landeskirche or Volkskirche, the national church. In America, however, with its complete separation of state and church, a distinction of this kind has no clear meaning. All churches here are free churches and no church is "conformist." Hence a new kind of distinction has developed, based in the main on the type of church government, that is, on a sociological principle. The older distinction by Ernst Troeltsch (1912) between church and sect (Kirche and Sekte) seems no longer to hold true. To him the state church, in which everybody participates and of which everybody automatically becomes a member by infant baptism, no matter how much or little interest he later on takes in the work of the church, is the Kirche; its essential feature is its objective, institutional character. The Catholic Church is perhaps the best example of this type; yet also the Church of England, the Reformed Church in the Netherlands, and the Lutheran churches in Germany or Scandinavia are in a sense comparable to it. According to Troeltsch, everything else belongs to the "sect"-type of church organization, the term being used here in its best sense. The concept of a denomination was not yet fully developed by this outstanding sociologist of religion. As a specific type it was first studied by De Jong in 1938 ("The Denomination as the American Church Form"), and then in 1946, again by Joachim Wach (see Bibliography), who now clearly distinguishes between ecclesiastical church bodies, denominations, and sects. The ecclesiastical bodies all claim exclusiveness, authoritatively defined doctrines, sacraments and distinct orders. Under the denominational type Wach classifies the Congregationalists, the Baptists, the Disciples, and similar church bodies in which the local churches have more autonomy. For them the local congregation is the basic unit of the church; they are less bound by tradition, open to "liberal" reforms, are in brief "a voluntary society for carrying on the work of Christ . . . ." (Neve, 552.) The denomination shows the typical substitution of dignity of church office for spiritual charisma (grace). It evidences a weakening, both in authority (discipline) and inspiration. The "sect," finally, represents the morally rigid brotherhood type of church organization, the gathered church or believers' church, the Christian fellowship or a "Society of Friends" (as the Quakers call themselves). Among the sects, E. T. Clark distinguishes eschatological, charismatic, holiness, and communal groups.

The denomination is obviously the least demanding of the three groups, liberal in spirit and democratic in the sense of having no supreme central authority. Intellectuals flourish in this free atmosphere of the typical American denomination. Their "free" spirit shrinks from the rigid organization of the ecclesiastical bodies and from the rigid moral demands of the sectarians. Thus the denominational churches become seedbeds of "liberal Protestantism," gradually dissolving the original substance of the church. From this spring the ever-repeated yet not too successful revival movements. All of this is primarily true for the situation in the United States and Canada.

The implications of this analysis for the Mennonite Church here as elsewhere are quite obvious. Essentially Anabaptism and Mennonitism in its original form was a brotherhood church, the fellowship of committed disciples, with all the rigidity of such a group of conscious "nonconformists to the world." This was the type among them everywhere during the 16th century, and in Switzerland, Moravia, and Prussia even up to the 18th century. But in the Netherlands with its free and tolerant atmosphere and the absence of any oppression the shift to a denominational type (Freikirche) was soon achieved, hardly noticed at first, but completed in the 18th century. The same happened, perhaps slightly later, in Emden, Hamburg, Danzig, in the Rhineland (Crefeld), and in the 19th century also in the Palatinate. The church became well settled, and its prophetic tradition vanished, giving way to routine and tradition. The urbanization of the congregations helped in this process.

In America the situation was at first different. Though oppression was totally absent here, the brotherhood type survived among the Swiss-South German Mennonite immigrants to Pennsylvania because of their social isolation due to ethnic characteristics and the strongly conservative mind of the rural congregations. The same was true among the large rural congregations of Dutch-North German Mennonites in Prussia and Russia and their emigrant descendants in America, distinguished by their strong adherence to traditional Mennonite principles of separation, simplicity, and Biblicism during the 19th century, and in the American groups on into the 20th century. But almost inevitably in America, too, came the trend from the brotherhood type with all its implications to the denominational type, the adjustment to surrounding Protestantism. Evidences of this while subtle in some cases are nevertheless noticeable to some extent in all Mennonite groups, with the exception of the Old Order Amish, most Old Order Mennonites, and Old Colony Mennonites.

The most rapid shift has occurred in those groups which were formed in America by the schism of more liberal elements from the old-line conservative groups, and in those which, having broken away from their historical and traditional moorings, have come under the heavy influence of modern American Protestantism, either liberal or conservative.

The call "back to the forefathers" (Menno Simons, Conrad Grebel, Pilgram Marpeck, etc.) might be taken as an awakening toward a reverse movement, away from the denomination toward the gathered church of regenerated believers and disciples. Its success will depend exclusively upon a leadership with vision and dedication.

In conclusion it should be remarked that the same development toward the denominational type has occurred in most of the other "sectarian" groups of America. The Church of the Brethren is painfully aware of this "broken cup" (J. Ziegler). Also the Quakers with their principle of "birthright membership" are in full transition toward an established denomination with paid ministers instead of charismatic leaders. But it is true that responsible members of these groups are aware of this temptation and are trying to counteract it. R.F.

Denver, Col., a thriving city on the eastern edge of the Rocky Mountains, with its suburbs has a population of about a half million. The Mennonite (MC) Church has a congregation (see below) of 156 members in Denver under the leadership of Bishop E. M. Yost, the outgrowth of a mission. Maplecrest Turkey Farms, Inc., has attracted Mennonites to Denver. Mennonite nurses taking training in the Mennonite Hospital at La Junta, Col., have spent time in Denver during the final months of their training. A large group of I-W men has been serving in the Denver hospitals since 1950. P.G.T.

Denver (Col.) First Mennonite Church (MC), 885 Delaware Street, is a member of the South Central Conference. The first services of the church were held on July 9, 1941, with P. A. Friesen in charge. The first communion service and the organization of the congregation took place on Dec. 22, 1941, with 25 charter members. The membership in 1949 was 100. On April 1, 1945, the work was taken over by E. M. Yost. On Jan. 5, 1947, the congregation voted to purchase the vacant lots on 9th and Delaware Street as the site for a new meetinghouse. The congregation has met in this new building for services since Dec. 12, 1948. In 1955 the membership was 156, with E. M. Yost as bishop and pastor. The Denver congregation has been host to a large group of I-W men working in the city.

Denver (Pa.) Mennonite (MC) Meetinghouse. By deeds of 1878 and 1879 from the David Gockley and Brubaker farms, provisions were made for a union house and cemetery on the northeast corner of Denver, Lancaster Co., Pa. The building was first used by the Reformed, Lutherans, Brethren, and Mennonites. When the first two moved into the borough, the Reformed Mennonites and the M.C. Mennonites used this house. It was the only church used by both groups. The Reformed Mennonite membership has never been above 50. The Mennonite (MC) services were sponsored by John Bucher and the Hammer Creek ministers, but this membership has always been low. Recently all rights to the building were relinquished to the M.C. group. The Indiantown ministers conduct services there, with a Sunday-school average of 105. The membership in 1954 numbers 30. Amos S. Horst is the bishop in charge. I.D.L.

Denver (Col.) Unit No. 78 of Civilian Public Service was opened in January 1943, at the Colorado Psychopathic Hospital, and closed in March 1946. No. 78, under the Mennonite Central Committee, was one of the smaller mental hospital units. (M. Gingerich, Service for Peace, Akron, 1949.) M.G.

Derks, Alle, b. June 16, 1670, in Meeden, d. April 24, 1733 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1094), the son of the Mennonite elder Derk Alles. In 1699 he was ordained a preacher of the Groningen Old Flemish by his father, and after his father's death he was ordained to the eldership by Jan Kriens. He took an active interest in aiding the Mennonite refugees from Switzerland. From Amsterdam, where the boats from Switzerland landed on Aug. 3, 1711, he conducted 126 persons to Groningen, and found homes for them in the city and vicinity. As a member of the Dutch Committee for Foreign Needs, he did much for the Mennonites expelled from Lithuania in 1724-26. Several times he was able to send them large amounts of money collected by the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites in the Netherlands. In 1726 he forwarded to the preachers of the Culm district, whither a number of the Lithuanians had moved, 200 copies of the New Testament and many hymnbooks (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1575). Many letters and records written by or sent to Alle Derks, dealing with the needs of the Swiss and the Lithuanian-Prussian Mennonites, are found in the Archives of the Mennonite congregation at Amsterdam. In 1733 he visited the Groningen Old Flemish congregations in Prussia and Poland to administer baptism and communion, and to ordain elders. In 1713 he came in conflict with the government because he baptized a Reformed youth. All the police magistrates received the order to seize him and to close all meeting places of the Mennonites; but he remained fearlessly at his post. He published the new edition of the Biestkens Bible and wrote hymns. He edited the songbook, Lusthof des gemoets (Groningen, 1732), which was followed by an Agterhofje. This book was reprinted in 1736 with an appendix. K.V., vdZ.

Derstine (Thierstein, Dürstein, Dierstein, Durstine, Dirstine), a Swiss Mennonite family, in modern times found only in the Emmenthal district, canton of Bern, from which came J. R. Thierstein (1867-1941), educator and leader in the General Conference Mennonite Church. The family was in the Palatinate in the early 18th century (a Samuel Dierstein lived at Hasselbach in 1731), and is still to be found in Baden, e.g., in the Bretten congregation, and in northern Bavaria in the Trappstadt congregation.

The progenitor of the Derstines of eastern Pennsylvania was Michael Dierstein of the Palatinate who at 20 years of age arrived at Philadelphia on the ship Samuel Aug. 11, 1732 (Wenger, Franconia History, 21). A letter written to the Amsterdam Mennonites from Grumbach in the Palatinate described Michael Dierstein as unmarried. This letter was signed by the Mennonite ministers at Grumbach and stated that most of the 1732 emigrants either had money to pay their passage to America, or they were promised aid from Pennsylvania (Smith, Mennonite Immigration, 195 f.). Dierstein settled in what is now West Rockhill Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., less than a mile from where the Rockhill Mennonite meetinghouse now stands. He was a farmer, weaver, and miller. Dierstein became the first deacon of the Rockhill congregation not later than 1767, and died June 6, 1777. His son Isaac (1744-99) appears to have been deacon following his father; his grandson George (1770-1837) served as minister in the same congregation. Later descendants were John L. Derstine (1864-1932), deacon of the Deep Run congregation; Abraham Z. Derstine (1867-1942), minister of the Franconia congregation; Bishop Clayton F. Derstine (1891-), originally of Souderton, Pa., and now of Kitchener, Ont.; John Derstine Souder (1865-1942), local historian of Bucks Co., Pa. J.C.W.

Detmer, Alexander Heinrich (1852-1904), chief librarian at Münster in Westphalia, research scholar in history, who rendered valuable service to Mennonite history in a series of articles on the Anabaptist disorders in Münster. Of great importance is his publication of the source book by Hermann von Kerssenbroich, Anabaptistici furoris Monasterium inclitam Westphaliae metropolim evertentis historica narratio (in Geschichtsquellen des Bistums Münster, 1899-1900). His extensive introduction to the book also appeared separately under the title, Hermann von Kerssenbroichs Leben und Schriften (Münster, 1900).

Other works in this field showing his thorough mastery of the material are (1) Bilder aus den religiösen und sozialen Unruhen in Münster während des 16. Jahrhunderts (Münster, 1903); (2) Bernhard Rothmann, Kirchliche und soziale Wirren in Münster 1525-35; (3) Ueber die Auffassung von der Ehe und die Durchführung der Vielweiberei in Münster während der Täuferherrschaft; (4) *Das Religionsgespräch zu Münster i.W. am 7. und 8. Of his critical edition of the historical works of Hermann Hamelmann (q.v.) only the first two numbers appeared, 1902-5 (Veröffentlichungen der historischen Kommission für Westfalen). The book, Zwei Schriften des Münsterischen Wiedertäufers Bernhard Rothmann, edited by Detmer and Robert Krumbholtz, with an introduction on contemporary conditions, was published posthumously in Dordrecht, 1904. Detroit (Mich.) Mennonite Gospel Mission (MC), known locally as the Detroit Mennonite Church, located at 15559 Curtis Ave., was begun in 1926 by Mennonites who came to the city to secure employment. In 1927 the Indiana-Michigan Conference took over the work and built a small church. In 1930, it was transferred to the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. Over 100 persons have been baptized in the mission. The 1954 membership was 38. F. B. Raber was pastor 1930-50, J. F. Erb 1950-56, and C. Nevin Miller 1956- . F.B.R.

Detweiler (Dettweiler, Dättwyler, Dettwiler), a Swiss Mennonite family name found widely in South Germany and in North America. The family is famous in South Germany for its agricultural achievements. The Dettweilers, who had followed Hans Reist (q.v.) in the division of 1693, settled first in Alsace. Elias Detweiler (b. 1735) was elder and preacher of the Schafbusch (q.v.) congregation. One branch of the family has been located in Bavaria since 1818. Elias, Jr., was the first elder and preacher of the Eichstock (q.v.) congregation near Munich. The family of Johannes Dettweiler (b. 1738), the brother of Elias, Sr., settled in Rhenish Hesse. J. N. Schwerz attributes the introduction of gypsum as fertilizer (Düngergips) in Palatine agriculture to Dettweiler.

hannes Dettweiler's son Christian (1765-1838) unusually successful farmer and agricultural pioneer. He did much of his exceptionally fine work on the Wintersheim estate, Oppenheim district, in Rheinhessen. Christian Detweiler's brother Jakob (b. 1769) was a farmer in Kindenheim, birthplace of Christian. Christian's three sons, Johann, Peter, and Samuel, were also men of significance. Samuel became mayor of Wintersheim, and the office was still in the family in 1921. Peter's son Christian (1831-93), the oldest of the five children, made a contribution to scientific dairying in Hesse. Christian also introduced goats to Hesse, securing the best stock from Switzerland and founding the first Goat Association. Jean, the brother of Christian Dettweiler (1831-93), was a mayor, president of agricultural associations, and was especially active in the milk industry.

August Dettweiler (1839-1912) and his brother Heinrich (1840-1912) together managed a large estate, which had passed into the possession of the Dettweiler family in 1868. These Dettweiler brothers set an example of scientific farming, especially in the transition from extensive to intensive agriculture. Peter's third son, also named Peter (d. 1904), was a leader in German medical research, being himself a physician. Dr. Dettweiler was a pioneer in the successful treatment of pulmonary tuberculosis, demonstrating that it was possible to treat the disease in various climates and locations, rather than in just a few. He is called the "father of the therapeutic institutional movement (Heilstättenbewegung)." He was also an army doctor in the wars of 1864, 1866, and 1870.

Another Peter Detweiler (1856-1907) was a classical philologian and professor at the university of Giessen, later a prominent councilor in the Hessian government, and finally manager of the Freytag publishing house in Leipzig.

In America many Detweilers are found in the Franconia Conference in easternmost Pennsylvania north of Philadelphia, as well as in such other areas, as Ontario and Ohio, to which the Pennsylvania Mennonites emigrated. Among those who served in the ministry are Jacob Detweiler (1778-1858) of Ontario, Bishop Samuel D. Detweiler (1841-1917) of the Franconia Conference, Bishop Samuel H. Detweiler (1855-1923) of Kansas, and I. R. Detweiler (1873-1946), pioneer Mennonite missionary to India, as well as educator in America, for a time Acting President of Goshen College. William G. Detweiler (d. 1956) of Orrville, Ohio, was the radio preacher (MC) of "The Calvary Hour."

Detweiler Mennonite Church (MC), located near Roseville, Ont., was one of the earlier thriving congregations of Waterloo County. Because of its decline through the loss of its young people and the lack of a resident minister, the congregation was taken over by the Rural Mission Board of Ontario in 1918, which had the old stone church repaired and arranged for regular services. For many years

J. W. Witmer was the minister in charge. Sunday morning services were conducted every second week until 1935, with little change in attendance. A series of meetings held in 1933 brought about an awakening, from which better interest dated. Lorne Schmidt was placed in charge in 1936 and served until 1938, when Moses Bowman of Kitchener was ordained for Detweiler's. The membership in 1954 was 20. J.C.F.

Deunk, Machiel, is named by Wolkan, Lieder, 80, as the author of the martyr's hymn, "Mijn siele verheucht haer in den heer," following its acrostic. Nothing else is known about him. It is likely that his name was actually Michael Denk. (ML I, 419.)

Deutel, Jan Jansz, a bookseller and rhetorician in Hoorn, Holland, where he died before 1657. De Hoop Scheffer counts him among the Mennonites and has placed his writings under Mennonite authors in the catalog of the Amsterdam Mennonite library, but it has been impossible to determine this with certainty. Of his four works, Deutel himself published Eenige Psalmen Davids en geestelyke liederen (Hoorn, 1634) and Huwelykx Weegh-Schael, waerin werdt overghewogen of 't huwelyck goed of quaet is (Hoorn, 1641, reprinted 1662); the others, Avontuerlycke ende gedenkwaerdige Gheschiedenissen (Hoorn, 1666) and Een cort tractaetje tegen de toovery (Hoorn, 1670), were published after his death. In addition he prepared in 1644 an edition of the Klein Hoornsch Liedboek (q.v.), to which he added an appendix of four songs of his own composition, signed with his motto, "Voor al selfs." J.L.

Deutsch-Kazun, a Mennonite village and congregation in Poland, located near Modlin below Warsaw on the left bank of the Vistula, was founded in 1776. Judging from the family names, the congregation seems to have been formed largely by emigrants from the churches at Culm and Graudenz (from Gruppe, Ewert, Kopper, Bartel; from Obernessau, Janz, Kerber, Balzer, Stobbe; from Grosswerder, Kliewer, Schröder, Penner). The old church, built in 1823, was torn down in 1891 because it was threatened by the floods of the Vistula. The new church, dedicated Oct. 30, 1892, was built with all the other buildings of the village behind a protective dam. In the years preceding World War I, the congregation numbered 548 souls, of whom 375 were baptized members. More than half lived in the village of Kazun. In 1940 the baptized membership was 260, with 144 unbaptized children.

A church record begun in 1834 indicates that the congregation was once much larger, for in 1846 there were 28 baptismal candidates and in 1851 even 38. Twenty to 25 were usual. In the 1860's a decline set in. The age of the candidates for baptism varied from 13 to 17. Deutsch-Kazun had 10 subsidiary congregations. All of them suffered in varying degrees from World War I. The church was destroyed in the war and rebuilt in 1924. For a year the entire membership was removed to the Deutsch-Wymysle congregation, 50 miles to the south.

In 1923 a Mennonite Brethren congregation was organized at Kazun subsidiary to the M.B. congregation at Deutsch-Wymysle.

The anti-German feeling in Poland after World War I, conditioned in part by Polish national feeling connected with the reconstruction of Poland as a national state, intensified by the rising tide of German nationalism accompanying the Hitler regime in Germany after 1933, plus the deliberate propagandizing by the National-Socialist movement's foreign section, made the situation of German enclaves like Deutsch-Kazun increasingly difficult. Added to this was the fact that most of the members of the congregation lived within the area of the ring of forts surrounding Warsaw, particularly the fortress Modlin. When therefore the German air force bombed Modlin in the early days of the German attack on Poland, September 1939, it was inevitable that the Kazun Mennonites should suffer. Five Mennonite homes were destroyed, and seven members were killed by an air attack Sept. 22, 1939. The Poles, naturally bitter because of the German attack, were brutally harsh toward the Germans in their midst. On Sept. 7, 1939, the elder of the church, Rudolf Bartel (ordained 1912), was shot by Polish soldiers, together with seven other members. All the remaining males of the congregation, 17-60 years of age, were interned in the Bereza-Katuska prison near Brest-Litovsk, soon to be released as the result of the German conquest of Poland. The reconquest of Poland by the Russian armies meant the liquidation of the congregation in 1945 by flight in part and by expulsion for those who remained. Wilhelm Schröder and Elder Leonard Ewert found their way into Germany. The fate of Peter Schröder and Eduard Schröder is unknown. W.K., H.S.B.

Deutsch-Wymysle (Poland). In 1762 Mennonite emigrants from the West Prussian congregations of Przechovka near Schwetz (q.v.), and of Montau-Gruppe (q.v.) near Graudenz made their way upstream into Poland and settled here in the province of Warsaw, district Gostynin, not far from the town of Gobin, and founded the Deutsch-Wymysle village and congregation. In 1764 a second group arrived from Przechovka. In 1818-20 and 1823-24 a further considerable influx came from Przechovka and the Brenkenhoffswalde-Franztal congregation (q.v.). Those who came in these last five years all joined the Deutsch-Wymysle congregation, although they settled for the most part in various villages in the adjacent German Vistula region, such as Piaski, Sordy, Korzykov, Vionczemin, Novosiadlo, Sviniary, Leonor Lyck, Piotrkovek, Lady, Arciechov, Januszev, and Sladov. Family names found among these immigrants were Balzer, Bartel, Block, Büller, Dirks, Dyck, Ediger, Ekkert, Frey, Funk, Geddert, Gerbrandt, Gertz, Görtz, Heier, Jantz, Kasper, Kliewer, Kraft, Kühn, Luther, Lyhrmann, Nachtigall, Nehring, Nickel, Pauls, Penner, Ratzlaff, Schmidt, Schröder, Unruh, Voth, Wedel, and Wilms.

The center of the Mennonite congregation of Deutsch-Wymysle was always located in the village of the same name until its dissolution on Jan. 18, 1945. A chapel and a school were built here between 1764 and 1770. Sometime between 1860 and 1864 the church burned down, destroying the original records of the congregation. It was soon rebuilt of tile with a tin roof. This meetinghouse was renovated after World War I, so that it looked quite new inside and out. The name of the original founder of the congregation is unknown to the writer; the names of some of the older elders were Wedel, Frey, Peter Buller, Benjamin Unruh, Jakob Voth, Johann Kliewer, and Johann Schmidt. Bernhard Voth served as deacon for 35 years, and was followed by Heinrich Unruh.

From time to time some families moved to Volhynia and South Russia. Since the 1870's many members of this congregation migrated to America, especially from the Vistula region. Up to that time the congregation had about 300 baptized members; after that the membership continued to decline. In 1883 many members transferred their membership to the Mennonite Brethren congregation, which was founded here through the influence of the Mennonite Brethren of Russia. Elder Jakob Voth died young. His successors, Johann Kliewer and Johann Schmidt, joined the Mennonite Brethren. Thereafter there was no further ordination of a Mennonite elder. The small remaining Mennonite congregation was served by the ministers Peter Kliewer, Peter Foth, and Jakob Foth. Only for baptism and communion services was it served by the elder of Deutsch-Kasun.

The first transfer of membership to the Mennonite Brethren occurred in 1883, when Heinrich Kliewer of Deutsch-Wymysle and Benjamin Schmidt of Arciechov joined that brotherhood and were rebaptized in Friedensfeld in South Russia. From that time on new members were won nearly every year by Elder Jakob Janz of Friedensfeld, and preachers Nickel, H. Peters, and others of the Wymysle congregation were baptized in the Vistula and united with the Mennonite Brethren. Thus a subsidiary of the Mennonite Brethren congregation in Friedensfeld was established in Deutsch-Wymysle in 1884, which was led by Heinrich Kliewer until 1891.

On Nov. 6, 1891, Peter Ratzlaff was baptized by H. Peters and admitted into the Mennonite Brethren congregation. Ratzlaff was soon afterward chosen to the ministry and in 1893 to the eldership of the now independent Mennonite Brethren congregation in Deutsch-Wymysle. The first two persons Ratzlaff baptized were Johann Kliewer, the Mennonite elder, and Heinrich Wohlgemuth, on July 17, 1893. Kliewer was soon chosen as minister and coelder of the Mennonite Brethren congregation, and Wohlgemuth as deacon. In 1907 the last elder of the Mennonite congregation, Johann Schmidt, also united with the Mennonite Brethren and was likewise chosen to the ministry by them.

Peter Ratzlaff, Johann Kliewer, Heinrich Wohlgemuth, and Johann Schmidt served the Mennonite Brethren continuously until they were well advanced in years. The worship services of this congregation were held in the home of Heinrich Kliewer until 1894, and from that time until the end of 1914 in the home of Peter Ratzlaff. From that time until 1945 the services for all the Mennonites of the area were held in the Mennonite church; they were led by ministers of the Mennonite Brethren. By the grace of God the two congregations lived in peace and harmony throughout the 30 years.

By emigration to America the Mennonite Brethren also lost many members. At the close of 1914 their congregation had 86 baptized members. In 1920 there were 88. Between 1921 and 1938 new members were added by new converts; a total of 211 members was received during this time, giving the Mennonite Brethren a membership of 175. At the time of the dissolution of Deutsch-Wymysle the Mennonite Brethren membership stood at 157, and that of the Mennonite Church at about half that number.

Peter Ratzlaff died on Oct. 1, 1933. During his lifetime, perhaps between 1930 and 1932, a new elder and ministers were chosen by the congregation and ordained by Ratzlaff. These men were Leonhard Ratzlaff as elder, and Heinrich Wohlgemuth and Gustav Ratzlaff as preachers, and Erich Ratzlaff as deacon. Rudolf Witzke was chosen to lead the Sunday school. The Ratzlaffs chosen were all brothers, the sons of the deceased elder Peter Ratzlaff. Heinrich Wohlgemuth was the son of the deacon Heinrich Wohlgemuth, who died on July 13, 1930. Johann Kliewer died in Wymysle on Jan. 25, 1942. Johann Schmidt moved to Deutsch-Kasun at the end of 1930, where he had charge of the subsidiary Mennonite Brethren congregation, which was organized there in 1923. Other ministers there were Edmund Jantz and Rudolf Kliewer. Johann Schmidt died on Feb. 26, 1936. Of the men chosen to the ministry, Heinrich Wohlgemuth moved to Siemenkovo in the Siepr region in 1935 and joined the Baptists; he died there during the war. Edmund Jantz died in Poland after the collapse in 1946. Rudolf Kliewer was taken to Russia by the Russian army and is still missing. Leonhard Ratzlaff died of exhaustion on Aug. 12, 1946, in Frankfurt-on-the-Oder. Rudolf Witzke was taken to Russia, came back, and died in Stettin on his way to the West. Of the later ministers only Gustav Ratzlaff is still living (1951); he emigrated to Canada in 1948. The deacon Erich Ratzlaff is also in Canada.

Where are all the Deutsch-Wymysle Mennonites today? From May 15, 1947, until Dec. 31, 1950, the following members of the M.B. Church with their families have crossed the ocean:

From the two congregations at Deutsch-Wymysle six young men were drafted into the Polish army before the outbreak of the war. All of them returned. Right after the outbreak of the war 15 more men (old and young) were taken away by the Poles. All of these also returned. Between October 1940 and the end of 1944, 77 young men were drafted into the German army. Fifteen of them fell on the battlefield, and eight are missing (two of them married men). The others returned. On Jan. 16, 1945, ten older men were drafted for defense. Of these, one died in a Polish prison camp, six returned, and three are missing.

After the collapse, Heinrich Foth, a teacher, was murdered in Gostynin by the Poles, and Franz Ratzlaff, a farmer, was so mistreated by the Poles on the unsuccessful flight to the West that he died on the day after his return to Deutsch-Wymysle.

Among those who emigrated from Deutsch-Wymysle to Fernheim, Paraguay, in 1930 was Friedrich Kliewer, who became a leader in the colony, returned to Germany to secure a doctor's degree in pedagogy, and then returned to Fernheim in 1940 to become the principal of the Fernheim high school until 1944. He is now a teacher at Witmarsum, Brazil. (ML I, 420.) R. Foth.

Deutsche Theologie, a booklet written about 1500 by Berthold Pirstinger, Bishop of Chiemsee, Bavaria, and spiritual councilor at the court of the archbishop (not as is generally assumed, by a member of the Friends of God). It was written upon the request of the latter in the monastery of Raitenhaslach near Burghausen. It was the purpose of the booklet to counter the spread of antichurch doctrine, and also to inspire theological thinking among the clergy of Bavaria. It made so profound an impression on Luther when he read a manuscript copy in 1516 that he had it published in 1518 with the title Eyn Deutsch Theologia, das ist ein edles Büchlein von rechtem Verstand, was Adam und Christus sey, und wie Adam in uns sterben und Christus erstehen soll (Wittenberg). In the foreword he says, "With the exception of the Bible and St. Augustine no book has come to my attention from which I learned and shall learn more concerning the nature of God, Christ, man, and all things. . . . God grant that this book may become better known; then they will see that the German theologians are the best theologians." The book went through eleven reprints. Later on Luther, perhaps seeing in it a "source of fanaticism" (L. Keller in Monatshefte der Comeniusgesellschaft, 1902, 147), lost interest in it. A century later it was violently attacked by Lutheran dogmatists as "heresy." The interesting fact remains that the book was zealously distributed by nonchurch circles, such as the Anabaptists, Rosicrucians, Weigelians, and Pietists.

In 1528 it was published in the printing plant of Schöffer in Worms under the title Theologia deutsch. Newlich mit grossem Fleiss corrigiert und gebessert. Etliche Hauptreden einem jeden schüler Christi wol zu studiren. These "Hauptreden" were, as Ludwig Keller proves, written by Hans Denk (q.v.). Apparently Ludwig Haetzer sent them to Schöffer and thus brought about their inclusion in the book. It was a sort of debt of gratitude that he paid for his friend. The two writings were now to begin their course of building God's kingdom together. From now on in most editions of the Deutsche Theologie, of which more than 70 have been counted (Comeniushefte, 1902, 154), Hans Denk's additions have been included. Caspar Schwenkfeld and Sebastian Franck made it their concern to distribute the booklet. Gottfried Arnold speaks favorably of it in his Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie (p. 735). Johann Arndt (q.v.) includes it at the end of his edition of Deutsche Theologie in 1597. Philip Jakob Spener adds it in his appendix to the six editions of Tauler's sermons.

The booklet can be properly understood only if one has read the author's Onus ecclesiae (The Burden of the Church) of 1524. Berthold holds fast to Roman Catholic doctrine. His principal source for the doctrine is Augustine. In sharp but dignified terms he exposes the abuses of the new church, but also sharply criticizes the ills of the old church.

The booklet contains 54 chapters. It proceeds from Paul's statement in I Cor. 13:10, "When that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away." The perfect is God; the creature, the imperfect, must destroy all personal identity and become one with God, to receive the true nature. In Christ God has assumed human nature and man has become divine through Him. This must happen in each individual. As long as man considers the creature and thereby divides humanity into many identities, there is no glimpse into the eternal and no crossing over into the Perfect, unless man abandons sense and reason and forsakes himself. Then he achieves union with God and thus enjoys the highest pleasure.

In the second part the idea of man's becoming unified with God through obedience is further developed. Man is created for obedience. But Adam did not remain in obedience; Christ on the other hand accomplished perfect obedience. Our obedience must become like His; our old man must die, the new one be born; this happens when one denies himself and forsakes everything. Constant practice is needed for this, lest spiritual pride and false liberty rise, which block the way to union with God. The divine human being is much more possessed by spiritual poverty and true humility. This can be learned only of Christ. Only in following Him may one experience that the true liberty, blessedness, and union with God are one.

Jakob Horsch, Mennonite elder in Gelchsheim, Bavaria, published a new edition of the Deutsche Theologie in 1887, which was sold by Ulrich Hege in Reihen (Baden) through the publishers of the Gemeindeblatt (Menn. Bl., 1887, 21, 71). It was done at the urging of the elder's son John Horsch.

Deutsche Westen, Der, was published as a weekly beginning February 1907, by Henry J. Martens, with H. H. Fast as editor, and was printed by the Mennonite Brethren Publishing House, McPherson, Kan. It was a six-column publication, 15 x 22 in. and carried mostly information and articles pertaining to the Mennonites in the prairie states and provinces. In 1910, A. L. Schellenberg became the proprietor and editor. Soon after this the paper was discontinued.

Deutschhof, a Mennonite congregation in the Palatinate, Germany, which included until 1945 the following localities: Deutschhof and Kaplaneihof near Bergzabern, Haftelhof between Bergzabern and Wissembourg, Geisberg and Schafbusch, one hour from Wissembourg, and Niederrödern. The last three are in Alsace, the others in the Palatinate. Since 1945 only the Palatinate communities belong to the Deutschhof congregation. The origin of the church goes back to 1716 when Johannes Krehbiel leased the estate of the Baron of Hatzel at Niederrödern. It later passed into the possession of Prince Max of Zweibrücken, who leased it to Christian Dettweiler (q.v.) in 1788, but during the French Revolution it was confiscated and in 1794 sold at auction, when Krehbiel's descendants acquired it. Today there is only one Mennonite family living there.

In about 1720 we find Mennonites living on Geisberg, a large estate also belonging to the Baron of Hatzel, who apparently favored the Mennonites, for he accepted them as renters of his estates while the decree of Louis XIV of Sept. 12, 1712, banishing the Mennonites was still in force. The first Mennonites living here were Lehmann, Johannes Schowalter, and Daniel Hirschler. In the 1790's the Hirschler family acquired possession of part of the estate. At present all of it except a part of the castle is Mennonite property. Five families occupy the estate.

A quarter hour away is the Schafbusch, a leased estate, which has been in Mennonite hands with few interruptions since the beginning of the 18th century; since 1912 it has been Mennonite property. The first renters were Peter Schowalter, Johannes Müller, and Heinrich Schmitt. They seem to have come at the same time as those at the Geisberg. At any rate a preacher Johannes Borkholder of Schafbusch is mentioned in 1730. No doubt all the renters immigrated from Switzerland (canton of Bern). But it is not certain that they went directly to Niederrödern, Geisberg, and Schafbusch.

The Haftelhof was taken over by Mennonite renters about the middle of the 18th century, namely, by Elias Dettweiler (q.v.) and Jakob (Christian) Schowalter. The former, born in 1735 at Riedselz near Wissembourg, as preacher and elder of the congregation signed the Ibersheim resolutions in 1803. Since 1856 half of the estate has been in Mennonite possession.

Mennonites have been living on the Kaplaneihof since the end of the 18th century. It belonged to the elector Carl Theodore. He sold it in 1787 to Joseph Schowalter of Klein-Bundenbach near Zweibrücken. The name is still represented there by four families.

The Deutschhof came last into the congregation. It was built in 1757. In 1794 it was auctioned by the French government to Jakob Schowalter and Jakob Schmitt of the Haftelhof, who were the first Mennonites on the Deutschhof. In 1796 Jakob Lehmann was also living there. Seven Mennonite families occupy the estate at present.

Until 1848 the Schafbusch was the center of the congregation. When the estate passed into non-Mennonite hands, the services which had been held in their own chapel were discontinued. In 1849 a room was arranged for the purpose on the Geisberg. But the seat of the congregation was from now on the Deutschhof, where a church had been built in 1842. Since the late 1850's services have also been held at the Haftelhof in a hall furnished for the purpose. Services were also held from the beginning in Niederrödern in a private home; in 1875 a small church was built, which is now rarely used. Regular Sunday services were held in rotation on the Deutschhof, Haftelhof, and Geisberg until 1945.

The Deutschhof and Kaplaneihof maintained a school until 1860, when public school attendance was required. There has been a Sunday school since 1861. Each unit has its own cemetery, which is still used. Only Kaplaneihof buries its dead in the local cemetery.

The congregation belongs to the Badischer Verband and to the South German conference, and has been incorporated since 1892. The membership in 1941 was 115, plus 84 unbaptized children. It has never had a trained or salaried minister. The late missionary Hermann Schmitt of the Dutch Mennonite mission in Java, and pastors Otto Schowalter of Hamburg and Paul Schowalter of Weierhof stem from this congregation.

As a result of World War II the congregation has been divided. Geisberg and Schafbusch, lying on the Alsatian side of the border since 1945, form the Geisberg (q.v.) congregation. The Deutschhof church was burned down in the fighting of March 1945, and was rebuilt in October 1949. The present (1952) membership is 100, plus 22 unbaptized children. The ministers are Rudolf Hege (ord. 1921) and August Schowalter (ord. 1937).† (Vol. I) J.F.

De Veer (Defehr, De-Fehr, van der Veer, Devehr, Dever, Fehr, du Verre), a Mennonite family name in Holland (Claes Gysbertsz de Veer was a preacher of the Old Flemish congregation at Amsterdam in 1632-?) and in West Prussia, mainly at Danzig. Gysbert de Veer moved from Amsterdam to Danzig during the 16th century. In 1935, 17 persons of this name were counted in West Prussia (including Elbing). Leading members of the family include Isaac de Veer, elder of the Danzig "Flemish" congregation 1726-39; Jacob de Veer, 1774 minister, 1790-1807 elder of the same congregation, who edited a catechism in 1791 and helped to prepare the first High German songbook in 1780. Members of the family emigrated back to the Netherlands and also to Russia (Chortitza) and subsequently to Canada. Today the name is also represented in Mexico and Paraguay. C. A. De Fehr of Winnipeg, Man., is a lay leader in the M.B. Church. G.R.

Deventer, a city in the Dutch province of Overijssel, 1947 pop. 45,000, with 411 Mennonites, the seat of a Mennonite congregation. The Anabaptists made their first appearance here in the 1530's. The first phase of Anabaptism in this city was of a revolutionary character, under the direct influence of Münster and later of Batenburg (q.v.). The cry of the New Jerusalem in Münster appealed to the lowly as well as the upper classes, promising the baptized and the elect a happy life under the dominion of Christ. Hille van Renssen, a widow, Aleid ten Poorten and Lubbe van Wijnssen, as well as her brothers, the mayor Jacob van Wijnssen, and Johan van Wijnssen de Jonge, W. Jurriaen, an apothecary, and several others went to Münster in 1533-34, and were baptized either in Deventer or in Münster. Upon their return to Deventer government authorities arrested them or banished them from the city. Jacob van Wijnssen and five other Anabaptists were beheaded on de Brink (a square) in February 1535, and Fenne, the wife of the notorious leader Jan van Geelen (q.v.), was drowned in April. Nevertheless the doctrine continued in secret, despite the repeated proclamations of the government, and after 1540 showed itself in the revolutionary following of Batenburg and later of the mystical David Joris (q.v.). Jurriaen Ketel (q.v.), the publisher of Joris' Wonderboek, was beheaded for this publication on Aug. 9, 1539, and the printer Dirk van Borne (q.v.) was arrested with Albert Paffraedt, who had printed several tracts by David Joris. They were released six months later when they had proved their faithfulness to the Catholic Church.

After this repression, Anabaptism was hardly felt in Deventer until about 1570, when religious strife was renewed and in March 1571, 12 peaceful Mennonites, six men and six women, were dragged from their homes by the Spanish soldiers and imprisoned, at times racked and finally beheaded or burned by the Inquisition. Most of them valiantly persisted in their faith (Mart. Mir. D 552 ff., E 885 ff.). When Deventer was freed from the Spanish yoke in 1578, the Mennonites again appeared there and held secret meetings, although this was forbidden by the magistrate. Their refusal to serve as armed guards gave rise to some brief difficulties in 1580. Quietly and little noticed by the world they continued to hold their meetings, living on a high moral plane, withdrawn from the world. Incited by intolerant Reformed preachers, the government forbade their meetings in 1619, 1620, 1623, 1628, 1652, 1663, and 1670. But these regulations were never seriously carried out. In 1651 the States-General passed a ruling in the Naerder Unie stating that though the Mennonites were among the groups excluded from the protection of the government, they were to be quietly tolerated. At that time they had in Deventer two congregations, one of the Old Flemish, which met in the home of their preacher Abraham Willemsz Cremer (q.v.), and one of High and United Flemish, who had Jan ten Cate as their preacher and met in the home of Ananias Willink. The Reformed found this toleration of the Mennonites offensive, and in 1669-70 tried to turn the government against them with charges of Socinianism, with the proposal that the Mennonites be required to answer 12 questions as a test. The result was that many polemics were printed, bringing new government prohibition of their meetings, which was, however, not seriously enforced.

For the free exercise of their religion they paid 3,000 Reichstaler in 1672-74, when Deventer was occupied by the armies of the Catholic bishops of Cologne and Münster. In 1690 they acquired release from civil defense by purchasing and presenting to the city two fire engines, which were operated throughout the 18th century by Mennonites, and which are now in the Deventer museum. They were several times refused admittance into the guilds, and were forbidden to perform marriages in their church (provision of 1670). But this was the last act of unfriendliness on the part of the government. In 1711 many Swiss Mennonite refugees were lodged in Deventer and later given homes.

The two congregations united in 1720, after several members had withdrawn and moved to Hoogezand (q.v.) in the province of Groningen on account of growing worldliness in the Deventer congregation. The congregation developed quietly. They made large gifts to their brethren in Poland, Lithuania, and Danzig, as well as to non-Mennonites, such as the Reformed refugees from Frankfurt in 1685. They sometimes also received large legacies. As late as 1662 they had to contribute such a legacy to the city for poor relief. In 1627, surprisingly, a deaconess was in charge of the care of the poor; this office was later given to a brother. Slight misunderstandings such as on the wearing of the periwig were settled on a friendly basis. The Old Flemish congregation had bought a church in the Korte Assenstraat in 1687, which was used until 1892. Baptism and communion were usually conducted by elders from Groningen. In 1761 the congregation called its first theologically educated minister; he was Hendrik Waerma. He was succeeded by Wybo Fijnje, 1774-76; Jacob Kuiper, 1775-1821; J. H. Halbertsma, 1821-56; H. ten Cate Hoedemaker, 1856-89; S. Lulofs, 1889-1902; A. H. van Drooge, 1902-39; and H. P. Tulner, 1939- . In 1797 the hitherto conservative congregation added an organ.

At present the congregation meets every Sunday in a beautiful church in the Penninckhoek on de Brink, which replaced the old church in 1891. It has never been large, but increased in membership in the 19th century. At the time of the union of the two congregations in 1720 there were about 40 members; in 1784, 37; 1840, 80; 1898, 255; 1950, 325. The congregation has very rich archives. It has a Sunday school for children, a missionary sewing circle, a young people's organization, and choir.

Deverakonda (India), a Mennonite Brethren mission station, is located 65 miles southeast of Hyderabad. Evangelistic work was begun in this area by J. H. Voth in 1913 and government sanction for a mission station was obtained in 1918. On the premises procured, the following main buildings have been erected: two residences for missionaries, church and school building, hostels for school boys and school girls, hospital, and Bible school quarters.

Resident missionaries who have been stationed here for a longer period of time are the J. H. Voths, P. V. Balzers, J. A. Wiebes, Mary C. Wall, Helen L. Warkentin, and Rosella Toews. Among the activities of note on the station are the various church services, the work in the hospital, the conducting of a middle and primary boarding school, and of a Bible School since 1946. The Deverakonda station field, which comprises an area of 1,200 square miles and has a population of 200,000, has many outstations and a total communicant church membership of 3,000.

Devotional Covering: see Prayer Veiling.

Devotional Literature, Anabaptist and Mennonite. This term includes any religious book other than strictly doctrinal or theological works, intended to be used mainly for home devotion, that is, for meditation and prayer and also for uplift (edification). Books of this kind might further be used to strengthen the spirit in times of temptation and weakness, or to confirm one's own stand in an adverse situation, or to clarify one's faith by outline —confessions and catechisms. In short, all these books serve the practice of an inner rather than an external (ecclesiastical) devotion of an earnest believer; i.e., they support his "pious exercise of the mind," as it occasionally was termed. To this category of devotionoal literature belong prayer books, Bible stories, books for daily meditation, allegorical writings (e.g., the pilgrimage tot the eternal city); documents of particular experiences such as epistles, testimonies, diaries, and also chronicles, and so forth; hymnals; catechisms; and a host of small and large tracts of all kinds. Finally, also printed sermon collections must be counted among these books though often they were used not only for domestic but also for ecclesiastical purposes.

The English term "devotional literature" is wider than the corresponding German word Erbauungsliteratur (edificatory literature), which has a strong emotional tinge. The English word is more general, while Erbauung suggests a certain "pietistic" tendency. Thus Karl Holl's contention that a devotional literature did not come into full development until the time of Pietism (q.v.) during the second half of the 17th century, remains a controversial statement. Home devotion is as old as Christianity, and aids to it such as prayer books and books of meditation are not only well known during the Middle Ages but became a particularly popular literature with the coming of the Protestant Reformation. The Hortulus Animae (Seelengärtlein, pleasant garden of the soul) is a very old and tested type of such devotional literature, and there is no church in Christianity without printed prayer collections. The old prayer book by Habermann (1567), for instance, became a particularly well-liked manual in Lutheran Germany and soon found entrance also among Mennonite groups. It is, however, true that the entire character of home devotion changed with the centuries, and that with the rise of Pietism proper, the need for such printed aids vastly increased (books up to 2,000 pages became common) while the quality, the concreteness of the faith expressed, was clearly lowered.

Mennonites were no exception to this general trend. They produced devotional books as had their 16th-century Anabaptist forefathers. It must, however, be stressed that the entire Anabaptist-Mennonite devotional literature is rather small as compared with that of the dominant Protestant denominations (Lutheran and Reformed). The main devotional book of the Anabaptists and Mennonites was, and still is, the Bible; all the rest are but auxiliary to it. Mennonite devotional literature is almost completely devoid of books for daily meditation (they later borrowed them from the Pietists), of diaries (such as the Methodists cherish), of mystical journals (like those of the Quakers G. Fox, John Woolman, etc.), and of pious novels (like those by Jung-Stilling, q.v., which were so much favored by the Mennonites later on). On the other hand, the writings of Menno Simons and Dirk Philips were in the deepest sense devotional literature. Though doctrinal, they were not systematically theological, like, e.g., Calvin's.

To secure an adequate understanding of Mennonite (and Anabaptist) devotional literature, one must organize the entire material into great periods according to the centuries which produced it. The 16th century (Anabaptist) was a time of concreteness and sternness in matters of faith, while the emotional element was given little attention. Confessions of faith, testimonies such as Rechenschaften and Verantwortungen, and martyrs' epistles including their background story, prevailed. The 17th century showed a decided change. The great spiritual upheaval, so to speak, was over, and denominations became more or less settled. Creedal orthodoxy and the adjunct systematic theology on the one side, emotional inwardness and subjectivity (the beginning of Pietism proper) on the other side, became typical for this century. Moreover, a rationalistic and ethical Christianity came more and more to the fore, likewise influencing the literature of devotion. The 18th century, finally, saw this Protestant emotionalism and subjectivism in full, even rampant flowering. The "confessional Christianity" of the beginning made room for an emotional, mystical, or ethical appreciation of the revealed truth. "Godliness" became the key word of the new piety and its literature. The individual was of greater importance than the brotherhood.

Devotional literature of the 16th century. Confessional writings (Bekenntnisschriften) stand first in this survey. Books like Menno Simons' Foundation of Christian Doctrine (1539) or Dirk Philips' Enchiridion or Handbook (1564) were widely read in Dutch as well as in German translation by the varied groups of Mennonites in the North and Anabaptists of South Germany. The distinction between devotional and doctrinal literature (q.v.) was not yet as sharply drawn as in the 17th century since even outspoken doctrinal books were not yet of a systematic theology type but rather of a testimonial character. The Hutterites, likewise, had a number of Rechenschaften and other confessional writings which show the same border quality (see Riedemann, Walpot). Next to this confessional reading material come the religious tracts which abounded in the great period of rising Anabaptism. Volumes V and VII of the Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica (1909-11) contain a fine collection of such tracts, all too little studied as yet, although the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen contain numerous studies of the earlier Dutch Mennonite literature. Likewise Lydia Müller's Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter (1938) contains tracts of this nature. J. C. Wenger has translated a number of such early tracts taken from a unique Sammelband (MQR 1945-47). A further category of 16th-century devotional literature is the epistles of the brethren, primarily the martyrs' epistles (see Epistles, Anabaptist). They represent the devotional reading proper among the Swiss and Hutterite Brethren. There was very little emotionalism and Pietism in them but rather the expression of a concrete and practical Christianity by which they lived. They exhort the addressees to remain steadfast in faith and to trust God's promise. Finally, the brethren loved to read and to hear about their great forerunners who suffered martyrdom for conscience' sake. Pamphlets like that which told the story of Michael Sattler (q.v.) or that which recorded Thomas von Imbroich's farewell circulated widely among all groups. Above all, the Hutterite great chronicle (Gross-Geschichtsbuch) is a living example of the chief interest of the Brethren. It was not only a historical record of the past, nor a mere reading for private edification, but a book intended to be studied and followed and abided by in its major truths. The codices of the Hutterites contain a great number of still another type of devotional reading not strictly deriving from their own kin. They accepted Hans Denk, Balthasar Hubmaier, Langenmantel, Salminger, and many more of the so-called "spiritual reformers" (q.v.) readily if their writings suited the general need. No study has yet been published regarding the immense scope of this handwritten devotional material.

Devotional literature of the 17th century. Now the picture changed to a large extent. The great tide of Anabaptism receded. In Holland and northern Germany Mennonites became an increasingly settled denomination of well-to-do middle-class people, while the rural Swiss Brethren barely maintained their existence in Switzerland or the Palatinate, lacking altogether major leaders. Formalism and Pietism could not create a devotional literature of any significance. The same was true of the Hutterites, although they had at least one outstanding man, the Vorsteher Andreas Ehrenpreis (d. 1665, q.v.), who gave new impulses to their weakened faith. His tract, Ein Sendbrief . . . brüderliche Gemeinschaft, das höchste Gebot der Liebe betreffend (1652), is one of the finest products of 17th-century Anabaptism (printed edition, Scottdale, 1920). The most outstanding type of religious literature of 17th-century Mennonitism is to be found in the martyr books (q.v.). Building upon the great first model, Het Offer des Heeren (1562), they were more and more developed in subsequent editions by different editors and their groups, culminating finally in the outstanding work of the 17th-century Mennonites, van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (1660). The significance of this book for Mennonites is beyond discussion, yet in the present context it is a question not easily decided whether the book served primarily as a devotional reader for private edification according to the new piety, or rather as a book of examples to be emulated, such as the 16th-century pamphlets or the Hutterite Chronicle were intended to be. After all, the old spirit of the "suffering church" in a hostile world was by no means completely dead but lingered on through the centuries.

The question is not restricted to the Martyrs' Mirror. Ludwig Keller (Joh. Staupitz . . . , 395) observed that the old Anabaptist tracts and epistles which had completely disappeared in the later 16th century, suddenly experienced a revival around 1610-20. The writings of Denk, Salminger, Entfelder, Bünderlin, etc., now found new publishers and readers, and rarely did a single edition satisfy the demand. Apparently they were now read with new eyes; what once meant a confessional testimony now became an Erbauungsschrift, a book of edification, interpreted in the spirit of the new piety (namely, without the urge to follow such a concrete and often dangerous faith). The anonymously published collections of Anabaptistica, Geistliches Blumengärtlein (Amsterdam, 1680), and Güldene Aepffel in Silbern Schalen (Basel?, 1702), give ample evidence of this new predilection for Anabaptist literature made undynamic. Gottfried Arnold's great Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie (1699), the outstanding link between Anabaptism and Pietism, then presented large excerpts from Anabaptist sources to its pious readers.

In the Netherlands the new type of undynamic devotional literature begins earlier than with Mennonites and Anabaptists anywhere else. Pieter Pietersz (q.v.) 1625 and J. P. Schabalie (q.v.) 1635 are among the first Mennonite authors who provided their church with devotional reading material of a new style. A very popular devotional "manual" was produced by T. T. van Sittert (q.v.) in 1664, called Glaubensbekenntnis . . . , following a Prussian Mennonite model of 1660. In Hamburg, Gerhard Roosen produced around the turn of the century a most popular catechism of the Mennonites, the Christliches Gemüthsgespräch (q.v.) 1702, together with other devotional reading material entitled Unschuld und Gegenbericht, 1702, pleading for the complete harmlessness of the Mennonite position.

The 17th century also saw the intrusion of a large amount of non-Mennonite literature into Mennonite homes, both in the Netherlands and in Germany. From Johannes Arndt's Wahres Christentum (1605) and Paradiesgärtlein (1612) to Gottfried Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzer-Historie (1699), a long line of (Lutheran) devotional material became more and more the favorite reading with South German and Swiss Brethren. This type of literature then increased during the 18th century when Mennonites deviated still further from their original path, opening hearts and minds to this new kind of piety of the enjoyment of one's certain salvation after having overcome sin and reached a state of sanctification.

The late 17th and 18th centuries were characterized by a strange antagonism of rationalism (e.g., Socinianism, Arminianism, Collegiant groups) on the one side, and emotionalism (pietism, mysticism, quietism) on the other side, both replacing the former simple but concrete Biblicism of the Brethren. The Catalogus of the Mennonite library at Amsterdam has a very large section on such Stichtelijke lectuur (edificatory reading), and one of the Mennonite historical libraries in the United States has considerable collections of non-Mennonite German devotional reading material collected from Mennonite homes, once eagerly read (as many signs indicate) but today completely unknown and ignored. Hardly any work of lasting significance was produced during this period by the Swiss or South Germans, with the exception of the Ernsthafte Christenpflicht (q.v.), the Palatinate prayer book of 1739. Apparently the genius of Anabaptism did not fit into this new piety, and the lack of such tradition resulted in borrowing and adjustments to something which was essentially foreign. The great Lutheran prayer book by J. F. Starck, 1727, Madame Guyon's meditations, Carl Heinrich von Bogatzky's Güldenes Schatzkästlein der Kinder Gottes, 1718 (65th edition 1904), Jung-Stilling's mystical novels, and many more such books were now found in almost every Mennonite preacher's library, not to speak of the many bulky sermon collections, Mennonite and non-Mennonite. The most remarkable non-Mennonite book, however, adopted and assimilated into an everyday devotional book (of the Amish), is the Geistliches Lustgärtlein (originating around 1770), otherwise completely unnoticed in reference works and of uncertain background. It, too, is a kind of Hortulus Animae, with an extreme moralistic first part, the Heilsame Anweisungen und Regeln eines gottseligen Lebens. Sermon collections likewise increased in size and popularity. They were read from the pulpit but also used for home devotion. Joost Hendricxs, Tieleman van Braght, Willem Wynands, Joannes Deknatel, Jakob Denner, and many more Dutch preachers competed in this prolific production with non-Mennonite authors.

The 19th and 20th centuries of European Mennonite devotional production was rather insignificant. Ellenberger's Bilder aus dem Pilgerleben (1878-83) and Bernhard Harder's Geistliche Lieder (1888) might deserve mention (Ellenberger was a Palatinate preacher and Harder belonged to the Molotschna Mennonite Church in Russia). The main interest shifted more readily to historical studies of a pragmatic character.

Mennonites in the United States were not too creative either. Bishop Henry Funk's Spiegel der Taufe (1744) and Restitution (1763) are the only new books which came out of the 18th century, while Christian Burkholder's Anrede an die Jugend (1804) and A. Godshalk's New Creature (1838) remained for a long time the only new additions to the stock of books brought over from the old countries. Reprints of all these older books occurred in due time (mainly in Pennsylvania, later in Elkhart, Ind.), but the creative inspiration of a great past had died out completely, giving way to a traditional, often dry, formalism or to a new urge for historical appreciation of the things that once had filled the forefathers with so much faith and daring.

Surveying the entire field, certain generalizations are suggested by this array of books: while the piety of the great period of the 16th-century Anabaptists and Mennonites was dominated by the principle of the "fear of God" whose Word had to be obeyed, later periods softened this attitude, replacing it more and more by the principle of "godliness" (Gottseligkeit). The stern consciousness of obedience to God ("that He might be satisfied with us")—a challenge to the world—gradually changed into a mild enjoyment of the certainty that the faithful (or reborn) one is saved and now in God's grace. That is, the content of the new and individualistic piety was no longer "Anabaptist" in character. Bekenntnis-Christentum (confessional Christianity) has given way to a conventional Christianity, and the intimate brotherhood has changed into a conventicle of separate individuals. The devotional literature, however, may be regarded as the true mirror of all these transitions and as an indicator of the spiritual life of the church and its members.

Sources: Most of the material discussed can be found today in the Mennonite historical libraries where it found a deposit after it was no longer used by the English-speaking churches. In the present article neither hymnals (q.v.) nor catechisms (q.v.) are treated. The original devotional literature of the Mennonites in Russia (since 1789) seems to be rather small and secondary to non-Mennonite literature used. For that reason it was left untouched in this rapid survey; P. M. Friesen's comprehensive Brüderschaft gives little information in this field.

R. Friedmann, Menn. Piety Through the Centuries (Goshen, 1949), Part II, deals with Mennonite devotional literature 1600-1800, covering Holland, Danzig, Hamburg-Altona, Swiss Brethren, and America, with separate treatments of Mennonite prayer books and non-Mennonite devotional literature used by Mennonites. As to the literature during the 16th century see in addition to the articles refered to above, R. Friedmann, "The Schleitheim Confession and Other Doctrinal Writings of the Swiss Brethren in a Hitherto Unknown Edition," MQR XVI (1942). J. C. Wenger has translated from this edition a number of tracts in the MQR 1947-48 and plans to continue. Lydia Müller's Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter, 1938, and BRN V-VII (1909-11); Keller, Reformation, has thoroughly studied the little-known tracts, as have Rembert, Wappler, and Rufus M. Jones after him. W. Wiswedel's Bilder und Führergestalten aus dem Täufertum (Cassel, I, 1928; II, 1930; III, 1952) and many later essays also contain good material still to be studied. Deyevka: see Orenburg Mennonite Settlement.

Deyevka Mennonite Church, Orenburg settlement (q.v.), Russia, was a subsidiary of the Chortitza Mennonite Church in the Ukraine, founded in 1894. Abram Olfert of Kanzerovka was chosen as the first minister. The elder of Neu-Samara performed the functions of elder until Aug. 16, 1899, when Abram Penner of Nikolaevka was ordained to that office. After that time the congregation was independent, but remained in close contact with the mother church.

One of the outstanding ministers was the aged Jakob Rempel, who was always ready to encourage the downhearted and calm the impulsive. He stood firmly on the basis of the unity of all God's children. The democratic, fraternal attitude of the older ministers to the younger newly ordained ones was also a good influence in the congregation. Thus the church grew until 1907.

At that time discord over the location of the proposed Zentralschule arose between the elder with two or three ministers on one hand, and the remaining ministers on the other hand, which soon spread to the congregation. After about three years a large part of the membership demanded the withdrawal of Elder Penner from active service. He therefore retired, but kept the title of elder. Johann Bärgmann of Nikolaevka served the Deyevka congregation as elder about two years, until Heinrich Rempel was chosen to that office. Rempel served for about 12 years (1911-23?) until his death by tuberculosis. During this period came the revival through the agency of J. J. Peters.

On March 29, 1925, Isaak Krahn was chosen to the office of elder. He was a teacher by profession, and had served as minister since 1911, was very talented and strong of will. By that time the Red government was already a power to be reckoned with. Church organization became weaker and functioned with difficulty. Elder Krahn was strongly opposed to emigration. In 1930 he was banished to the Solovetski Islands in the White Sea for a period of ten years. It is thought that he survived the experience, but exact information is lacking.

Many of the members of the congregation went through similar experiences; some were released on certain conditions. Worship services ceased. Only pastoral care could be continued to a certain degree in secret. Dietrich Lepp of Deyevka was apparently an exception, for a letter of 1935 indicated that people were surprised that he was still performing full ministerial service (baptism and communion) for the congregation of Deyevka. But two years later he himself wrote that he had changed his address, but could not reveal the reason. He had been compelled to work very hard, and had broken two ribs by carrying a heavy load. As a consequence of this accident he died in 1939 at the age of 82.

Until 1926 the congregation at Deyevka had been served by about 25 ordained brethren. Three had come to the place as ordained ministers; the others were chosen there. Six were lost through death, three by moving away, and two by change of church membership. The congregation had a membership of about 1,300.

The relations between the Deyevka Mennonite Church and the Mennonite Brethren left much to be desired but gradually improved, especially during the Soviet rule.

Deyl, Samuel van, Dutch Mennonite preacher of the Flemish branch. He was chosen preacher in a somewhat irregular way during a schism of the congregation at Utrecht on July 3, 1664. How long he served in Utrecht is not known, but in May 1666 he was named as a preacher of the Flemish congregation of Leiden. In May 1671 he left Leiden and moved to Amsterdam, where he served 1671-87. Together with Samuel Apostool (q.v.), the well-known Zonist elder of Amsterdam, he published a catechetical booklet, Waerheydts-oeffeningh tot bevorderinge van kennis en godtsaligheydt (Amsterdam, 1677). vdZ.

Dhamtari, pop. 17,278, an important town in the Raipur District, Madhya Pradesh, India. It is headquarters for the Dhamtari Tahsil, a political division comparing approximately to a county in the United States. Its importance lies also in the fact that it is the terminus of a narrow-gauge railway line from Raipur, 50 miles to the north on the main Bombay-Calcutta line of the Bengal Nagpur railway. From here roads radiate to the south, east, and west, so that Dhamtari becomes the trading and shipping center for points 100 and more miles distant. Among the goods shipped from Dhamtari are forest products such as timber, shellac, morabulum nuts and biri (cigarette) leaves, along with rice, hides, and other farm produce.

Dhamtari is the headquarters of the Mennonite Church (MC) in India (successor to the American Mennonite Mission), established in 1899 and merged with the church organization in 1952. There is here a congregation of 558 members, worshiping in a large brick church. The Dhamtari Christian Academy, Dhamtari Christian Hospital, Samuel Burkhard Memorial Boys' Orphanage, and a nursing school are church-mission institutions located here. J.D.G.

Dhamtari Christian Academy, an educational institution of the Mennonite Church (MC) in India (formerly the American Mennonite Mission), opened in 1931, consisting of high school, middle school, normal training, and primary practicing school departments; located in Dhamtari, Madhya Pradesh, India. It is coeducational with total enrollment of 595 in all departments, excluding practicing school. Of this total 462 are boys and 133 are girls. In addition 118 boys and 73 girls, total 191, are enrolled in the primary practicing school, making the grand total of pupils in all departments 786. Thirty-one teachers, 21 men, 10 women, make up the teaching staff. The following have served as principal since the beginning of the Academy: E. E. Miller, 1931-37; J. D. Graber, 1937-38; S. M. King, 1938-44; Wilbur Hostetler, 1944-46; J. N. Kaufman, 1946-47; S. M. King, 1947-53; J. W. Samida, 1953- .

The Academy fits into the school plan of the province as follows: years 1-4, primary; 5-8, middle; 9-11, high. Normal training is a two-year course corresponding to years 9 and 10, and graduates qualify for primary level teaching certificate.

The American Mennonite mission maintained primary schools and at least one middle and high school as well as a Bible school from the earliest years. In 1931 the Academy was organized combining the various schools into an integrated institution. The normal training department was closed in 1946 but reopened in 1951. The special year of Bible study was discontinued in 1946 and Bible classes are combined with the regular curricula in the various departments. The church co-operates with Bible schools and seminaries in other areas to provide special Christian worker training. (See Mennonite Church in India.) J.D.G.

Dhamtari Medical Station of the American Mennonite Mission (MC) and the Mennonite Church in India is situated about a mile northwest of the city of Dhamtari, Madhya Pradesh, India. The buildings in Sundarganj, a suburb of Dhamtari, became too small to meet the need after the arrival of Dr. C. D. Esch in 1911. In 1912 the mission purchased the present site and built a medical dispensary and huts for patients. The medical missionary's bungalow was finished in 1913. The work of the medical station grew to such proportions that lines of wards for the hospitalized, an enlarged dispensary with laboratory, operating rooms, examination and dispensing rooms, and clinical facilities were added and an X-ray machine installed.

The poor are given rooms without charge, while wealthier patients are glad to pay for the service. In this ministry of healing religious teaching is given in daily devotional services with the sick, with an appeal to accept Christ as their Saviour. Christian literature is put at the disposal of patients and visitors. Prayer is always offered at the side of the patient on the operating table before operating.

During recent years the whole medical program of the mission was co-ordinated, so that all mission dispensaries are under the supervision of the medical missionaries. The medical station remained the medical center with station dispensaries as outposts, all to relieve the sick and to bring Christ to the people and the people to Christ.

The ministry of healing as a mission of pure love, usually without remuneration, has meant more to the Christian work in India than can be calculated. It has helped the Christians cast off their faith in witch doctors and medicine men. It has also given definite teaching on sanitation, the dangers of quackery and harmful drugs, the need for prompt and scientific treatment, and has offered sympathetic help for the ills of both mind and body. G.J.L.

Dialect, a local or provincial form of a major language differing from the standard or literary language. Dialects are usually sister languages of the ancestor of the modern standard form, which was at some point in history elevated to that status. Thus the basis of literary German (Hochsprache or Schriftsprache, popularly known as High German) is an elevation of the dialect or local forms used by Luther in his German translation of the Bible, giving its descendant its status as the accepted literary language of all German-speaking peoples. It is therefore difficult to draw a sharp distinction between a "dialect" and a "language." All the early Anabaptist literature is written in the particular dialect of the area which produced it. Many of these works are therefore valuable in the field of linguistics, an outstanding illustration being the Hutterite chronicles (q.v.), particularly in the Zieglschmid editions.

Among the dialects widely used by the Mennonites of Dutch and North German origins is Low German (q.v.) or Plattdeutsch. Mennonites took this dialect to Russia and from there to Canada, the prairie states, Mexico, and other countries in Latin America, where it is used in many homes today. (See also Oosters.)

The majority of American Mennonites living east of the Mississippi River until a generation ago used the Pennsylvania-German (q.v.) dialect. The Old Order Amish Mennonites use it almost exclusively in their family and social life, and to a certain extent in their church services. Eastern Pennsylvania Mennonites and other Mennonites of Amish background are generally familiar with this dialect, often referred to as the Pennsylvania Dutch. The dialect was brought to America by the immigrants from southwestern Germany, chiefly the Palatinate.

Mennonites in Switzerland have always used Swiss-German (q.v.) dialects and immigrants from that country have transplanted their mother tongue to Ohio, Indiana, and other states where they have settled. Today in the Swiss-German Mennonite communities of those states, the older generation has retained a limited knowledge of the language. An Alsatian German dialect is used by Mennonites in Alsace and immigrants from that area brought it to America, where it, however, unlike other Mennonite dialects in America, has almost completely disappeared. Other dialects spoken by Mennonites in Europe and transferred to America by immigrants include Galician (basically Palatine and Alsatian), Volhynian (a modification of Galician), and Hutterite (basically Carinthian). This treatise, found in the archives of the Mennonite congregation at Amsterdam (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 635), is a manuscript of about 1590, containing 38 pages, in which the opponent and unknown author shows himself as an antagonist of the practice of marriage with a person who did not belong to the church, which the Waterlanders tolerated and which P. W. Bogaert (q.v.) had defended shortly before. Presumably this paper was intended to be printed, but no printed copy is known. vdZ.

Diamond Rock Mennonite Meetinghouse (MC) was formerly located near Cedar Hollow in Tredyffrin Twp., Chester Co., Pa. It was also known as "Beidler's" and "Chester Valley." The building was razed in 1927.

Jacob Beidler of Bucks County settled on a farm near Valley Forge about 1802. In 1835 he had an important part in building the Diamond Rock Meetinghouse about one-half mile west of his home. After his death in 1864 it appears that no services were held there until 1908, when an attempt was made to revive the work. Preaching services were alternated between the Lancaster and Franconia conferences, and a Sunday school was organized. In 1910 this work was transferred to Frazer, which resulted in the founding of the congregation at that place under the Lancaster Conference.

Israel Beidler, the son of the founder of Diamond Rock Meetinghouse, held preaching services alternately at Phoenixville and Diamond Rock under the direction of the Eastern District Conference (GCM) for some time after 1847. Q.L.

Diamond Street Mennonite Church (MC), 1814 Diamond St., Philadelphia, Pa., is a mission work among the Colored, begun July 1, 1935, at 191 West Dauphin St., and was known at first as the Mennonite Mission for the Colored. Sponsored by the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC), the work was transferred to Diamond Street in 1942. In 1954 Luke G. Stoltzfus was pastor and Emma Rudy and Alma Ruth, mission workers. A large number of Colored children were being reached through Bible teaching activities held in homes, open lots, and in the mission. The total baptized membership, including workers, was 19. C.Y.F.

Dick, Heinrich I. (1864-1928), son of Isaak and Margareta Dick, was born on Sept. 29, 1864, in Conteniusfeld, South Russia. In 1875 he came with his parents to North America and settled on a farm northwest of Mountain Lake, Minn. In his nineteenth year he was converted and was baptized by Elder Aron Wall. He was one of the founders of the Brudertaler Church at Mountain Lake in 1889. He was a Sunday-school teacher for 21 years and served in all the other offices in the church. In 1896 he was elected as deacon, on July 20, 1902, ordained as minister, and on July 18, 1906, as elder of the church. In 1918 he was compelled by poor health to resign his position as leader of the congregation, but continued to preach wherever he could.

In 1885 Dick was married to Mrs. Sarah Flaming. To this union were born six children, four of whom died in childhood. Their son Henry is a minister (ordained 1920) and is now field secretary of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren. Their son John was a missionary in China for 14 years and died on an Indian mission field in Oklahoma. H.H.D.

Dick, Leopold, a jurist in the Imperial Court of Chancery in Speyer, died after 1562, was the author of a booklet of 84 pages in Latin against the Anabaptists, Adversus impios Anabaptistarum errores, longe omnium pestillentissimos, Leopoldi Dickii LL. Doctoris, Sacri Romani imperialis Consistorii ab advocationibus et procuratoris, juditium, Roman. III. Omnes enim peccaverunt et egent gloria Dei. Hagenoae apud Johan. Sec. Anno MDXXX Mense Martio (Hagenau, 1530). It presents in very diffuse form under the guise of great learning the Catholic doctrine of baptism, that its administration to infants at a very early age is necessary for their salvation because of original sin, and its repetition is blasphemy. As proof he offers besides the Bible, from which he makes special reference to circumcision, quotations from the Church Fathers and even refers to classical heathen authors. The booklet is of little factual value. Nor is its value increased by calling the Anabaptists all sorts of names and advocating the death penalty on the basis of the Old Testament and history in general. (ML I, 438.) NEFF.

Dickson County, Tenn. In December 1894 the Benevolent Organization of Mennonites (MC) meeting in Chicago discussed the matter of sending a mission worker to Dickson County, where a number of Mennonites were living without a minister and under no conference. The organization voted to send A. J. Yoder to hold meetings in this county. A. I. Yoder (q.v.) was ordained in 1896 to serve the newly established congregation of 27 members but left the community in the summer of 1897. M.G.

Dickson's Hill United Missionary Church, Stouffville, York Co., Ont., was organized in 1876 under the leadership of Abraham Raymer and J. H. Steckley. In 1948 the membership was 63, with Sidney S. Shantz serving as pastor. S.S.S.

Didsbury, Alta., a town of some 1,200 located in Mountain View municipality, 48 miles north of Calgary. It was founded in 1894 by Jacob Y. Shantz (q.v.) and members of the Ontario Conference of the United Missionary Church. The Didsbury church, built in 1896, was the beginning of the Canadian Northwest Conference of the United Missionary Church, which was organized in 1907. Conference meets annually at Didsbury, as does also the annual camp meeting. Mountain View Bible College, now the oldest school in the United Missionary Church, was founded here in 1926. The local United Missionary Church is the largest denomination in the town. The West Zion (MC) Mennonite Church at Carstairs and the Bergthal Mennonite Church (GCM) with a Didsbury address are near by. E.R.S.

Didsbury United Missionary Church (MBC), the oldest, largest, and most prominent congregation of the United Missionary Church in the province of Alberta, was started in 1894 by members of the Ontario Conference (MBC), the first church being built in 1896. In 1952 there were 254 members. The pastor also has charge of an appointment at Davenport, ten miles southeast of Didsbury.

Another congregation meets at Mountain View, eight miles east of Didsbury, which dedicated a new church at Mountain View on April 12, 1953, under the leadership of the pastor, Amsey Frey. E.R.S.

Diekirch, a town in Luxemburg, center of the Mennonite life in this country. The meetinghouse here was dedicated at Pentecost 1950. It is also used by the Protestant Church of Diekirch. (Almanach Mennonite 1901-51, 1950, 11; for further information, see Luxemburg.) vdZ.

Diemerstein, the ruins of a castle, a small forest settlement, and since 1925 a Christian convalescent and youth home in a narrow valley of the Palatine Forest near Frankenstein on the main highway to Kaiserslautern, Germany. The castle was built in the 12th century under Barbarossa by Dittmar and called Burg Ditmarstein. In the Reformation period it sheltered Ulrich von Hutten, the great humanistic foe of the papacy. In the 17th century it was reduced to a ruin.

Soon after the Thirty Years' War several Mennonite families settled in the dale of Diemerstein, who were members of the Fischbach (q.v.) congregation and later of the Sembach (q.v.) congregation. On July 9, 1687, Peter Küntzi of Buchholderberg (Switzerland) received the dilapidated mill in Diemerstein in hereditary lease from Countess Marie, who was a princess of the House of Orange. He and his family were specifically granted freedom of worship, "just as the people on the Fischbach estate have been doing." In the Diemerstein mill area a special building was put up for services, which stood until 1824. From 1782 on, baptismal services were also held here. In 1783 the cemetery still in existence in the valley was acquired. Previously Mennonites had to be buried in Fischbach; they could not, however, be carried on the highway, but had to be secretly carried through the valley and over the mountain.

In addition to the Küntzi (Kinzinger) family there were in Diemerstein in the 18th century also the Mennonite Steiner, Engel, and Strohm families, and later also Schnebele and Zürcher. On Feb. 2, 1811, Peter Eymann (q.v.), born in Lohmühle near Langmeil, came into possession of the tenure by marriage with Elisabeth Engel. He was for many years the mayor of Frankenstein and delegate of the district of Kaiserslautern-Kirchheimbolanden to the Bavarian parliament at Munich. His daughter married Christian Goebels, the son of Johannes Goebels of Hertlingshausen in 1847. Descendants of this family are still living in Diemerstein, Frankenstein, and Mannheim.

In 1925 a Protestant convalescent and youth home was established in Diemerstein, which acquired possession of the castle ruins and of the Mennonite mill. Since 1947 well-attended annual camps for Mennonite youth have been held at Diemerstein. G.H.

Dienaarschap. In Holland in the early days the church board of Mennonite congregations was usually called the Dienaarschap, the members (elders, ministers, and deacons) of this board being called dienaren or dienaers. During the 18th century the terms disappeared, except in a very few congregations. The corresponding term in German West Prussia was Lehrdienst; in English the term "ministry" in several of the American Mennonite groups. vdZ.

Diener am Wort (Minister of the Word), the term used by the Hutterites for their preachers; occasionally they were also called Diener des Wortes or Diener im Wort, sometimes Diener am Evangelium. The Chronicle speaks of them not infrequently also as Diener des Wortes und Apostel. The leader among them was called Hirt (shepherd or pastor) and bishop; he was at the same time the Vorsteher or head of the entire brotherhood who carried the heaviest burden and responsibilities both spiritual and temporal of his church.

The duties of an Anabaptist preacher were first defined in the famous Schleitheim Confession of 1527, Article five: "His office shall be to read, to admonish and to teach, to warn, to discipline, to ban in the church, to lead out in prayer for the advancement of all the brethren and sisters, to lift up the bread when it is to be broken, and in all things to see to the care of the body of Christ that it may be built up and developed" (MQR 1945, 250). The Hutterites accepted this confession, too, although as a final formulation of their creed and ordinances they considered only Peter Riedemann's great Rechenschaft of 1540 as binding. In this book one chapter deals exclusively with the "differences of ministries," and another with the "election" to these offices. The Hutterites, more strongly organized than most Anabaptist groups, clearly distinguished five different offices in their body: (1) Apostles, "who are sent out by God to go through the country and establish through the word and baptism the obedience of faith in His name." They are also called Sendboten or missioners, and must be ordained ministers. (2) Bishops and shepherds, who have the same duties "except that they remain in one place." (3) Helpers, "who serve along with the shepherds, exhorting and calling people to remain true." (4) Rulers or stewards (see Diener der Notdurft). (5) Elders, who like trustees consider "the good of the church together with the preacher, helping the latter to bear the burden."

In the election of preachers, the example of the choice of Matthias (Acts 1) was followed. After searching prayers "those who have been recognized through God's counsel to be suitable are presented to all. If there be many we wait to see which the Lord showeth us by the lot." The practice is still used not only by the Hutterites but also by some Mennonite groups. "None, however, is confirmed in his office except he be first proved and revealed to the church, and have the testimony of a good life, lest he fall into the snare of the wicked." If he has been found reliable, "his appointment to the office is confirmed before the church through the laying on of the elders' hands" (Rideman, Account of Our Religion, 80-82). The Chronicle of the Hutterites registers meticulously all elections, testings, and confirmations of their Diener am Wort, usually without comment. The number of these ministers must have been quite considerable though we have no exact figures. Each Bruderhof had at least one such Diener while others went out in the world as missioners. The fact that so many were ready to serve in this capacity, and to serve most successfully, presupposes a high standard of Bible knowledge and general education (see Education, Hutterite).

From the midst of all these men, one was chosen as bishop and Vorsteher (head) of the entire brotherhood or church. The Chronicle begins actually by listing all of these bishops from Jakob Hutter (d. 1536) to Johannes Rücker (d. 1687), 13 names in all, including Peter Riedemann, who strictly speaking, was not a bishop but was regarded by the Brethren as the spiritual coleader with the then ruling Vorsteher. Johannes Waldner (d. 1824), the author of the Klein-Geschichtsbuch (see Chronicles, Hutterite) and himself a bishop, follows in his work the same practice, listing not less than 22 bishops from Jakob Hutter to 1762; Zieglschmid, the editor (1947), adds five more names up to 1857, after which time no single Vorsteher has ever been elected. The bishop when elected is then presented to the entire brotherhood and ordained by the elders through the laying on of their hands.

A question of some significance was the livelihood of the Diener am Wort. Naturally they did not receive any compensation; on the other hand, in most cases their heavy work required abstention from manual labor. In a community organization such as that of the Hutterites this should not pose a major problem, and Riedemann has nothing to say on this point. In the Chronicle, however, we learn that this issue was thoroughly discussed with Swiss Brethren in the Rhineland before their joining the Moravian brotherhood. In 1556, Hänsel Schmid or Raiffer (q.v.), a most successful, later martyred Hutterite missioner, handed to the Swiss Brethren a written statement of Seven Articles (see Brüderliche Vereinigung), of which the fourth deals with Der Diener Essen und Trinken und ihres Leibes Notdurft ("Concerning the eating and drinking of the ministers and their bodily needs," Zieglschmid, Chronik, 363). It says that the brethren should prepare the food and offer it "with a ready heart" to the ministers; yet not more than the body requires. "Thus the God-fearing people keep their ministers in high esteem and consider them worthy of double honors and reward" (I Thess. 5:13; I Tim. 5:17).

The duties of the Vorsteher were of course heavier than those of the ministers in general. He carried on the elaborate correspondence of the brotherhood, mainly with the missioners abroad and with those who suffered in jails and bondship. He had to comfort all who were in tribulation and affliction; and some of the finest epistles (Sendbriefe, see Epistles, Hutterite) came on such occasions from the great bishops Hutter, Amon, Walpot, and others. The bishop had further to watch the observance of the inner discipline of the church (Gemeinde), and if necessary had to write down the essential regulations and ordinances of the brotherhood for a permanent standard. It was particularly the Vorsteher Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.), 1639-62, who excelled in this activity, collecting old orders and adding new ones to keep the brotherhood in good condition (see Ordinances). Zieglschmid printed some of them in the Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 519 ff. When a bishop feels his approaching end, he may recommend to his brethren a possible successor; more than once the Chronicle recorded such a moving farewell speech of a Vorsteher. It happened but once that the brotherhood had in effect two Vorsteher at once as mentioned above, when Lanzenstil and Riedemann directed the affairs of the church conjointly, even though the latter had not been ordained to the office of a bishop.

When a Diener am Wort had fulfilled his calling by outstanding service both at home and abroad, the Chronicle devoted elaborate words of praise and appreciation on the occasion of his death. "He was a faithful servant, he kept faithfully to the beliefs of the fathers, he taught not to practice vengeance, neither to help for war. He kept the right baptism and the true Lord's Supper . . . ." The highest regard, however, among all preachers was given to the Sendboten, the missioners or apostles who went out into the hazardous world to preach the renewal of hearts. As everyone knew, this was a task from which they most likely would never return. Thus their departure (Aussendung) was celebrated with greatest solemnity. On this occasion they would exhort the brethren at home to keep loyal to their faith, and they would ask for prayers of intercession on their behalf while away from home. Their adventures were eagerly followed by the brethren, as the detailed recordings in the Chronicle prove, taken mostly verbatim from their epistles sent home during their wanderings and perhaps from their jails and torture chambers. Hans Arbeiter was asked whether he was an apostle. "Yes," he answered, "this office has been bestowed upon me by God and the brotherhood that I may show the path of redemption to those who do not know it yet." In their great faith they were fearless and indomitable. "Faith cannot be simulated," says Veit Grünberger in 1573 to his judges; "we have to demonstrate and defend it." And Klaus Felbinger, a preacher not yet confirmed, said to his judges in 1560, "Where God opens to us a door there we go. We have committed ourselves altogether to God, and we are dedicated to go wherever He sends us, not worrying whatever suffering may come to us." They did not shirk martyrdom, in fact almost anticipated it as the consistent end of a true minister or servant of the Gospel. They knew that their example would be more effective than all preaching in the world. "Faith cannot be simulated." When, however, such an apostle returned home safely to Moravia, often after many years of absence, he was received with joy and grateful hearts, as is described many times in the Chronicle. It is obvious that these Diener am Wort represented the very backbone of the brotherhood, who kept it strong and in high spirits during periods of trial and hardship. This was true for the great century of the beginnings as well as for the period of the amazing rejuvenation of the church in Transylvania in the 18th century, when new leaders and ministers revived the old spirit in the face of increased suffering and all the uncertainties of a new emigration.

The title Diener am Wort was used to some extent in non-Hutterite Anabaptist and later Mennonite groups for the preacher or minister of the Gospel, though apparently never as the regular and primary title for this office. Among the Dutch and their North German and West Prussian descendants Leeraar (Lehrer) was the most common title, although Prediker, Predikant, Prediger was also used. Dienaar was seldom used. In 1729 Abraham Alders was chosen as preacher in Goch; the record says he was tot den dienst des woords verkoren. In Switzerland and South Germany, while Lehrer was used somewhat, Prediger was the most common. The Amish came to use Diener zum Buch rather than Diener am Wort. LOSERTH, R.F.

Diener der Notdurft, the title used by the Hutterites for their elected and ordained managers or stewards of their Bruderhofs (q.v.) who took care of all temporal needs of the community of each colony. (The title was also used to some extent by the Swiss-South German Anabaptists for the deacon, q.v.). Since the Hutterites lived and still live by the principle of community of goods (q.v.), an elaborate organization of their establishments became necessary. It was based on the idea of Christian brotherhood, which means voluntary co-operation in all work, absence of "bossism" or paternalism, trusteeship, and acceptance of responsibilities for one another. For this organization to be efficient, it had to operate smoothly, economically, and above all cheerfully. At one place the Hutterite Chronicle compares these Bruderhofs with the work of the bees. In spite of all good will there was still much need for alertness against selfishness (Eigennutz), lust for domineering, and the tendency toward laziness. Much exhortation was needed.

From the very beginnings in the days of Jakob Hutter the main principles of such an organization were established: there were first the Diener am Wort (q.v.), who took care of the spiritual needs, and then the Diener der Notdurft, who were responsible for the smooth functioning of the Bruderhofs in all practical regards. Peter Riedemann states in his great Rechenschaft of 1540 the basic organization of the leadership in the chapter on "Differences of Ministries" (p. 82 of English edition): ". . . There are rulers (Regierer) who order and arrange the house or church (Gemein), putting each in his place that everything may go properly and well. They also see that the church is cared for in temporal distribution, and are also called ministers of temporal needs." The Chronicle, too, once describes in detail the functioning of the church (Chronik, 430 f.), and here again we learn something about this office of stewardship. The main source, however, for all further details is found in but one manuscript of 1640, containing a summary of all previous Gemeinordnungen (regulations or ordinances, q.v.) with added new material; its author is the Vorsteher Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.), who was eager to have his people stay strictly in the old tradition. Later Ordnungen of this kind were published by Zieglschmid in his edition of the Klein-Geschichtsbuch (1947), 519-65, but they are less elaborate than the one yet unpublished manuscript of Ehrenpreis (a transcript in the Goshen College Library). The following description is based exclusively on this document.

In general the Diener der Notdurft were active in four different functions or offices: (1) the most important office was that of Haushälter, general manager or steward of the house; (2) other brethren were Einkäufer (buyers); (3) again others were Fürgestellte or foremen of the different trades and shops; while (4) a last category, the Meier, were overseers or heads of the farms. Actually, still more subdivisions were named under the title Diener der Notdurft; for instance, there was the Weinzierl, who was the assistant to the Haushälter and in his absence his deputy; and then the Kellner, originally the manager of the vineyards and its revenues, later about the same as Meier, general steward. Another helper of the steward was the Kastner, originally the caretaker of the flour bins, and so on.

Each office had its distinct duties. (1) The Haushälter managed, so to speak, the Bruderhof on the top level. He took care of all material needs of the brethren and sisters, including even the clothing and bedding, he distributed all work and supervised it, and he was also in charge of the general demeanor and discipline of the group, mainly at work. For smooth functioning of the whole, the brethren had to submit to his orders and arrangements. He assigned each person to his place, be it workshop, farm, or home duty. He had to be the first up in the morning and the last to bed at night. He kept an eye on the fireplaces to prevent harm. The sick, the old, and the children were under his general care. He was responsible that everybody got what he needed, and yet that nothing be wasted. If any major purchase was due, a committee of elders and the chief steward made the decision. He had to watch the economy of the Bruderhof, to be careful in the administration of the money, and to keep an account of all transactions. From the craftsmen and shops he claimed revenues about every other week, and he watched also that they supplied the Bruderhof with all things needed. If one considers the rather large size of most of these Bruderhofs (200 to 500 persons), it becomes quite obvious that this office of Haushälter was a difficult and responsible one, and that he certainly was in need of an assistant (the Weinzierl). To fulfill these duties with tact and modesty a high standard of Christian character was needed, and only the best fitted were elected and ordained (after a time of probation) to this office. The flowering of the entire church depended, at least partly, upon his work, and thus he was in need of spiritual support by the bishop and the Diener am Wort.

(2) The Einkäufer or buyer was, so to speak, the liaison man with the "world" with which he had to deal. He, too, had to be careful with all his purchases, and "should not fall into the tricks of the traders, butchers, and Jews." When in doubt he was to ask the counsel of the elders. The funds which were entrusted to him he did not dare leave with the women but he might deposit them with the elders or the general steward.

(3) The Fürgestellten or foremen of the shops and the different trades (smiths, cloth makers, tanners, shoemakers, cutlers, etc.; see Crafts) took care of their particular business, bought whatever material they needed, and sold on the market whatever was not needed on the Bruderhof itself. The profits were handed over to the Haushälter and represented the major revenues of the entire closed economy. All the necessary regulations of the trades and crafts were discussed with these foremen.

(4) The Meier and Kellner, finally, were responsible for farm, orchard, vineyard, fields, barns, and cellars. These men were particularly appreciated by the noble lords as stewards on their estates. No more expert or reliable men could be found among the peasants. It was a position of trust which these men filled in accordance with their Christian conscience. They had to have their eyes at many places, watching for any fire hazard, and be on the alert regarding the upkeep of buildings, fences, and roads.

In view of the great number and size of the Bruderhofs the number of stewards must have been quite considerable. Beck's Geschichts-Bücher (pp. 193-95) records that in 1548 four Diener am Wort were elected and 14 Diener der Notdurft; two years later the text lists a total of 17 ministers and 31 stewards (p. 195). Without doubt this number increased during the next generation, the "Golden Era" of the brotherhood. Around 1600 decline set in, due to persecution and wars, and the stewards carried much of the responsibility for salvaging whatever was possible. Plundering made a sound economy next to impossible, yet the Bruderhofs survived somehow, and were estimated at the moment of complete abandonment in 1622 to be worth more than 364,000 Talers.

Naturally temptations were ever present, yet seemed to have become more noticeable in the later (17th century) period. Hence the repetition in the Gemeindeordnungen of exhortations and admonitions to these stewards. "If a Haushälter does not comply with the orders of the ministers it is no small wonder that the Lord withholds His blessings." Or we read about dubious manipulations with material and money which are strongly reprimanded and cut short. Yet this was the failing of only a few, within a group which could exist only if strong Christian principles governed its entire life. The fact that this particular type of community life did survive is proof that these principles were more dominant than the human failings which could be more or less successfully kept in check. (ML I, 438-40.) LOSERTH, R.F.

Diener zum Buch, the title used by the Amish for preacher (Prediger) to distinguish from Aeltester or völliger Diener (bishop) and Armendiener (deacon). His sole duty was to preach from the Book (Bible). H.S.B.

Diener-Versammlungen, the title generally given to a series of general conferences held annually (except 1877) by the Amish congregations of America from 1862 to 1878 for the purpose of reconciling certain differences in religious practice that had developed during this time among the different congregations because of their settlements being scattered and isolated throughout the north central states, and also because of the influx during the early part of the 19th century of Amish immigrants from Alsace and South Germany whose religious customs were somewhat different from those common among the Pennsylvania brethren, who had arrived in the 18th century.

Although meant primarily for the ministry, the conferences were open to the laity, and were largely attended by the local congregations where the sessions were held. For that reason, and because meetinghouses were not yet common, the sessions were often held in the large barns of local members.

The questions discussed throughout the various sessions indicate something of the specific differences between the congregations at the time, and also what was still regarded by the majority as orthodox and permissible in their religious and social practices and worthy of preservation.

At the first session held in Wayne Co., Ohio, in 1862, major consideration was given to the controversy over baptism which had troubled certain Pennsylvania brethren for some years. Shall baptism be administered in a flowing stream (creek or river) or in the house? This was the question on which seemingly there was no definite decision by the conference.

During the Civil War years the attitude toward war in all its phases was given repeated attention. Is participation in war Scriptural? It is permissible for a member to accept teamster service under military control? Is it permissible for a former member who has joined the army, been wounded, and now again rejoined the church, to receive a pension offered by the government? Can a member participate in the erection of a memorial monument to the soldiers? All these questions were answered in the negative.

All political activity, too, was either prohibited or discouraged. The holding of any public office, either judicial or under military supervision, which necessitated the use of force, attending political meetings and pole raisings, and even voting were discouraged as being unseemly for a nonresistant people. Unequal yoking with the world in business and social relations, too, was forbidden. Among the business contacts tabooed were holding bank stock and managing a store, post office, or express office. Levi Miller of Holmes Co., Ohio, in the initial session of 1862, listed among other threatening innovations that were objectionable to many—lightning rods, lotteries, likenesses (photographs), insurance, and big meetinghouses.

Meetinghouses, although coming into use among the western Amish churches, were a subject of controversy in the eastern states. To the question proposed in the 1863 session, held in Mifflin Co., Pa., Are meetinghouses Scriptural?, Jonathan Yoder of Illinois, whose congregation had built a meetinghouse as early as 1854, replied he did not regard them unscriptural, and that it was much easier to maintain order during worship in a meetinghouse than in a home. John K. Yoder of Wayne Co., Ohio, stated that a meetinghouse was necessary in his congregation because the homes were too small to accommodate the large attendance. Jonathan Pitsche of Maryland added that he had no objection to meetinghouses if they were necessary, but too often they were not necessary, to which Abraham Pitsche of Mifflin County gave his assent, but added that he did not favor them in his own congregation. Shunning (Meidung), which ever since 1693 had been one of the distinctive doctrines of the Amish Mennonites both in Europe and America, but which was beginning to be questioned by some of the more progressive American Amish congregations by the time, was still upheld, though a certain degree of tolerance was recommended.

As for the dress question, which also played a large part in the life of the Amish, the old standards which still meant hooks and eyes, long hair, broadfall trousers, broad-brimmed hats, aprons, bonnets, and simply made clothes of a somber color, were evidently still taken for granted; for in spite of the contention of J. K. Yoder of Ohio, that nonconformity in dress (Kleidertracht) was one of the major causes of difference among the congregations at that time, the question did not loom large in the discussions, except in an occasional reference in the various sermons preached between the discussion periods, in which warnings were given against following worldly fashions, in worldly haircuts and fashionable clothes.

Perhaps one of the most far-reaching decisions made by the conference, judged by later results, was that made in 1872, in connection with a local controversy in the church of Joseph Stuckey (q.v.) in Illinois. Stuckey had in his congregation a member with rather radical views on religious questions, who in the course of a poem called "Die Frohe Botschaft" which he had written and distributed rather widely among the Amish congregations in Illinois expressed the view that God in His infinite love would not send any one into eternal punishment for his misdeeds, and that the only punishment the sinner suffered would be the results of his sin in this life. The committee appointed by the conference in 1872 to investigate this matter reported that when they asked Stuckey whether he regarded the author of this view as a brother, he replied in the affirmative, and that he had admitted him to the communion table. Upon receipt of this reply, the committee, made up of both easterners and westerners, withdrew fellowship from Stuckey and his congregation. Stuckey no longer attended the later conference sessions and his congregation later became the nucleus of the Central Conference of Mennonites.

Among the leading personalities in these conference meetings, judging from the part they took in the discussions, were J. K. Yoder of Wayne Co., Ohio, John P. King of Logan Co., Ohio, and Samuel Yoder of Pennsylvania, all three of whom frequently served as moderators (Wortführer) of the conference. Among others during the early sessions were Jonathan Yoder of Illinois, Joseph Stuckey of the same state, C. K. Beiler, Elias Riehl, J. K. Hartzler, and Shem Zook (a layman) of Pennsylvania, and Joseph Goldschmidt of Iowa. During later sessions among the leaders were Joseph Burcky, Christian Rupp, and John P. Schmitt of Illinois; C. K. Yoder of Ohio; Joseph Yoder, Jonathan Smucker, and Joseph Borntreger of Indiana; and Paul Herschberger, Sebastian Gerig, and Joseph Schlegel of Iowa.

The conference sessions came to an end largely, no doubt, because of lack of interest and failure to reach their original objective, i.e., reconciliation of the discordant elements. After this the course of Amish history followed three directions. The more conservative elements and such congregations as had never favored the conference movement retained all their old traditions and practices, and are today known as the Old Order Amish. The more liberal element, consisting of the congregation of Joseph Stuckey and several others, gradually discarded many of the old prohibitions, and for a time were called the Stuckey Amish, but later the Central Conference of Mennonites. Adopting a middle course were many of the more recent immigrant congregations in Illinois and Ohio, and some of the more liberal in Indiana who steered between the two extremes. These later formed themselves into district conferences, called themselves Amish Mennonites, but finally 1915-25 merged with the Mennonite churches, thus losing their name Amish, their three-century-old traditional Amish distinguishing doctrines and practices having been gradually dropped earlier. The conferences formed (with years of existence) were Indiana-Michigan A.M., 1888-1915, Western A.M., 1890-1920, Eastern A.M., 1893-1925. The last conference retained its name in the merged "Ohio Mennonite and Eastern A.M. Joint Conference" until 1954. A later emergence was the Conservative A.M. Conference, 1910-55, which is now the Conservative Mennonite (MC) Conference.

The proceedings of these Diener-Versammlungen were published annually, 1862-1865 and 1869, under the title, Verhandlungen der Diener-Versammlung der Deutschen Täufer oder Amischen Mennoniten (John Baer's Sons, Lancaster, 1862-65; 1869 at Chicago); then 1866-67 and 1870-78 (John F. Funk, Elkhart) under the title Bericht der Verhandlungen der Diener-Versammlungen der Amischen Mennoniten- (Diener und) Brüderschaft.

These annual Amish conferences were not the first such held in either Europe or America (see Conference). From old documents the following are known: 1809 in Lancaster Co., Pa. (minutes extant); 1826 in Ohio; 1830 in Somerset Co., Pa.; 1831 in Wayne Co., Ohio (minutes extant); 1837 in Somerset Co. (minutes extant). A conference of more conservative Amish leaders was held in Holmes Co., Ohio, in June 1865. The texts of the 1809, 1837, and 1865 records were translated in "Some Early American Amish Mennonite Disciplines," MQR VIII (1934) 90-98. The report of a European Amish conference of 1779, held at Essingen near Landau in the Palatinate, was translated in "An Amish Church Discipline of 1779," MQR XI (1937) 163-68. C.H.S., H.S.B.

Dienstjarenfonds, a Mennonite fund in the Netherlands, founded in 1912 by a number of men in an effort to raise the salaries of the preachers which they considered too low, by granting a supplementary sum to those ministers who had served for ten years or more, and whose salaries were beneath a certain level. In 1917 the first payments to the ministers were made. In 1949 the Dienstjarenfonds was taken over by the Algemene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit (q.v.). Since then the contributions were increased and given to all ministers with ten or more years' service, the payment no longer limited by the income of the minister. Diepenbroek, Coenraad van (d. Sept. 1, 1714), a Dutch Mennonite minister serving in the Waterlander-Flemish congregation of the Peuzelaarsteeg in Haarlem 1690-1714, was an advocate of the Lamist (q.v.) principles and a warm participant in the Collegiant (q.v.) movement. He succeeded in 1700 in settling a schism among these Collegiants, which had existed for many years between two groups. He often attended services at Rijnsburg, the Collegiant center, preaching and administering communion. Van Diepenbroek was also active in behalf of the persecuted Swiss Mennonites in 1710. He was a well-known preacher, who is said to have had a large attendance wherever he preached. In 1703 he was asked to dedicate the new meetinghouse at Krommenie (q.v.) after the old church had been devastated by fire. His sermon was published: Predikaatsie . . . in de nieuw-gebouwde Vergaderplaats . . . te Krommenie (Amsterdam, 1703). Other publications by Diepenbroek were Redenvoering over de Hereniging der Twee Vergaderingen tot Rijnsburg, 1700 (Haarlem, n.d.), and Redenvoering op de Dank-dag over de Vrede, 1713 (Haarlem, n.d.). The Mennonite Archives of Amsterdam contain seven manuscript volumes of his sermons (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 715). J. L. S. preached his funeral sermon, Treurgalm op het afsterven van Koenraad van Diepenbroek (Haarlem, 1714). vdZ.

Dierick van der Hagen, an Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1537 (exact date unknown); his head was put on a stake, and his corpse was burned. (Génard, Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 434, XIV, 14-15, No. 160.) vdZ.

Dierick (Dirk) Lambrechts (or Lambertsz), an Anabaptist martyr, originally from Voorthuizen near Deventer, Holland, a wool-weaver, was executed at Gent, Belgium, on April 12, 1563, by being burned at the stake. Van Braght (Mart. Mir.) only mentions the fact of the execution without giving the date. Dierick is also celebrated in a song found in the supplement to the Liedtboecxken van den Diericxken Roels, wife of Mathys Baseliers, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed by drowning at Antwerp, Belgium, on Nov. 19, 1573. During the trial she admitted that she had been rebaptized and had attended meetings of Mennonites, and also that Mennonite meetings had been held in her house. (Génard, *Antw. Diesen, a hamlet near St. Avold in Lorraine, France, seat of an Amish Mennonite congregation since ca. 1840, known also under the name of Boulay (German, Bolchen), a small city situated 10 miles west of Diesen (see Bolchen-Diesen, ML I, 243). Originally meetings were held in homes; ca. 1870 there were 18 families whose homes served alternately as meeting places. Soon after 1870 all meetings were held in homes in Diesen, and in 1947 a chapel was built in the same village.

Family names in the congregations are Beck, Esch, Fonkennel, Guth, Hege, Hertzler, Nafziger, Oesch, Schertz, and Weisse. The first elder was Joseph Esch of Roupelstouden (ordained 1838, d. 1897); Nicolas Beck and Willy Hege were elders in 1954, assisted by Willy Nafziger and Joseph Oesch as preachers. Baptized membership in 1950 was 108. Meetings are held biweekly, entirely in German (except for slight use of French in young people's activities). The congregation is affiliated with the German-language Alsatian Conference.

In 1922 the congregation was divided, approximately half the members meeting on the farm St-Victor, under the leadership of Elder Pierre Esch, and known as Boulay or St-Victor. The two groups reunited in 1940.

A valuable description of the Mennonites living in the region of Diesen, dated 1850, is to be found in the archives of the Department de la Moselle, prepared as a result of an investigation ordered by the Minister of Education and Religious Affairs. J.H.Y.

Dieteren, a small town in the Dutch province of Limburg, formerly belonging to the duchy of Jülich, about 1534 a center of Anabaptist activity. Jan Smeitgen (q.v.) and Lenart van Ysenbroek (q.v.) baptized here, the latter baptizing the martyrs Bartholomeus van den Berghe (q.v.) and his wife Mente Heynen (q.v.). After a short time the Anabaptist movement was entirely extinguished here. vdZ.

Dietrich, the German equivalent of the Dutch Dirk (q.v.).

Dietrich Nicolaus (ML I, 442) is identical with Claes Dirksz (q.v.). vdZ.

Dietrich, Sebastian (or Bastl, 1553-1619), a Hutterite bishop and Vorsteher in Moravia. He was born in Markgröningen, Württemberg, and seems to have received a careful education. Somehow he was won for the Anabaptist way (we know that a copy of the great Article Book, q.v., was found in his home), and in 1580 he went to Moravia to join the Hutterite brotherhood, much against his father's wishes. He was a barber-surgeon, but it is not known whether he learned this profession in his youth or only after he came in contact with some of the famous Hutterite barber-physicians such as G. Zobel or B. Goller, both of Nikolsburg. In any case, later Württemberg records call him "an excellent and widely renowned physician"; he certainly added to the high regard in which the Hutterite "barbers" were held among the Moravian nobility.

In 1587, Dietrich was elected Diener am Wort (q.v.), i.e., preacher, in Neumühl, Moravia, and three years later (1590) he was confirmed in this position by the elders and the entire church. From some records it may be assumed that he then lived in Altenmarkt, Moravia, where a large center of the Hutterites was situated. In 1600 he sent an authorized man to his home town to claim his paternal inheritance. The affair went on for years; his brother Konrad claimed the same inheritance, since Sebastian as an Anabaptist was considered as having no legal title to such claims. The records (in Bossert's Quellen) cover 13 years; eventually Konrad got one third of the amount, and Sebastian got nothing.

The "golden era" of the Hutterites had come to an end in 1592, when the rising Counter Reformation (q.v.), Turkish Wars, and oppression by feudal lords made life on the Bruderhofs increasingly hard. The brethren called the period 1592-1618 the "time of affliction." In 1604 they heard of Mennonites in East Prussia (around Elbing), and earnestly considered an emigration thither. Dietrich together with some other brethren was sent to Prussia, and an experimental Bruderhof was started there. It was, however, a failure (mainly due to the unfriendly attitude of the city magistrates of Elbing), and Dietrich and the others returned to Moravia.

In 1611 the outstanding Vorsteher Klaus Braidl (q.v.) died in Neumühl, Moravia, and Sebastian Dietrich was unanimously elected as his successor. For the next nine years (1611-19) he was then a most conscientious leader of the brotherhood during a difficult and trying time. His concern was above all the maintenance of the traditional ways of the Hutterites in all their strictness and austerity. In this he was fairly successful. From a later Hutterite codex (see Ehrenpreis) we learn of Dietrich's activities toward a more precise regulation both of life on the Bruderhofs in general and of the different trades in particular. In 1612 he laid down a sort of comprehensive program after having discussed it with the brethren in all details (see Ordnungen). These "ordinances" then were to be read to the entire brotherhood every year. Of special interest are the points which deal with the education of the young people. Youth was to be brought up in the fear of the Lord, and diligently read the epistles, hymns, and confessions of the brotherhood, so that they would be ready to give account if asked. They should practice faithfully penmanship, so that the children "of the world" would not receive better praise than those of the brotherhood. Children should not be pampered but hardened to endure work and hardship later on. The old regulations must be observed, and those in authority ought to set good examples. Should they know of some hidden "own money" they must report it so that it may be removed at once. Particular attention is paid to the newcomers. Anyone showing a spark of divine grace should be helped on. All property of the brotherhood is to be handled as a trust for which one is responsible to God. Let nothing be wasted, and all luxury done away with lest God think them rich and tax them unmercifully, Special care must be given to the sick, etc. All these points were read to the assembly for approval, and were also sent to those who were absent (this they called "visiting with the doctrine"). Dietrich made every effort to preserve the traditional principle of community of goods, and to do away with all bad customs which had been creeping in during the recent hard times.

Relations with those feudal lords who had been kind to the brotherhood during the Turkish invasion of 1605 were further cultivated, and the interests of the brethren were staunchly defended by the Vorsteher. The Bruderhof in Sobotiste (q.v.), Slovakia, was re-established in 1613, and the lords of that area gave Dietrich and two other elders a contract (Hausbrief) for this possession, stating rights and obligations, and granting religious freedom (text in Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 364). When Dietrich felt that his end was approaching, he called the elders for a last address (text in the Great Chronicle). In return they assured him their appreciation of his loyal services for his flock, and that he had been a faithful shepherd. He died Dec. 8, 1619, and was succeeded as Vorsteher by Ulrich Jaussling. LOSERTH, R.F.

Dietrichstein, an old Austrian noble family, originally from Carinthia, which became quite influential during the 16th and 17th centuries, and played a decisive part in the oppression and final expulsion of the Austrian Anabaptists, mainly the Hutterites. Three generations of this family require attention: (1) Siegmund von Dietrichstein (1480-1533), governor of Styria, (2) his son Adam von Dietrichstein (1527-90), the first lord of Nikolsburg, Moravia, and as such overlord over the Hutterites on this estate. He had 12 children, of whom (3) Franz von Dietrichstein (1570-1636), cardinal and prince-bishop of Olmütz (Olomuce), Moravia, was the most outstanding. He was directly responsible for the total expulsion of the Hutterites from Moravia in 1622. His brother Siegmund von Dietrichstein was likewise instrumental in this painful process, a triumph of the Catholic Counter Reformation (q.v.), while Maximilian von Dietrichstein and Karl and Georg were less active. Some of these brothers even sided with the Protestant opposition against the Habsburgs in 1619-20.

(1) Siegmund von Dietrichstein, a favorite of Emperor Maximilian I, became governor of Styria, 1515-33, in which capacity he quenched the peasant revolt of 1524, and ruthlessly carried out all the mandates of Ferdinand I against the Anabaptists in Styria (q.v.), thus retarding a forceful and popular Christian movement so that it never reached complete fruition. His Jesuit biographer Georg Dingenauer said: "He persecuted them not only in the cities but ferreted them out even in the forests where they had sought a hiding like wild animals." The hopeful small brotherhoods in places like Graz, Bruck, Leoben, etc., could not very long resist this pressure and soon died out, perhaps also due to a lack of strong leadership. In the chronicles of the Hutterites the name of Siegmund Dietrichstein does not appear at all.

(2) Adam von Dietrichstein, the favorite of Emperor Maximilian II. While some of his brothers turned Protestant, Adam remained a faithful Catholic, though leaning toward reforms and a broader interpretation of doctrines, like his sovereign Maximilian II. He filled high positions in the Habsburg realm (tutor of the later Emperor Rudolph II, ambassador to Spain, etc.), and in 1575 was enabled to purchase the Nikolsburg estate in Moravia (q.v.), formerly a possession of the Liechtensteins. As early as 1579 he called the Jesuits to Moravia to promote the Counter Reformation in this strongly Protestant country. The chronicles of the Hutterites, mentioning this fateful event (Zieglschmid, 505), call the Jesuits das Bös Natterngezücht (generation of vipers). The emperor and the pope, however, praised Adam for his zeal. Nevertheless, he knew the economic value of the Hutterites only too well, and in spite of several starts toward expulsion, he yet allowed them to continue as tenant farmers on his estate. He could not resolve this typical 16th-17th century conflict between religious zeal and personal interests as a manorial lord. He began also the collection of the rich library at Nikolsburg which was later looted by the Swedes (during the Thirty Years' War), and today can be found as the Queen Christiana collection of the Vatican Library at Rome.

Between 1590 and 1599 Nikolsburg was run by his son Maximilian von Dietrichstein, who is described by the Chronicle as amenable to negotiations with the Brethren, allowing them to stay on the estate.

(3) Franz von Dietrichstein (1570-1636), the eighth child of Adam, was destined to rise to a position second only to the emperor himself. He was the most aggressive champion of the growing Counter Reformation of the Catholic Church, and he was also the staunch supporter of the cause of the Habsburgs during the first phases of the great Thirty Years' War. At 27 he became priest, and at 29 he was made cardinal and at the same time bishop of Olmütz (Olomuce), then one of the richest and most influental dioceses of the Habsburg realm. His position was near to Emperor Rudolph II and his successors Matthias and Ferdinand II, yet he found much opposition among the feudal nobility of Moravia which was predominantly both Czech and Protestant. (It was this nobility which protected the Hutterites through all the 90 or more years of their flowering in Moravia.) He arrived in Nikolsburg in 1599, and it may be said that from about then on very hard times set in for the Brethren: oppression by the Catholic powers, cardinal and emperor, which led to looting and final expulsion, and hardship by two wars, a Turkish invasion in 1605, and the beginnings of the Thirty Years' War, about 1619-22. The "Golden Age" of the brotherhood was over; the government, in need of money, tried to extort as much as it could from the Brethren, by means anything but just or decent. The Hutterite Vorsteher Hirzel (q.v.) was under false pretenses cheated into handing out to the cardinal all the money of the brotherhood. The number of Hutterite Bruderhofs gradually dwindled to about 24; many Brethren had died during these turbulent events, and many more had been forced to emigrate to near-by Slovakia. In 1620 the Catholic cause won a decisive victory at the Battle of the White Mountain near Prague over the new Protestant ruler of Bohemia. From now on the Catholic Counter Reformation threw off all restraint. Noble estates were confiscated both in Bohemia and Moravia (it was then that the Dietrichsteins acquired a fabulous wealth in estates and other riches), and Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein was no longer willing "to tolerate the heretical sects" in his Moravian domain. Since Catholicism was to become the only religion of the realm, the persecution of the Brethren became "total." From 1622 to his death in 1636 the cardinal was governor of Moravia, and with the emperor's support became almost omnipotent over the array of opposing nobles. In September 1622, he ordered the complete expulsion of the Hutterites "within four weeks." All petitions, even to the emperor himself, were in vain. In spite of an early winter, and many sick and old people, no postponement was permitted. They had to go, leaving behind them houses and fields and goods worth more than 364,000 Talers, according to their own estimates (Zieglschmid, 756. The entire dramatic story of the expulsion and the cardinal's role in it is told in ibid., 746-56). The nobles, however, seem to have felt that they could not go on without these highly efficient workers, and some Brethren, called by their former lords, actually came back from Slovakia the next year. The cardinal now intensified his endeavor, and sharper "patents" (mandates, orders) were issued in 1623, again in 1624, and even as late as 1628, making any returning Hutterite an outlaw. Though he knew only too well the economic harm to Moravia by these measures, Franz insisted on the religious uniformity of the country. For these activities the then victorious emperor made him a prince. To the Brethren, however, he was only a tool of the powers of this evil world. In the well-known Pribitzer hymn (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 1914, 821-27) three stanzas (24-26) are devoted to the cardinal and his work.

> All dringlich Bitten was unsonst,
> Fanden auch weder Geld noch Gonst,
> Der Cardinal der erste war (wor),
> Ging anderen in solcher Tyranei zuvor.

But the final lines of the hymn sound hopeful again: God does not abandon His people, and He prepares a new place for them. It was not unknown to the cardinal either, that the lords in Slovakia, to his deep regret, showed more independence than those of Moravia. For another 130 years the Brethren found a refuge in this Hungarian land, until also the government and the Roman Church gained enough power to end this period of toleration. R.F.

The Hutterite Chronicle, of course, is very elaborate on the entire period of the Cardinal: Zieglschmid, Chronik 597-760. In Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, the story of the expulsion is told 406-25 and 435. See also Loserth, in *Ztscht des dt. Vereins f. d. Gesch. Mährens u. Dieuwertgen (Dieuwerken Jansdochter), an Anabaptist martyr, sentenced to die by being buried alive with a brother and two sisters after cruel torture at Leiden (Holland) on Aug. 21, 1552 (erroneously given as 1550 in the Martyrs' Mirror). When she was led to the site of execution she began to sing and then said, "Dear brethren, do not avenge me for this; for it is for the sake of the Lord." Her martyrdom is sung in the hymn, "Eylaes ick mach wel suchten," written by Adriaen Cornelisz (q.v.). (Wolkan, Lieder 63, 70; Mart. Mir. D 97, E 495; Offer 578, note 1; ML I, 448.)

Dieuze, a town in the district of Chateau Salins, France, once the seat of a fairly large Mennonite congregation, which dissolved about the end of the 19th century. The congregation was a part of the Welschländer (q.v.) (Lorraine, q.v.) congregation. When Alsace-Lorraine was annexed to Germany in 1870 the new frontier divided the rather widely scattered congregation, but it continued to meet, using the German language. About 1893 due to border difficulties the congregation was finally officially divided, the French families joining the Nancy (q.v.) congregation, and the German families continuing to meet, sometime later joining the congregation of Morhange (q.v.) or Mörchingen. Emigration to America as well as farther westward in France, and a low birth rate, had already considerably reduced the size of the group. Only the names of a few elders have been preserved: Conrad Schweitzer (d. 1880), Christian Schweitzer (d. 1896), and Joseph Schweitzer (ordained 1891), the last elder, who joined the Morhange congregation. Diggers, a group of the Levellers, an important political party in the time of Cromwell in England (q.v.). Their name indicates their effort to convert idle land into a farm for the establishment of a colony of a religious communistic brotherhood. This is not the only aspect in which they resembled the Hutterian Brethren in Moravia (q.v.). The Diggers, or "True Levellers" as they also called themselves, were, with the entire group of Levellers, a part of the great Anabaptist movement that emanated from Central Europe. Like the Anabaptists, who were principally of the lower social strata, the Diggers were also landless, and again like them, they were concerned with religious and social renewal. It was in their manner of achieving this aim that they differed from the Anabaptists. (E. Troeltsch, The Social Teachings of the Christian Churches, N.Y., 1936; ML I, 448.) E.H.C.

Digna Jacops, wife of the sailor Peter Jacopssen, of Antwerp, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned at Antwerp, Belgium, in the Schelde River on March 16, 1535. She left behind some goods, which was unusual, most martyrs of Antwerp being poor. (Génard, Antw. Arch.-Blad VII, 319, 366; XIV, 12-13, No. 138.) vdZ.

Digna Pieters, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Dordrecht, Dutch province of South Holland, was put in a sack and drowned there on Nov. 23, 1555. She was accused of having been rebaptized and attending heretical (Mennonite) meetings. (Mart. Mir. D 162, E 551; DB 1862, 92 f.; ML I, 448; III, 371.) vdZ.

Dijk (Dijck), Aldert Sierks (1699-Dec. 6, 1779), was engaged as a preacher by the Old Flemish congregation at Groningen, Netherlands, on Aug. 16, 1733. Although he was not an elder, he was influential in the Groningen Sociëteit (conference). Especially at the conference of 1738 in Groningen he let himself be heard in the discussion on the elimination of the Mennonite divisions. He declared that it depended principally on a change of heart, without which externals were of no avail. He suggested that the elders should make an annual tour of all the congregations. In 1755 Dijk wrote the foreword to an Old Flemish Confession of Faith. He was generally loved for his piety of heart and his attitudes. He was the author of the following (all published in Groningen): De heilbegerige Jongeling, Onderwesen in de nodigste vereischtens eens Dopelings (1732); Nutte Bybel-Oeffening over Gewigtige Waarheden en Toestanden des Christendoms (1738); Kleyne Catechismus ofte Beginsel van onderwyzing voor kinderen . . . (1742); Na-errinnering eener Redevoering over 't slot von den Bybel (1744); Het leven en sterven van een Christen door de genade Jesu en in de vereeniging met Hem . . . (1744); *Sluit-reede, gedaan by het eyndigen der Algem. Dijk (Dijck), Jan van, a Dutch Mennonite minister, serving the Zonist congregation at Amsterdam from 1664 until his death in 1678, author of Noodtwendich Bericht tot Openinge der tegenwoordighe onlusten . . . in de Gemeente der Doopsgezinde . . . binnen Amsterdam (Amsterdam, 1663), and Antwoort op de Wederlegging van het Nootwendich Bericht . . . (Amsterdam, 1664). In both booklets van Dijk shows himself as a champion of the views of the conservatives among the Flemish congregation of Amsterdam, usually called de Ouderen, and an ardent antagonist of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) and his principles. The latter book was directed against a booklet of Pieter Balling, Verdediging van de Regeering der Doopsgez. gemeente . . . (Amsterdam, 1663), in which van Dijk's Nootwendich Bericht was opposed and the Ouderen had been accused of partiality, backwardness, and defamation. In 1665 van Dijk, about whose life nothing was available, signed the Verbondt van Eenigheydt (q.v.), an agreement of the conservatives, which stressed the outstanding confessions of faith. Dijkema, Fokke, b. 1877, at Leeuwarden, d. 1944, at Amsterdam, a Dutch Mennonite pastor serving the congregations of Winschoten 1901-5, Hilversum 1905-7, Rotterdam 1907-16, and Amsterdam 1916-42. His special field of study was the Old Testament and Hebrew; he published a few scholarly papers on Hebrew linguistic problems and Old Testament subjects in Teyler's Theologisch Tijdschrift. He was also a member of the board of the Dutch Bible Society and worked on the new Dutch version of the Bible. For a number of years he was a member of the board of the ADS (General Dutch Mennonite Conference). But his interest went out beyond the Mennonite brotherhood and he was a member of a large number of religious and charitable associations. For some time he was also a member of the board of the General (Dutch) Committee of Liberal Christianity; Dijkema was an adherent of liberal theology. He published many articles in the Mennonite weekly De Zondagsbode and a number of booklets including Het Avondmaal (Rotterdam, n.d., 1908), De Ongeloovigen (Amsterdam, n.d.), Buitenkerklijke Stroomingen (Amsterdam, n.d., 1933), and a historical study, De Doopsgezinden in Amsterdam 1530-1930 (n.p., n.d.). vdZ.

Dijkstra, Uilke Reitses (1755-1823), was a farmer and preacher of the congregation of Dantumawoude, Dutch province of Friesland, 1781-1812. He was a very active and influential church leader, being the last liefdeprediker (untrained and unsalaried preacher) of this large congregation, and its only minister in 1803-11. Then Jan ter Borg, trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, came to his assistance. J. Kuiper preached his funeral sermon, Lijkrede op U. R. Dijkstra (Leeuwarden, 1823). Diller Mennonite Church (MC), located near Newville, Cumberland Co., Pa., is a member of the Lancaster Conference. The Bowmansville Dillers moved near Newville in 1790. Their farmhouse was used as a meetinghouse until 1820, when the present church was built, which was enlarged in 1903. The 1954 membership and Sunday-school enrollment were 23 and 32 respectively. Walter Charlton and Earl Mosemann are serving as pastors. I.D.L.

Diller, Michael (d. 1570), chaplain at the Palatine court, had originally been an Augustinian monk at Speyer and since 1530 prior of the monastery, but had to leave the city in 1548 on account of Protestant sympathies. He had been used by the city council to convert the Anabaptists (Medicus, 22). With the final establishment of the Reformation in the Palatinate, Elector Otto Heinrich appointed him as a member of the church council which was created in 1556. The tolerant elector tried to come to terms with the Anabaptists by peaceful methods. Hence the proposals of the church board express a more lenient attitude than was found in other regions at the time. Among other things they favored thorough indoctrination of the Anabaptists by the parsons of the state church, suppression of religious services outside the established church, and finally expulsion of persistent adherents to the Anabaptist brotherhood (Hege, 88-91). After the disputation at Pfeddersheim, in which Diller probably participated, the Anabaptist leaders and outside participants in the disputation were expelled.

A few weeks later Diller joined the conference of the leading Protestant theologians meeting at Worms, Sept. 11 to Oct. 7, 1557, in recommending to the German rulers the use of capital punishment against the Anabaptists. He signed the document published there in the same year, Prozess, wie es soll gehalten werden mit den Wiedertäufern, in which the idea that no one should be killed because of his faith is refuted by two Bible passages, Lev. 24 and Rom. 13 (Hege, 93-96 and Menn. Bl., 1893, 108 ff.). It is very likely due to the efforts of chaplain Diller that the elector on Jan. 25, 1558, issued a stern edict against the Anabaptists, ordering "in accord with counsel we have received" that the leaders be punished in accord with imperial law; i.e., with death (see Punishment of Anabaptists). But the elector examined every case and in the remaining few months of his life he apparently signed no death sentences; for it is reported that he granted the Anabaptists domicile in his realm on condition that they conduct themselves quietly (Hege, 94-99).

The extent of Diller's influence on the succeeding Elector Frederick III, who was at the beginning of his reign also strongly urged to persecute the Anabaptists, remains for investigation; likewise his cooperation in the suppression of the Anabaptists in the margravure of Baden-Durlach, where Margrave Karl II on June 1, 1556, issued the church order which had been drawn up with Diller's aid, and which is very similar to that of the Palatinate. Diller died in 1570. HEGE.

Dillon (Ill.) Mennonite Church (MC) was organized as a separate congregation under the Illinois Mennonite Conference in September 1952, after several years as a branch Sunday school sponsored by the Hopedale Mennonite congregation. Meetings are held in a building owned by the Methodist Episcopal Church in the unincorporated village of Dillon, about five miles southwest of Tremont. John V. Troyer was ordained as pastor when the congregation was organized, and still serves (1954), with a membership of 37. N.P.S.

Dillonvale (Ohio) Mennonite Mission (MC), located in a coal-mining section near Steubenville, was started in September 1942, following a series of tent meetings sponsored by the Kidron Mennonite Church, which is still responsible for the work. Services are held every Sunday in the chapel of the two-and-a-half-story structure which was purchased in 1944 for that purpose. Evangelistic meetings and a summer Bible school are held every year. The membership in 1954 was 21, with Richard Hostetler as pastor. A.B.

Dillsberg, a district near Heidelberg, Germany. The official register of Mennonites of 1759 names Muselmann and Bechtel in Langenzell, Horsch, Steiner, and Kaufmann in Mauer, Schellenberger and Brand in Angelloch, Neukomm in Schatthausen, a total of 78 persons of Swiss origin.

About 1800 Martin and David Kaufmann lived at Daisbach. In 1802 that region was added to Baden and the Mennonites were generally accepted as citizens. At that time the complaint of the Kaufmann brothers concerning the continued levying of defense fees (see Nonresistance) was referred to the constitutional committee of Mannheim for final decision; a general order of April 17, 1802, granted release from protection fees. Dingentgen (Digna), a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, whose official name was Baudinken (Baudewijnken) Het; van Braght (Mart. Mir.) calls her Dingentgen van Hondschoote (Honschoten). She was originally from the region of St. Winnoxbergen, Flanders, was 30 years of age and unmarried. She was living in Hondschoote, Flanders, and had been baptized in this town by Paulus van Meenen (q.v.) in 1568. On Dec. 4, 1572 (Mart. Mir. gives no date), she was publicly burned at the stake on the Vrijdagsmarkt at Gent, Belgium, together with Martin van der Straten, Adriaen Rogiers, and Mattheeus Bernaerts. (*Mart. Dinuba, Cal., is a town located about in the center of the state, in Tulare County, spreading over an area of slightly more than a section of land, with a population of 5,000, and a trade area of about 20,000. There are 1,000 to 1,200 Mennonites within the Dinuba shopping area, 10 to 15 per cent of whom live in Dinuba proper. The first Mennonite settlers came to the Dinuba area in 1904. In about 1908 the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren built their church five miles southwest of Dinuba. In 1938 a group of 250 Mennonite Brethren, former members of the Reedley Mennonite Brethren congregation, built a church in Dinuba, with a seating capacity of 1,000. Altogether there are 14 churches in Dinuba with a registered membership of 3,800. Dinuba is a clean, beautiful town, surrounded by a flourishing fruit-growing community in the heart of the prolific San Joaquin Valley. B.J.B.

Dinuba (Cal.) Mennonite Brethren Church had its beginning in Reedley, Cal., in April 1925, when a number of M.B. Church members organized as the South Reedley M.B. Church. A hall was procured and J. H. Richert served as the first pastor. The congregation was received as a church into the M.B. Pacific District Conference and continued to grow, numbering 163 members in 1926.

In 1937 the congregation built a large Sunday-school hall in Dinuba, in which it conducted all its services until 1939, when it built a large church with an auditorium seating over 1,000. The congregation has continued to increase and has at present (1954) a membership of 595. Most of these are farmers but some live in town and are engaged in business or are laborers.

The following ministers have served as pastors: J. H. Richert, John Berg, J. J. Hiebert, J. P. Siemens, and B. J. Braun, who is the present pastor. The congregation has a Sunday school, Christian Endeavor, Christian Fellowship, choir, and men's chorus. The Sunday morning service is broadcast. The church does extension work in other communities in which a number of young people are active. J.H.L.

Dinuba (Cal.) Mennonite (MC) Church (unorganized), now extinct. Members of the congregation located in this vicinity in 1906 and 1907. Sunday-school services were first held in the home of E. C. Weaver and then later in a schoolhouse in Dinuba. The conference records for 1911 reported a membership of 22; the maximum membership was 32. No minister was located here, and the members gradually moved away. (S. G. Shetler, Church Hist. of the Pacific Coast Menn. Conf. Dist., Scottdale, 1921.) M.G.

Dirck (Cuiper), an Anabaptist martyr beheaded at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, on Dec. 20, 1551. He is said to have held a false opinion of the (Roman Catholic) Sacrament. This martyr is not identical with Dirc Cuper, who was one of the messengers of Jan Matthijs. vdZ.

Dirck, Cleynen (Dierick Jonckhans; Little Dirk in English edition of Mart. Mir.), an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Walderveen near Trier, Germany, was taken prisoner at Antwerp, Belgium. He was examined three times and beheaded at the Steen prison at Antwerp, on July 21, 1558. His name is found in the song "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren. vdZ.

Dirc(k) Cuper (Cuiper, de Cuyper), an Anabaptist leader in the Netherlands during the first years of the movement. In December 1533 he was one of the twelve apostles sent out from Amsterdam by Jan Matthijsz van Haarlem (q.v.). With Bartel Boeckbinder (q.v.) Dirck came to Leeuwarden in Friesland, where they baptized and ordained as elders Obbe Philips (q.v.) and Hans Barbier (q.v.). Nothing more is known about his life. Reitsma erroneously identified him with the Dirck Cuiper who was beheaded at Leeuwarden in 1551. Karel Vos is probably right (DB 1917, 101) in stating that a man called Dirck Jacobsz de Cuyper, taken prisoner at Gouda, Dutch province of South Holland, and brought to The Hague on March 5, 1535, is identical with the Dirck Cuper who baptized Obbe Philips. vdZ.

Dirck Houtstapeler, an Anabaptist martyr executed at Zwolle, Dutch province of Overijssel, in March 1534. He was one of the 3,000 Anabaptists who had sailed from Amsterdam to Bergklooster (q.v.) en route to Münster, and seems to have been a principal leader on this journey. He was the husband of the martyr Baef Claesdochter (q.v.). (Mellink, Wederdopers, 38 f.) vdZ.

Dirck Janssen (Dirck de Snijder), a glazier of Amsterdam, took part in the action of the Naaktlopers (q.v.; Anabaptists who ran naked along the streets in Amsterdam on Feb. 10, 1535), and was beheaded there Feb. 25, 1535. (Grosheide, Verhooren, 57-58.) vdZ.

Dirck Jansz, an Anabaptist martyr of Bocholt, was sentenced to be burned at the stake at Leiden, Holland, on Nov. 24, 1552, together with Heynric Dircsz (q.v.) and Adriaen Cornelisz (q.v.). These brethren, who steadfastly suffered martyrdom, are celebrated in a song found in the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren: "Ick magh wel droeflijck singen, in desen tijt van noot" (I must sing sadly in this time of distress). According to Karel Vos, Leidsch Jaarboekje 1918, 36 ff., Dirck Jansz is the author of a song which he composed while in prison, beginning "Waket doch op met grooten vlijt" (Awake with zeal), found in the hymnbook Een nieu Liedtboeck of 1562 and the following editions. Dirck Jansz, an Anabaptist martyr, originally of Borkelt near Münster, Westphalia, Germany, and afterwards a citizen of Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, was tortured there, but refused to name his brethren. He remained steadfast and maintained his opinion, for which reason he was "punished" by being strangled and burned at the stake. The date of execution was likely Feb. 5, 1561. vdZ.

Dirck Pietersz (alias Smuel or Simil), an Anabaptist martyr, a blacksmith by trade, living in Edam, Dutch province of North Holland. He had been baptized and held meetings in his house on the dike near Edam. He was apprehended together with Jacob de Geldersman (q.v.) on March 24, 1546, and brought to Amsterdam by ship, where he was examined. Dirck Pietersz confessed that he thought the Roman Catholic Church could not be the true church, which was only to be found in the "meeting of believers"; neither did he believe in purgatory. He admitted that he had read in his house together with others "the book of the Gospel." He did not possess books of Menno Simons or David Joris, but confessed that he had a Bible, a New Testament, and a "booklet of the faith." (It is not clear what book this was.) On May 5 both men were brought to The Hague, where they were examined again. Dirck was put on the rack on May 16, but remained steadfast. He was sentenced to death on May 22. The next day both Dirck and Jacob were brought back to Amsterdam and burned at the stake on May 24. The execution of Dirck must have been very cruel, for it lasted for more than 24 hours. For this reason the executioner received special remuneration. Dirck Pietersz while in prison wrote a letter (called Testament) to his wife, Wellemoet Claes, and also a letter to all friends of the evangelical truth. Both letters are found in the Martyrs' Mirror. The account in the Martyrs' Mirror about Dirck Pietersz is not quite correct. After having mentioned the martyrdom of Dirck Pietersz Smuel and Jacob de Geldersman, van Braght inserts another account of two martyrs Andries Smuel and Dirck Pietersz, 1546 (without date). Here van Braght must be in error; there is no further trace of a martyr called Andries Smuel; Andries Smuel and Dirck Pietersz must be the same. vdZ.

Dirck de Schilder, an Anabaptist martyr, was executed on Oct. 8, 1558, at Antwerp, Belgium. It is not known how he was put to death, whether by beheading or burning at the stake. He was probably beheaded, for in the song of the Liedtboecxken van den Offer des Heeren, beginning "Aenhoort Godt, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), it is said that he had to kneel before the executioner. His official name was Dirck Effeleer(s); he was a native of Mechelen, Belgium, and a painter by trade. vdZ.

Dirck van Wormer (Dirck Groede), a native of Wormer, Dutch province of North Holland, had tried to snatch the holy sacrament from the hands of a priest during a procession at Wormer in the spring of 1535. After this a fight arose, in which some Anabaptists took an active part. Dirck had bandaged a wounded Anabaptist and tended him secretly. It is not clear if Dirck was an Anabaptist himself or a Sacramentist (q.v., a group who opposed the Roman Catholic doctrine of the holy sacrament). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 83, 101; DB 1909, 15-16.) vdZ.

Dirckgen Tasch (Dirck or Derk Tasschemaker), originally from Amsterdam, a little known Anabaptist leader in the Netherlands in its earliest period. In 1534 he was active in preaching and baptizing in Leeuwarden and Emden. Later on he lived in Antwerp, where he died in late 1534 or early 1535. His prophecy (summer of 1534) that after a darkness of three days the Lord would give the city of Amsterdam to the Anabaptists without bloodshed, is evidence of his eschatological, but peaceful ideas. vdZ.

Dirk van Borne, a printer of Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel, had printed and published the Groot Wonderboek by David Joris (q.v.). He was seized July 1544; in January 1545 he was placed under house arrest until August 1545, and even then he was not allowed to leave the town. Dirk was not a follower of David Joris; he was a Catholic and defended himself by saying that he had not known that the book of David Joris which Jurriaen Ketel had given him for printing was a heretical book. Dirk Gerritsz van den Busch, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of the hamlet of Bus or den Busch near Krommenie in Waterland, Dutch province of North Holland. The account by van Braght (Mart. Mir.) has been shown to be incorrect in calling him Jonker Dirk, which suggests that he was a nobleman. Dirk Gerritsz many have been called "jonkman," i.e., an unmarried man. Also the year in which van Braght places the execution, 1542, is wrong. It must have been 1534. On April 15 of that year three Anabaptists from Krommeniedijk were cruelly put to death at The Hague. Their names were Jan Dirksz Walen, Dirk Gerritsz, and Cornelis Luytgens (or Luytsz). They were seized at Bergklooster (q.v.) on the boats in which they had sailed from North Holland to go to Münster. vdZ.

Dirk Philips(z) (Filips) (1504-68), son of a Dutch priest. He became a Franciscan monk. As a man of good education he had a command of Latin and Greek, and also knew some Hebrew. It is doubtful that he wrote in French his booklet on the ban and avoidance, which he published in the French language. It is possible that he studied at a university. H. Schijn (Hist. Menn. plenior deductio, 1729, p. 186) calls him a learned man, more learned than Menno Simons. He was not acquainted with Luther's writings.

At the end of 1533 Dirk joined the Anabaptist brotherhood. He was baptized at Leeuwarden in Friesland, by Pieter Houtzager, and was soon afterward, presumably early in 1534, "upon the wish of the brethren" ordained an elder by the laying on of the hands of his own brother Obbe Philips (q.v.) at "Den Dam," i.e., Appingedam, in the Dutch province of Groningen. He was soon a leader; in 1537 he was named as one of the outstanding Anabaptist leaders; he took part in the most important events of the following years, and nearly always was present at the conferences of the elders, as in Goch in 1547, where Adam Pastor (q.v.) was banned, and in 1554 in Wismar among the seven elders, who formulated an agreement on a number of contested points. Like Obbe and Menno he was an opponent of the Münsterite doctrines. Against Rothmann's Restitution (1534) he wrote his booklet, Van de geestelijcke Restitution (On the Spiritual Restitution).

At first Dirk worked in the Netherlands, then in East Friesland, Mecklenburg, Holstein, and Prussia. But he must have gone to the Netherlands on several occasions; about 1561 he baptized several persons in Utrecht and celebrated communion with about 20 brethren (DB 1903, 21 f.). We are told that the meeting lasted from four in the morning until seven in the evening; probably not because they needed so much time, but because they wanted to enter and leave the house under cover of darkness. Dirk is described on that occasion as "an old man, not very tall, with a gray beard and white hair." After 1550 his home was at Danzig, where a number of Dutch Mennonites had already located.

Dirk Philips is without doubt the leading theologian and dogmatician among the Dutch and North German Mennonites of that time. He is more systematic than Menno, though of course also more severe and one-sided. Like Menno he preached the doctrine of nonresistance, though there is not much in his writings on this subject. He shares Menno's conception of the Incarnation. Against Adam Pastor he upholds the doctrine of the Trinity. In opposition to his brother Obbe he always put much stress on the visible church, which should preserve itself from the world without spot or wrinkle. In the interest of protecting the brotherhood he demands a strict application of the ban and the subsequent avoidance. The open sinners shall be expelled from the congregation if they do not show genuine repentance; they are to be shunned in daily life, because the church of God, which consists of the elect, must be pure and holy. The bride of Christ dare not forsake her Bridegroom and yield herself to the world and the flesh.

In his book on the church he names seven ordinances of the church of God: pure doctrine, Scriptural use of the sacraments, washing the feet of the saints, separation (ban and avoidance), the command of love, obedience to the commands of Christ, suffering and persecution. On the whole it cannot be denied that there is in Dirk Philips' theology a certain moralism and legalism. He writes better than Menno, but he has less agreeableness, friendliness, and charm. He was a strict, indeed an obstinate person. This can best be seen in the disputes between him and Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.). Even considering that the question at issue concerns the pure church of Christ and that this ideal requires a measure of severity, nevertheless the sad consequences of this strict banning and partisanship are without question to be reckoned against the obstinate and proud elder, Dirk Philips. Already in 1565 Leenaert Bouwens had been suspended from his office. In 1567 Dirk journeyed from Danzig to Emden. Then the division occurred: Dirk sided with the Flemish (q.v.), who at once banned the Frisians (q.v.), while the Frisians, whom Leenaert had joined, on their side banned the Flemish. Dirk was also banned (July 8, 1567), but did not let it trouble him, because he no longer considered Leenaert and the Frisians as members of the church of God. (Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 395-426.)

In the next year Dirk died at Het Falder near Emden, after he had completed his booklet on Christian marriage on March 7, 1568.

Although Dirk Philips surpassed the other elders in knowledge and was a good writer and an eloquent and influential man, he was nevertheless inferior to Menno Simons, with whom he had worked so many years and upon whom he exerted a certain influence in his later years when the severe banning took its course. It is unpleasant to note that Menno's name does not once occur in Dirk's writings. When in the first half of the 17th century the practice of the ban became more lenient among the Dutch and North German Mennonites, the interest in Dirk Philips also waned; his writings are held in high esteem by the Old Order Amish because they advocate the ban and avoidance.

Dirk Philips spread his views in numerous booklets. At the end of his life he collected his writings that had been published, several of which are still extant in their various editions, and published them in a single volume. This is the Enchiridion oft Hantboecxken van de Christelijcke Leere, . . . 1564. The "little" handbook (it contains almost 650 pages!) contains the following writings: Confession of Faith, Concerning the Incarnation, Concerning the True Knowledge of Jesus Christ, Apologia, the Call of the Preacher, Loving Admonition (on the ban), Concerning the True Knowledge of God, Exposition of the Tabernacle of Moses, Concerning the New Birth, Concerning Spiritual Restoration, Three Thorough Admonitions, Table of Contents.

In addition he wrote: Verantwoordinghe ende Refutation op twee Sendtbrieven Sebastiani Franck (printed in 1567, not extant, and 1619); Cort doch grondtlick Verhael (concerning the quarrels between the Flemish and Frisians, printed in 1567); Van die Echt der Christenen (printed in 1569, 1602, 1634, 1644, and perhaps other editions); and the tract left at his death on the ban and avoidance, which was translated from the French and printed in 1602.

Of the Enchiridion there are in the Dutch language editions of 1564, 1578, 1579, 1600, and 1627. A French edition of 1626 (in the same volume with some writings of Menno Simons and others), German editions in 1715 and Basel in 1802; Lancaster, 1811; Elkhart, 1872 (this and the following German editions include the writings on marriage and on the ban); Scottdale, 1917; English edition, Elkhart, 1910.

Two hymns from the pen of Dirk Philips have been preserved, and were adopted into the old Dutch hymnals of the Mennonites.

F. Pijper edited a complete edition of all the writings (including letters and hymns) of Dirk Philips (BRN X).† vdZ.

Dirk Pietersz, an Anabaptist martyr mentioned in Martyrs' Mirror (D 75, E 476), is probably identical with Dirck Pietersz (Smuel) (q.v.). vdZ.

Dirk Pietersz Krood, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Wormer, Dutch province of North Holland, was executed at Enkhuizen, also in the province of North Holland. Particulars are lacking; even the year of execution is unknown. (Mart. Mir. D 61, E 464.) vdZ.

Dirk Roloffszoon, an Anabaptist martyr of Zutphen, beheaded at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, on Nov. 12, 1539, because he had been rebaptized and had "a bad opinion of the holy sacrament of the altar." vdZ.

J. Reitsma, Honderd jaren uit de Gesch. der Hervorming . . . in Friesland (Leeuwarden, 1876) 63.

Dirk Vredricx (Vaertgen), an Anabaptist martyr of Krommeniedijk, Dutch province of North Holland, was sentenced to death and beheaded at Haarlem on March 26, 1534, together with six other Anabaptists, because they were rebaptized, had renounced the Roman Catholic doctrines and rebaptized many persons. Dirk is said to have been a preacher. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; DB 1917, 115, No. 55; ibid., 151-52; 1918, 144; note 2.) vdZ.

Dirk Wessels (van Wesel), an Anabaptist martyr, was one of a group of 12 Mennonites, among whom was also his wife Janneken, who were taken prisoner at Deventer (q.v.), Dutch province of Overijssel, during a hunt of "heretics" by Spanish soldiers. Some of this group forsook their faith for a while, but later repented, and all remained steadfast, though they were cruelly tortured. On May 24 they had a dispute with some monks. Between this day and June 16, 1571, Dirk was burned at the stake at Deventer together with Harmen de Wever (q.v.) and four women martyrs. Before he was put to death, he knelt for prayer, kissed Harmen and encouraged him by lifting up his hand to heaven; then he cheerfully went to the stake and was burned. (Mart. Mir. D 552 ff., E 885; DB 1919, 29, 35; ML I, 449.) Neff, vdZ.

Dirk Willemsz, an Anabaptist martyr, was born and lived at Asperen, Dutch province of South Holland. He was burned at the stake outside the town of Asperen on May 16, 1569. Van Braght (Mart. Mir.) relates the following story: Dirk managed to escape from prison; pursued by a guard or policeman he succeeded in saving his life by crossing a wide river covered with thin ice; the policeman following him on the ice fell in and was on the point of drowning. Then Dirk came back and saved the man, who was very grateful and would have let him go, but the burgomaster, coming along, ordered him to seize the heretic. So Dirk was brought back to prison and after some months died steadfastly. In the Martyrs' Mirror there is a fine etching of the rescue. (Mart. Mir. D 387, E 741.) vdZ.

Dirks, Heinrich, a missionary, elder, evangelist, and writer, was born Aug. 17, 1842, at Gnadenfeld, Molotschna Mennonite settlement, Ukraine. His father was David Dirks from Brenkenhoffswalde, Germany, and belonged to the Gnadenfeld (q.v.) Mennonites of Russia who had been closely associated with the Moravian Brethren in Germany and stimulated a revival of missionary and cultural interests among the Mennonites of Russia. Heinrich Dirks graduated from the secondary Vereinsschule at the age of twenty-one. He was baptized by Elder August Lenzmann May 12, 1860.

Dirks was not only the first Mennonite of Russia to obtain a formal education abroad but also the first Mennonite of Russia to go out as a missionary to a foreign land. This happened in the days when revivals were sweeping through the Mennonite settlements renewing their religious and educational interests and also resulting in the founding of the Mennonite Brethren Church. Heinrich Dirks enrolled at the Missionshaus at Barmen, Germany, in 1862 and was graduated in 1866. During the following year he received private instruction in Amsterdam in the Javanese, Malayan, Dutch, and English languages. In 1867 he was ordained minister at Gnadenfeld and on Aug. 31, 1869, he was ordained missionary and elder by August Lenzmann. During the same year he married Agnes Schröder. After an impressive farewell from the Mission Board of Amsterdam they left the Netherlands on Nov. 24, sailing to the Dutch East Indies, where he opened a new Mennonite mission field at Pakanten, Sumatra, Jan. 10, 1871. On Aug. 6 he baptized the first three converts and within ten years he had baptized 125 converts from heathenism and Mohammedanism. Because of the education of his children he returned to Gnadenfeld in May 1881, and he was made elder of his home congregation. To the end of his life he was also a conference traveling evangelist and a promoter of missions. His wish to return to Sumatra to visit his son David, who succeeded him in mission work, was never fulfilled. He had already reserved passage for a trip in 1914 when he became ill. During his illness he was in Sumatra in thought almost constantly. He died on Feb. 8, 1915.

Dirks ranks among the men like Johann Cornies in his significance to the Mennonites of Russia. The chairman of the Dutch Mennonite Board of Missions wrote in his memory, "The fact that during the years a number of brethren and some sisters from Russia (a total of 13 not counting wives of missionaries) have joined our mission and the fact that the Mennonite congregations of Russia have supported the work of our mission in an increasing measure we owe above all to him" (Zondagsbode, May 16, 1915). In 1910 he was appointed a member of this Mission Board and attended the meeting in Amsterdam during that year. He traveled extensively in Germany, Holland, and America, in the interest of missions. In Russia he was the speaker at mission festivals which took place between Pentecost and the late fall from year to year at the various settlements, a tradition which he built up and which dated back to Moravian influence. At the Bundeskonferenz meetings and in the Mennonitisches Jahrbuch he gave his annual reports on the mission work. The financial reports of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Board indicate to what a degree they relied on the contributions solicited in Russia through his efforts.

Dirks was also a very active promoter of other conference activities. From 1903 to 1910 he edited the Mennonitisches Jahrbuch, which gradually became a conference publication and is today one of the most valuable sources of information on the Mennonites of Russia before World War I, dealing with settlements, congregations, education, missions, philanthropic institutions, including conference reports, etc. As a conference worker Dirks emphasized a warm, evangelical Christianity, and favored the establishment of a theological school and conference publications. In his numerous writings he not only pointed the way to an aggressive positive Christian witness at home and abroad but also lamented the disrupting forces at work through the "separatistic" efforts of the groups separating themselves from the main body of the Mennonites in his day. Many of his writings are devoted to this concern: to strengthen the congregations against all disrupting forces, whether of secular or religious nature.

Dirks was not only a very influential and popular speaker but also a gifted writer. Among his many booklets and articles we list the following: "Die Mennoniten in Russland," an annual survey started in 1903 in Mennonitisches Jahrbuch and continued until 1911; "Aus der Gnadenfelder Gemeindechronik," ibid., 1908-12; "Die Mennonitische Aeussere Mission," ibid., 1903-13; Ist es recht, dass man sich noch einmal taufen lässt? (Gnadenfeld, 1891); Das Reich Gottes . . . (Gnadenfeld, 1892); Taufe, Gemeindebeschaffenheit und Abendmahl (Gross-Tokmak, 1904); Statistik der Mennonitengemeinden in Russland Ende 1905 (Gnadenfeld, 1906); Adressbüchlein der Kirchenbuchführer der Mennonitengemeinden Russlands (Berdyansk, 1913). Dirks, Kornelius, was ordained as minister of the Waldheim Mennonite Church in the Molotschna (q.v.) settlement in South Russia in 1876 and elder in 1877. When Mennonites of the Molotschna villages in the years after 1880 settled on the Kuban River he joined them and became the first elder of the Wohldemfürst-Alexandrodar Mennonite Church. Little is known about his life and activities. C.K.

Dirksen (Dircksen, Dirks, Duerksen, Derksen, Doerksen, Dercksen, Dyrksen, Dirssen, Dirck, Dircks, Derks), a Mennonite family name of Frisian origin, appearing in all West Prussian congregations; first mentioned in 1568 at Danzig and in 1605 at Gross Lubin. Most of the families in the Vistula Valley and their descendants adopted the form Dirks. In 1776, 42 families of this name were counted in West Prussia (without Danzig), and in 1935 (without Elbing) 62 persons. Members of the family emigrated to Russia and America. The name is now widely represented among all North and South American Mennonite groups having their origins in South Russia and Poland.

Some of the outstanding representatives of this name were Alle Derks (q.v.), Heinrich Dirks (q.v.), and David G. Dürksen (q.v.). (G. Conrad, Gesch. der Familie Dirksen und der Adelsfamilie von Dirksen, Görlitz, 1905.) G.R.

Dirksz, Jacob (called Oom Jacob Dirksz), was an elder of the Frisian congregation of Wormerveer (q.v.), Dutch province of North Holland, 1648-89. During his leadership some troubles arose in the congregation of Wormerveer, because a part of the members turned to more liberal views. Oom Jacob, though maintaining the confessions and being more conservative than most of the members of his church, was much respected and succeeded in settling the quarrels. Jacob Dirksz wrote a number of books: Eenige Predicatien tot Boete . . . (1st ed., 1673; 2d ed., Amsterdam, 1697); De Christelyke Huisvader (Amsterdam, 1677); Vijf Predicatien over eenige duistere . . . Schriftuurplaatzen (Amsterdam-Hoorn, 1678); Een Allegorisch-Historisch Verhaal van het . . . Koningryk van Salem, with pictures by Jan Luyken (Amsterdam, 1683). He also composed some hymns, which were inserted in C. Stapel's Lusthof der Zielen (q.v.). Jacob Dirksz is the ancestor of the widespread Dekker (q.v.) family. vdZ.

Dirmstein, a district in the Palatinate, under the jurisdiction of Alzey (q.v.) until it was ceded to the bishopric of Worms. Mennonites were found here as early as 1588 and 1596. To the Dirmstein district belonged the villages of Obersülzen, Heppenheim auf der Wiese, Gerolsheim, Rodenbach, and Harxheim, where Swiss Mennonites settled after 1650. When the Anabaptist Concession of 1664 allowed them to settle, there were already 40 Mennonite households (172 persons) in the Dirmstein area; in 1680, 46 households (218 persons); in 1686, 57 households (number of persons not stated).

Economically, as rebuilders of the badly devastated regions of Alzey, the Swiss were highly esteemed. In 1667 the Count of Sayn-Wittgenstein advocated bringing in more Mennonites "from the lower countries." Nevertheless they received little favorable treatment. In 1658 the Mennonites appealed in vain for release from the fee (30 Talers) they were required to pay (see Nonresistance), even though there were many poor among them, and rebuilding the dilapidated farms required large amounts of money. In the 1680's their meetings were disturbed, contrary to the agreement in the renewed Concession. Orders were in fact issued forbidding their "too great attendance of meetings" (50 to 100 persons met every three or four weeks in a barn at Dirmstein), and expelling the preachers who came from the outside, principally from Mannheim (q.v.). The petitions of the Mennonites were finally granted to the extent of making religious activity a little easier.

This subdistrict is no longer listed in later documents, the Mennonites having left the villages largely because of war. In 1802 Dirmstein still had 33 Mennonites. The names of the Mennonites at Dirmstein were Baumer, Blos, Blum, Braun, Gassert, Grauwinkel, Hörstein, Jansen, Kramer, Linn, Michel, Schmidt, Schumacker.

The method of farming introduced by the Möllingers (q.v.) in Monsheim-Pfeddersheim spread to Dirmstein by 1800. Schwerz (q.v.), the noted agrarian reformer of the time, described conditions there, especially the farm and distillery of the Jansons (q.v.). E.H.C.

Discipline, Book of (or Rules and Discipline), the body of rules and regulations governing the exercise of the authority of the church in the care and control of its members for the maintenance of purity of faith and life, the removal of offenses, and the general edification of the church, and including penalties for disobedience up to and including excommunication. All Catholic and Protestant denominations have such a body of rules and regulations, written or unwritten, and many of them specifically term the written form "the discipline" or "the book of discipline." For instance, the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. first adopted its present 30-page "book of discipline" in 1788. The Methodist Episcopal Church has a Book of Discipline of over 300 pages.

Printed disciplines either of congregations or conferences are found in all North American Mennonite branches. All the district conferences of the Mennonite Church (MC) have a printed conference "discipline," which usually had its origin at the very beginning of the conference. The Eastern District Conference of the General Conference Mennonite Church published its Ordnung in 1848. The Evangelical Mennonites of Eastern Pennsylvania (now Mennonite Brethren in Christ) published its first Doctrine of Faith and Church Discipline in 1867 (tr. of Glaubenslehre und Kirchenzucht-Ordnung of 1866). In those groups which have congregational autonomy, the "disciplines" are usually congregational, sometimes stated in the form of constitutions or articles of faith; in others they are conference disciplines.

The content of the disciplines varies with the degrees of strictness in discipline. Usually a discipline specifies the various items of belief or conduct which are forbidden, states how disobedient members are to be dealt with, defines the duties of the church officials and the congregation with respect to discipline, and states the grounds for forfeiture and restoration of membership. H.S.B.

Discipline, Concept, Idea, and Practice of. The concept of discipline implies the adoption and maintenance by the group of standards of faith and life which are binding upon the individual members. It accordingly implies a certain doctrine of the church, namely (1) that the body of the church has authority over individual members, and (2) that the church needs clearly defined ideas of faith and conduct, which must be applied. Thus the church is not only a worshiping fellowship of believers or saints, but a body with a certain order as an essential part of its life. The concept of discipline implies that it is the duty of the church to maintain this order by the exercise of spiritual pressure as well as by the preaching of the Gospel and the proclamation of standards of righteousness and holy living. The spiritual pressure serves to impress upon the individual the serious nature of sin and transgression against the law of God and the standard of the Gospel as set forth in the standards of the church, warn him of dangers and harm to spiritual life resulting from such transgressions, and finally severs him from the fellowship of the body as unworthy of and dangerous to the body. The pressure may be exercised by the direct admonition of the bishop-elder, pastor, or deacon, or by the expression of the voice of the church in resolutions or votes, or by the ban and excommunication. Teaching and counseling of course usually precede and accompany such disciplinary pressures and are an aid. The purpose of all truly Scriptural discipline is the correction of errors and sins and the restoration of the offenders; discipline accordingly cannot be punitive, but must always be loving and redemptive.

Discipline and the maintenance of order was characteristic of the Anabaptist-Mennonite movement from the very beginning and in all areas, and continued to be so until in the late 19th century. By this time discipline was becoming lax in the more liberal Dutch and Northwest German groups and ultimately disappeared there. There has been a noticeable decline in certain other groups, also in North America. This decline of the principle of discipline is something different from the change of the content of discipline, which is also noticeable in most groups. In certain groups and times discipline has been very strict and rigid with the prescription of many and detailed rules governing conduct, costume, marriage, occupations, relation with the outside world, consumption of food and beverages, etc. Disputes over strictness, details of rules, or methods of enforcement have often occurred in Mennonite history and not seldom led to schisms both in congregations and in larger groups including an entire body. In fact most Mennonite schisms have been over matters of discipline.

Historically the bishop-elder has been the bearer of disciplinary power. When his prestige has been high, discipline has been vigorous and effective. The decline in the prestige and influence of this office has usually been the signal for a decline in discipline. Originally the congregation shared directly in the disciplinary function, its approval being required to make the disciplinary proposals or acts of the bishop effective. In later times (19th century in Russia, 20th century in Mennonite Church, MC, in Pennsylvania) the bishops acquired considerable freedom of disciplinary action either as individuals or as a body (e.g., Lancaster Conference Board of Bishops). Among the Old Order Amish it is still necessary to have the congregation approve the bishop's exercise of disciplinary power.

Severe or harsh exercise of disciplinary power by the bishop has often produced resentment and resistance among the membership and reduced the pastoral and preaching effectiveness of the bishop involved. At times the temptation to depend on personal pressure or authoritarian methods has resulted in a spiritually dangerous legalism and externalism. But Mennonite history has often proved that proper discipline, combined with good pastoral work and effective preaching, produces a wholesome church administration and leadership, which makes for a strong and vigorous church with high standards, in contrast to the church without discipline, when each "does that which is right in his own eyes."

The decision of the Anabaptists to withdraw from the state churches, both Catholic and Protestant, but particularly the Protestant, was in a certain sense the result of differing concepts concerning church discipline, which in turn were based on differing concepts of the church and the nature of Christianity. One of the most common charges by the Anabaptists was that the state churches tolerated sin among both members and clergy and did not attempt to maintain true holiness. The Lutheran churches did establish a certain amount of discipline, which gradually died out (excommunication was practically dead by the 17th century), and minor forms of discipline were displaced largely in the rationalistic period. The Calvinistic churches believed in discipline and practiced it much more than the Lutherans; in fact they considered true discipline as one of the marks of the true church. Even in Calvinism, however, discipline gradually died out. From the 18th century on, discipline was almost invisible in all Protestantism except the English Free

Churches and the North American denominations. The state churches had come to rely on preaching and religious instruction in the schools and on catechism. Methodism revived discipline and maintained it vigorously until the late 19th century.

The influence of the Anabaptist critique on the practice of discipline in the Reformation period is now recognized, though not fully studied. The best example is Hesse, Germany, where Bucer (q.v.) was called in by the authorities to aid in meeting the Anabaptist challenge and where the Ziegenhain Kirchen-Ordnung of 1538 was the direct result of a conscientious attempt to meet the Anabaptist critique. Adam Krafft, who was the court chaplain and Professor of Theology at the University of Marburg, and other leading clergymen had openly admitted the validity of the Anabaptist critique for some years and called for a stricter discipline as the best means to turn the Anabaptists (see Hesse). Bucer had been forced to face the Anabaptist challenge in Strasbourg from 1525 on, where the Anabaptist influence in a stricter discipline is admitted. Whether Calvin (q.v.) was influenced in his disciplinary concepts by Anabaptism, particularly during his Strasbourg period 1538-41 or even 1535-36 (he married Idelette de Bure, q.v., the widow of an Anabaptist), is uncertain. Zwingli's introduction of discipline in Zürich was certainly motivated in part by the Anabaptist threat. The Bernese government struggled with the Anabaptists for three centuries and more than once admitted the prevalence of offensive sins and vices in the church, as the Anabaptists charged. In 1585, for instance, an official mandate declared, "This is the greatest reason that many God-fearing pious people forsake our church [to join the Brethren]."

This major difference between the state churches, for that matter the mass of nominal Christendom at all times, and the Anabaptist-Mennonite movement has always been present. But it is not only the latter who have called for and practiced discipline, but a long series of separatist groups from the very beginning of Christian history down to the present day. The requirement of discipline is in fact regarded by most students of church history and the sociology of religion as a characteristic of the "sect-type." For the Anabaptist-Mennonites at least it has been a mark of the true New Testament Church. (See Ban, Excommunication.) H.S.B.

Disputations (colloquia, religious debates), discussions on matters of doctrine, with the purpose of eliminating differences within a group, throwing light on differences between various religious groups, and bringing victory to one side in the argument. Discussions of this kind have been known from the very early days of Christianity, but they were not of great influence in preserving the unity of the church until the time of the Councils, at which religious debates constituted a part of the arranged program. The presupposition was that the church was in possession of the absolute truth, that deviations were due to erroneous thinking on the part of the differing side, and that absolute truth would be restored by the revelation and condemnation of the error.

From the point of view of theological history these debates took place against a background of medieval views and concepts. Thinking does not yet have as its goal understanding through reason, but rather understanding through revelation. The word is still accompanied by mystical conceptions and a bondage to the medieval manner of thought is still noticeable in the leaders. The masses likewise were still more held by the medieval attitudes and frequently gave these disputations a significance approaching direct revelation from God. For this reason the leaders of the parties in the disputes often laid great value on publicity.

The disputations took place publicly and privately, before the assembled populace with noted speakers and theologians, or in the narrower circle of scholars and leaders. Public debates cut deeply into the life and thinking of all classes of society, since each side wanted to win the masses to decide in its favor. Thus the colloquia in the course of time became discussions with "party political" purposes designed to win popular support, which were hardly able to produce a change of opinion in the opposing party. Every utterance of either side was turned into a weapon against it, so that in medieval times the church frequently refused to sponsor such debates.

When the Reformation had progressed to the point where differences between the various parties were clearly defined and there was no possibility of union or arbitration of differences, the ruling princes of the most democratic regions (Switzerland, Holland, South German states) tried by means of public disputations to compromise divergent views among the representatives on certain definite doctrines, and to present them for decision to the populace, which thought in accord with "natural law," and thus hoped with more or less compulsion to eliminate debatable and disturbing questions from the relations of individuals to the church as a whole and to the state. For instance, the invitation to the disputation of Frankenthal in 1571 gives as its aim the lessening of the lamentable division then prevailing.

Besides the religious debates of a public and general nature there was also an enormous number of dialogs between the heretics and the pastors of the church, which were exploited as propaganda by means of broadsides. They had their influence upon the people, who were very deeply disquieted and were therefore actively interested in religious and political thought; but their benefit to the larger parties was merely incidental.

We shall consider here only those disputations that deal with the Anabaptists. Of the three great Protestant churches only the Reformed arranged public disputations with the Anabaptists and Mennonites, and usually at government initiation; there were none with the Lutherans. Public debates between Catholics and Anabaptists were completely out of the question; only individual cross-examinations by inquisitors in the various prisons are reported by van Braght in the Martyrs' Mirror.

In August 1525 the first debate between the Anabaptists and Oecolampadius took place in Basel;

No formal decision was reached at the conclusion of this debate. Nor was the second disputation, June 10, 1527, sponsored by the government.

In Austerlitz (Moravia) a debate took place between the Anabaptists and the Reformed, at which it was decided that children should take part in the communion service. Conditions in Moravia were very similar to those in Switzerland.

At the great disputation of 1528 in Bern, which was to give impetus to the introduction of the Reformation, some Anabaptists were present, but they were held under arrest until the close of the disputation, lest their appearance disrupt the existing unity against Rome. They were invited to a private discussion with the clergy on Jan. 17 (ML I, 282). "Completely convinced of their error" they were banished from city and canton. George Blaurock and Hans Pfistermeyer of Aarau were the Anabaptist leaders.

In Zürich as well, there was no want of attempts to bridge the differences. On Jan. 17 and March 20, 1525, disputations were held with the Anabaptist leaders, dealing chiefly with the question of infant baptism, without any yielding by the Anabaptists. Zwingli met their just demands to the extent that he introduced the Protestant communion service in place of the Catholic mass, as well as a new baptismal formula. Even though he remained far behind the actual demands of the radical Anabaptists, this concession, which was not even a concession to him, deprived the radicals of some of their basis for opposition. Of greater significance for both parties was the debate that took place Nov. 6-8, 1525.

1. The November disputation at Zürich was arranged under the influence of the peasant unrest. It was attended by Zwingli, Leo Jud, and the Anabaptist leaders, Grebel and Manz. Hubmaier did not appear, contrary to his promise to be there. Four special supervisors were appointed to see that the debate took an orderly course: the abbot of Cappel, the steward of Küssnacht, Dr. Sebastian Hofmeister, pastor of Schaffhausen, and Dr. Joachim Watt, mayor of St. Gall. A great crowd appeared. The proceedings were held in the cathedral, since the council chamber proved too small. The theses formulated in Zwingli's Taufbüchlein were used as the basis of the discussions. In spite of the deficient discipline of the Anabaptists in their speaking, the victory was not an easy one for the Zwinglians. The arguments pro and con are given in Zwingli's book, Ueber Dr. Balthasar Hubmaiers Taufbüchlein. The disputation took its course without positive results, because the Anabaptists could not be deflected from their views. After this debate severe measures were passed against the Anabaptists.

The disputation of Dec. 20-22, 1530, at St. Gall was an interlude, in which the Reformed sought clarification on the demands made by the Anabaptists, especially the church ban. At the Städtetag (Sept. 27, 1530) Oecolampadius made the proposal that the ban be introduced, but this was rejected by Zwingli.

2. The disputation in Zofingen (Bern), July 1-9, 1532, was attended by the pastors B. Haller of Bern, Caspar Megander, Sebastian Hofmeister of Schaffhausen, and Sulzer of Basel. Among the 23 Anabaptists present were Hans Hotz, Simon Lautz, Christian Brügger, and Linggi (whom Haller described as homo doctus, eloquens et mirus hypocrita, ad imponenedum aptissimus, in a letter to Bullinger, July 25, 1532). The report (protocol) was edited by both sides. It constitutes one of the earliest doctrinal statements for many Anabaptist congregations of Switzerland and South Germany. The basis of the disputation was the first article, "The love of God and one's neighbor is an overriding principle in all discussions in this debate." The question as to whether the call of the Anabaptists was a divine one received a negative answer from the Reformed side. The Anabaptists required a church composed of members who had been converted to repentance and a reform of life. The discussion on the ban develops into the query, whether one man is competent to judge concerning the salvation of another and ends on the point of faith in good works, as a criterion. In reply to the question on the "call of the preachers, whether they are of God and who should send them out," the Anabaptists held to appointment by the congregation as the only Scripturally valid one and refused all material pay, i.e., all salary from the "possessions of idols," the Catholic endowed funds. The discussion ended with the question of baptism. Exile from the canton and a mandate against the Anabaptists were the tangible results of this debate.

3. The Bern disputation of March 11-17, 1538, was arranged at the request of the Anabaptists of the canton of Bern who sought an opportunity to explain their faith and doctrine. It is one of the most important disputations ever held and of great value in documenting the doctrines of the Swiss Brethren. The minutes were not published but have been preserved in three copies in the Bern Cantonal Archives. Many Reformed pastors from all parts of the canton were present; their chief speakers were the three Bern preachers, Dr. Sebastian Meier, Peter Kunz, and Erasmus Ritter, also Simon Sulzer of Basel, and Johannes Relligkan, although 20 speakers took part. The apostate Anabaptists, Andreas Rappenstein of Rohrbach and Hans Pfistermeier of Aarau, were present by request. Forty-one Anabaptists were present, five being from outside the canton. Their chief speakers were Hans Hotz of Grüningen, Mathis Wiser of Bremgarten, Wälti Gerber of Röthenbach, Lorentz Aeberli and Hans Haslibacher of Sumiswald, and Christian Brügger of Rohrbach. Seven articles were set up for the discussion, which was to be "based on the New and Old Testaments which were to be the authority": (1) the Old and New Testaments (their relative value and authority); (2) the ministry (its proper calling and mission, and which side has the true calling?); (3) the church (which side has the true church, and is it to be sinless?); (4) infant baptism (is it Christian?); (5) the oath (can a Christian take an honest, true oath?); (6) the state (can a Christian serve as an official?); (7) the ban (how ought it to be used, and which side uses it correctly?). Four presidents were appointed to represent the council, two from each house, who not only presided but determined the outcome. If the Anabaptists hoped to secure toleration they must have been disappointed. The conclusion was that the Anabaptists were heretics, not to be tolerated in the canton. The five foreigners, as well as any Bern citizens previously expelled, had to leave at once, while those who were condemned for the first time were given a short time to wind up their affairs and leave. And disobedience to the decrees, or return to the canton by the exiles, would result in an immediate death sentence. Only one Anabaptist recanted. Three of the Anabaptist speakers were later executed: Aeberli in 1539, Gerber in 1566, and Hans Haslibacher in 1571 (J. Matthijssen, "The Bern Disputation of 1538," MQR XXII, 19-33).

4. In 1540-50 the disputations already had a political character. The attempts of some Anabaptists to emigrate to Moravia led to other disputations, in order to retain the Anabaptists and their economic value in the country. This was especially the case in South Germany, where Calvinistic tendencies had found entry, which made contacts with the Anabaptists easier. It was hoped that "the poor, misled people" could be won for the church, i.e., for the nation. The more open-minded theologians sought points of contact. This must be considered as the reason for calling the disputation of Pfeddersheim shortly before the disputation of Worms, by Otto Heinrich of the Palatinate (August 1557). Marbach, the more liberal theologian of Strasbourg, conducted the debate; 19 heads of Anabaptist congregations were also present. Subjects for discussion were all the debated questions (baptism, government, oath, leaving the state church, etc.). The state church declared itself the victor and demanded that the other side, "convinced of its error," give up its views. A mandate against the Anabaptists settled the matter; the leaders were expelled from the country. The disputation in Worms (September-October 1557) found the Catholic and Lutheran clergy united in their condemnation of "all the sects and mobs of the Anabaptists," upon penalty of death.

5. The minutes of the Frankenthal disputation of May 28-June 19, 1571, for the various views of the Swiss, German, and Dutch Anabaptists furnish by far the most important document of the period. It was instituted by Elector Frederick III with the purpose of uniting the Reformed and the Anabaptists. All Anabaptists, of whatever branch, were promised safe conduct. It was a larger version of the disputation of Pfeddersheim (Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz, 112-35). To avoid all misunderstandings, the program for each day was presented and reviewed in advance. Representatives of the Palatine church were G. Verstegus, Peter Dathenus, Eng. Faber, P. Colonius, Fr. Mosellanus, Xylander, Martin Neander, C. Eubuleus, and G. Gebinger. The Anabaptists were represented by 15 persons. The speakers of the Swiss Brethren were Hans Büchel, Rauf, and Ranich; Peter Walpot, Peter Hutt, and Leonhard Summer were the Hutterian Brethren speakers. According to Wolkan (Lieder) there were also Mennonites among them, though they cannot be identified. Nor did the Hutterites speak officially; indeed, they refused to speak when challenged to do so by Dathenus.

Thirteen points were presented to the Anabaptists to be answered. The first question, whether the Scriptures of the Old Testament were equally valid with those of the New Testament, they answered by saying that they gave the preference to the New Testament, but without rejecting the Old. To the second question, whether Father, Son, and Holy Spirit were one being and three persons, they answered yes. The third question was purely theological: whether Christ received His physical being from the physical substance of the Virgin Mary or elsewhere. The Brethren gave an ambiguous answer. They admitted that Christ was conceived of the Holy Spirit and born of the Virgin, but they declined to discuss "what or how much He received from the Virgin Mary." The fourth question concerned "whether children are conceived or born in original sin and are therefore by nature the children of wrath and deserving of eternal death." The Brethren admitted that children were sinful, but they declined to say anything about their damnation. On this point the Swiss Brethren differed from the Hutterian Brethren. The formulation of the question by the Palatinate clergy was based on this difference. The Swiss Brethren were also at variance with the Mennonites in asserting that all men must die for their own sin and not because of Adam's disobedience. To the fifth question, "whether the believers of the Old Testament are one church with the believers of the New Testament, and one people of God," the Swiss Brethren replied that the people of the Old Testament were governed by the law, the others by the liberty of the Gospel, and that the former would also receive forgiveness of their sin. The fifth question carried the additional point, whether a Christian could accept government office; this the Anabaptists answered negatively, but expressly denied having asserted that the government serves the devil, and said they considered the government to be a "servant of God, which will reward each justly." The sixth question treated the question whether salvation comes by grace through faith, or whether it could be partly earned by good works. The Brethren agreed with the Reformed that the ground of our salvation is absolute obedience to Jesus Christ. The seventh article discussed the question whether the essence of this flesh will be resurrected or whether another body will be created by God. The Reformed insisted that the substance of this flesh will be resurrected, whereas the Brethren believed that this body will be dissolved and that the risen body will be a glorified one. The eighth article discussed the harsh regulations of the Dutch Mennonites on the ban and the divorce of the unbelieving spouse, whereas the Swiss Brethren consented to divorce only on the grounds of unfaithfulness. The ninth question, whether Christians may buy and own property without violating brotherly love, had reference to the Hutterian Brethren, for whom Walpot replied that none of them wished to discuss this question. The Swiss Brethren condemned only the misuse of possessions and superfluous possessions by some in the face of the poverty of others. The tenth question dealt for the second time with the government, the eleventh with the oath, the twelfth with baptism and infant baptism, the thirteenth with communion, which the Brethren interpreted as an outward symbol in memory of the suffering and death of Christ.

6. The disputation of Emden in 1578 was occasioned by the imprisonment of an Anabaptist preacher for holding forbidden meetings. When he declared himself willing to discuss his faith with the Reformed, he was released. Other political questions became involved. Mennonite leaders from Holland were called to Emden to heal the breaches between the parties. Leaders of the Flemish, Frisians, and Waterlanders were present (Blaupot t. C., Groningen II, 88 f.), even Dirk Philips came. The Reformed were represented by laymembers and preachers (Menso Alting, q.v., Mellesius of Huite, Frito Ryords of Oldersum, and others). Alting had already published a book against the Anabaptists. The Anabaptists were represented by Pieter van Ceulen, Brixius Gerritsz, Busschaert, Paulus de Bakker, Christiaen Arends, and Jan van Ophoorn. The disputation lasted from Feb. 27 to May 17, 1578, with 124 sessions. The minutes were immediately recorded and signed by the secretaries and the participants. The public was admitted by Duke John, contrary to the original intention. Many citizens attended.

Fourteen points were agreed upon for the Emden debate: (1) the Trinity and its essential unity; (2) the creation of man; (3) the fall, original sin, and freedom of the will; (4) Christ, His true deity and humanity, and whether He was born of the substance of Mary; (5) justification, sanctification, and regeneration; (6) good works; (7) the church and membership therein; (8) the call of the preachers and ministers; (9) baptism and infant baptism; (10) communion; (11) the ban; (12) government; (13) the oath; (14) the resurrection of the body.

The representatives of the Anabaptists were all simple men who insisted on Luther's translation of the Bible as the foundation of their arguments. Only of Brixius was it said (reported by Emmius) that he was "somewhat unusual in this sect, well-versed in the ancient languages and the liberal arts." Of Pieter van Ceulen one of the chairmen said that he would argue them all out of the church, if he had the education of his opponents. Questions and illustrations were generally taken from real life. Herein Pieter van Ceulen occasionally embarrassed his opponents. The course of the disputation produced less ill nature than might have been expected. Pieter van Ceulen's questions: should a preacher in time of revolution on the basis of his office and not on orders of the government assume governmental power? Does the call of a minister give him the inherent right to cause his brethren and sisters to sentence Mennonites to death, so that these are burned to death? could be answered by the opposition only with a provisional yes. Alting postulated a different concept of the church, which transferred government authority to the church (Gemeinde) and permitted the persecution of heretics. The outcome was not a definite success for the Anabaptists. They were afraid of the consequences and also refrained from joining in the conclusions. The minutes were accepted by the Anabaptists with only slight objections (Protokol van Emden: U. Emmius, Vita Mensonis Altingii).

7. The disputation of Leeuwarden in the Dutch province of Friesland was held Aug. 16-Nov. 17, 1596, between Ruardus Acronius (q.v.) and Pieter van Ceulen. The chairmen were Douwe van Sytzama, Aede van Eysinga, Rombertus Ulenborgh, mayor of Leeuwarden, and Dr. Pieter Jansz, a sheriff. Pieter van Ceulen was supported by Dirck Doedesz, a fellow citizen. The disputation was conducted in question and answer, in statement and refutation. Sessions took place every morning and afternoon. The occasion for the disputation was Mennonite agitation on behalf of their teaching, to which Ruardus had replied with a polemic pamphlet, which was to be answered by Isbrandt Isbrandtsen, "preacher of a part of the Anabaptists," and Jelmer Symonsz, who however declined to do so. Pieter van Ceulen, "a preacher of the other part" of the Mennonites, then wrote a reply in 1595. The chairman knew the results of the Frankenthal and Emden disputations. The disputation was held in the Galileër Reformed Church.

The subjects for discussion included eleven articles: (1) the equality of the Old and the New Testaments; (2) the Trinity, the unity of the Divine Being and threefoldness of the persons; (3) the true humanity of Christ and the union of the two natures in Him and its significance for our salvation; (4) the covenants of divine grace; (5) baptism as the seal of God's grace; (6) the ability of man to do good works, or his incapacity to do them since the fall; (7) Ruardus' charge that the Mennonites turn the Christian ban and church discipline into dangerous and disgraceful tyranny; (8) the written and oral oath; (9) the government and whether a Christian may hold government office; (10) nonresistance and the use of arms; (11) the fact that the Anabaptists consider only themselves as the true church of God; also the believers of the Old and New Testaments, the office of preaching, the effectiveness of the Word of God is not dependent on the person who preaches it. The minutes, with a long preface, were published at Franeker in 1597 by Gillis van den Rade.

A number of other minor disputations were held to bridge the gap between groups, or to expose the opposition, especially in the Netherlands (van der Zijpp, 137-39). They played a part in the total picture of the Reformation. The disputations also furnish evidence that under the cover of current and religious questions all the important events and movements of social and individual life were given expression. Anyone who does not allow superficial appearances to confuse him will find the questions anchored in the economic, social, intellectual, religious, and political conditions. Religious disputation is merely the form, not the exclusive content. These were the times of social and political revolutions, the release of the individual from the bondage imposed by the church and the social conditions established by the church. This release was sought in the only means the church had developed in which right and wrong in the field of religion could be recognized. There was a search for formulations, necessarily conditioned by the new state of affairs. The disputations are indicative of the nature of contemporary organized groups and their new ideals and goals. C.B., H.S.B.

Dissenters or Nonconformists (q.v.), the designation of all religious groups not belonging to the Church of England, such as the Independents (q.v.), Baptists (q.v.), Methodists (q.v.), Quakers (q.v.), etc. The Act of Toleration of 1689 granted such groups conditional toleration. Equal rights with members of the established state church were not granted them until 150 years later. In the Netherlands the Dissenters, including the Mennonites and Remonstrants, were conditionally tolerated like the Roman Catholics after 1584; in 1651 a new law was enacted limiting toleration of Dissenters and Catholics to those places only where they had been worshiping before; establishing congregations and building churches in new places was prohibited. In 1796 toleration was replaced by full recognition, the Dissenters and Catholics receiving the same rights as the Reformed State Church. (ML I, 456.)

District Superintendent, an office in the United Missionary Church, known in the earlier period of its history as Presiding Elder, has been an important office from the beginning. The District Superintendent presides over the annual conference of his area, and is recognized as the pastoral head of the ministers of the area which he serves. He also presides over quarterly conferences and conducts communion services with the various churches. He serves as chairman of the stationing committee in the annual assignment of the ministers to the various pastorates. For the quadrennial General Conference the chairman is elected from the District Superintendents of the several conferences. J.A.H.

Divorce has not been permitted among the Anabaptists and Mennonites from the earliest times except for the cause of adultery, in accordance with the Biblical standard as found in Matt. 19:9, although separation (either legal or privately arranged) has been and is generally allowed.

In a tract entitled Concerning Divorce written by one of the first Swiss Brethren in 1527, possibly by Michael Sattler, appears the earliest known Anabaptist treatment of the subject. The main points in this tract stress: (1) the permanence of the marriage bond; (2) the supremacy of one's obligation to Christ over obligation to the marriage partner; (3) the only ground for divorce is adultery; (4) to marry one guilty of fornication is itself fornication; (5) the innocent party to a divorce is not forbidden to remarry, and is by implication permitted to do so. Except for the fifth point, regarding which there has been some ambiguity and occasional divergence within the brotherhood, this tract can be thought of as summarizing quite well the position of the Mennonite church regarding divorce throughout her entire history.

Menno Simons also clarifies the Anabaptist position on divorce, referring directly to the words of Christ and of the Apostle Paul. He reiterates the theme of adultery being the only acceptable ground for divorce. "And also, that the bond of undefiled, honorable matrimony is so unchangeably bound in the kingdom and government of Christ that neither a man nor a woman can forsake one the other, and take another, understand rightly what Christ says, except it be for fornication, Matt. 19:9. And Paul also holds the same doctrine, that they shall be bound to each other, and that they are to live in union; that the man has not power over his own body, nor the woman over hers, I Cor. 7:4" (Works, 247). The Wismar Resolutions of 1554 (q.v.), (as quoted in ML I, 530) say: "Adultery on the part of one member breaks the marriage relationship. However, the responsible party may return to re-establish the relationship provided he (or she) gives evidence of due repentance and a changed life. In cases of deliberate adultery, the innocent party may be free to remarry after consulting with the congregation." The position taken by the Hutterian Brethren (also quoted loc. cit.) was ". . . that nothing can break the marriage bond except adultery. In cases where a man is married to an unbelieving woman, and she desires to live with him, he may not divorce her (nor vice versa). If the unbelieving husband threatens her faith or hinders the training of the children in the faith, she may divorce her husband, but must not remarry so long as that man is living."

There has been some discussion in the earlier literature regarding the bearing of the ban and excommunication on divorce. However, the position was invariably that the ban is of itself not sufficient grounds for divorce, but only adultery, as stated by Christ in Matt. 19:9 (see Menno Simons, op. cit., 241-68; Part II, 123-37).

The predominant approach to the problem of divorce among the Mennonites has been direct and positive rather than indirect and negative. It has consisted chiefly of stressing the obligations of marriage, and an emphasis on the permanency of the marriage bond. This is evidenced not only by the dearth of literature on divorce, but also by the fact that neither the Dordrecht Confession (q.v.) nor the Cornelis Ris Confession (q.v.) directly treats divorce. However, both confessions put great stress on the importance of marriage, insisting that it be "in the Lord," and that it should never be entered into lightly or unadvisedly.

More recent literature on the question of divorce among the Mennonites is rather rare. Only occasionally does an article or editorial appear in one or another of the official publications of the various Mennonite bodies. Such as do appear are primarily of a hortative nature, and follow quite closely the theme expressed above (e.g., The Gospel Witness, Oct. 31, 1906, 482; Herald of Truth, Dec. 26, 1907, 482; The Mennonite, Dec. 10, 1946, 2).

That this theme still represents the official and general position of all branches of the church can hardly be doubted. But that the standard has not always been upheld is also quite evident. The Doctrine and Conduct Committee of the General Conference Mennonite Church through A. Warkentin and Jacob D. Goering recently made a survey of divorce and remarriage within the congregations of this branch of the church in the United States only. These statistics would seem to indicate that approximately one marriage in thirty ended in divorce in this group in 1940-45. The accuracy of the statistics may be doubted, and the validity of the survey questioned because it covered abnormal war years. Whether or not these divorces were all caused by adultery is impossible to say, on account of the nature of the survey and the responses obtained. However, it is an unmistakable indication of the beginning breakdown of the high marriage standards heretofore prevailing.

In a paper read by J. Winfield Fretz before the Mennonite Cultural Problems Conference held at Grantham, Pa., in June 1951, it was pointed out that one of the crucial problems facing the Mennonite church is whether or not to grant membership in the church to converts who have been divorced before their conversion. To accept them threatens the stability of the brotherhood because of the scarred and broken personalities and families often involved. Yet the church feels the call to evangelize all men, to call them to repentance and into the fellowship of the believers regardless of past sins. This paper also corroborated the impression made by the earlier survey, namely, that the divorce evil is becoming an increasing problem in the congregations. Industrialization, urbanization, and evil social influences of modern society tend to have a disintegrative effect on Mennonite families and communities in some areas. Those Mennonite groups which have undertaken a vigorous program of evangelistic outreach in the city mission and rural mission work are facing increasing pressure in the matter of accepting candidates for membership who have been previously divorced and remarried, since the number of such cases in the general American population is relatively high. J. C. Wenger's study shows that before 1900 the Mennonite Church (MC) tolerated the acceptance of divorced and remarried persons into membership, at least in some sections such as Virginia, Ohio, and Indiana, but that after that date the position became stricter, no such persons being admitted to membership. The current practice on this point in various North American groups is as follows: M.C., M.B., C.G.C., O.O.A., C.A.M., and E.M.(K.G.) groups do not accept divorced and remarried persons into membership. E.M.B. and U.M.C. do accept such persons. The practice in the G.C.M. group varies, since there is local autonomy, but many congregations do accept such persons into membership.

In Europe the Dutch, Northwest German, West Prussian, and Palatinate-Hesse groups have for some time accepted divorced and remarried persons into membership, and have permitted divorce to members, although the cases have been rare, and the last-named group permits divorce only on the ground of adultery. The Badischer Verband until World War II did not permit divorce except for adultery nor receive divorced and remarried persons, but now permits reception of the innocent party in such cases, with remarriage allowed. Swiss and French Mennonites maintain a position similar to that of the Badischer Verband. J.D.G.

Divorce from Unbelievers among 16th-century Anabaptists presents a special historical case. In the first half of the 16th century at least, members of the church were allowed, and in some cases expected, to break marriages with spouses who refused to accept the Anabaptist faith, but whether this was only separation or a full divorce is not altogether clear from the records. Nor is it clear whether remarriage was allowed in such cases—probably not. The evidence, not fully collected as yet, includes the following items: (1) The tract of 1527, Concerning Divorce, cited in the preceding article, Divorce, states clearly that the union of a believer with Christ is more precious than an earthly marriage to an unbeliever; therefore if such conflicts arise, the obligation of the believer is to do the will of God and separate from the unbeliever. (2) A Thuringian Anabaptist, Heinz Kraut, on Dec. 6, 1535, testified at a hearing under Melanchthon's chairmanship, that when a man is not in agreement with his wife regarding the Word of God "the marriage no longer exists between them" (Wappler, 142). As a result of this hearing Prince John of Saxony issued a mandate against the Anabaptists on April 10, 1536, prepared by Melanchthon, which listed among the prevalent beliefs of the Anabaptists that "an Anabaptist may leave his non-Anabaptist spouse." The full statement of the mandate is as follows: "If in a marriage the one person is orthodox in faith and the other married person is not orthodox, such a marriage is prostitution, and the orthodox person may forsake the other, solely because of his faith, and marry another." Melanchthon included similar charges in his Verlegung etlicher unchristlicher Artickel welche die Wiedertäufer vorgeben (Wittenberg, 1536?). The case of Melchior Rinck (q.v.), who justified his separation from his non-Anabaptist spouse in 1531, is a complicated one (Wappler, 149-52), but no remarriage was considered.

(3) A more elaborate statement on divorcing non-Anabaptist spouses is found in the fifth of the Five Articles of the Hutterites of 1547 (see Article Book), written probably by Peter Walpot (Zieglschmid, Chronik, 308-16, also in Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 215 note). The Scriptural foundation is, as usual, I Cor. 7. "Nothing can break the marriage bond but adultery. Where, however, a brother has an unbelieving wife, and she agrees to live with him, he may not divorce her (nor vice versa). But where she is endangered in her faith or is hindered by the unbelieving husband in the training of her children in the true faith, she may divorce her husband, but must remain unmarried as long as her husband lives.

If the unbelieving one departs, let him depart. 'A brother or sister is not under bondage in such cases,' says Paul, as if he would say: The union with God weighs a thousand times more than the union of marriage between men." (This sentence is often repeated in Hutterite documents.) . . . "We greatly dislike it that one part should forsake the other one, and we would advise nobody to do so without great earnestness; we would rather wish that the other (the unbelieving) part commit himself unto the Lord, so that both would follow Him in faith. Since, however, faith is not given to every man, so each part must do what he understands and what is given to him, and leave the other as he is" (see also Friedmann, 212 and footnote 3; see also Mixed Marriage).

The Wismar resolutions of 1554, which were adopted by a conference of Dutch and North German elders including Menno Simons, speak (in Point 5) concerning divorce of an unbeliever from a believer as follows: "If an unbelieving [spouse] desires to divorce on account of the faith [of the partner], the [believing spouse] shall remain honorable without marrying [again]. However, if the apostate partner remarries or enters into immorality, then [the believing spouse] may also remarry, but only with permission of the elder and the congregations. This does not grant permission to a church member to divorce an unbelieving spouse, but recognizes the divorce as valid."

Dirk Philips (Enchiridion, 358) argues from the Old Testament, i.e., the Law (Lev. 19) and the case of Ezra (Ezra 10:11, 12), who broke mixed marriages that had been contracted between Israelites and the heathen, that a mixed marriage between believers and unbelievers cannot stand, although he does not specifically authorize divorce on this ground. "In view of the fact that such unclean matrimonial alliances and mixed marriages between the children of God and unbelievers could not stand under the imperfect dispensation of the Law, how could it stand before God and His church under the perfect dispensation of the Christian age of the Gospel? Let everyone meditate upon and consider this matter." Philips' tract Christian Matrimony forbids marriage with unbelievers under penalty of excommunication, but does not authorize divorce if the one party becomes a believer, while the other one remains in unbelief.

By the 1570's the Anabaptist position in Germany was fully clear on the matter of not allowing divorce of non-Anabaptist spouses. In the Frankenthal disputation of 1571 the eighth question for discussion was "whether the ban and unbelief break marriage" (Ob der Bann und Unglaub die Ehe scheiden). Rauff, an Anabaptist leader, answered as follows: "We believe that nothing may divorce a marriage except adultery. But if the unbeliever wants to divorce because of the faith, I would let him divorce as Paul says in I Corinthians 7. But we believe that the cause of the divorce should not be found in the Christian" (Protocoll, 550). The Confession of the Swiss Brethren in Hesse of 1578 states an identical position in an article entitled "Concerning Divorce": "We believe and confess, that man and woman who have by the divine foreordination, destiny and joining in marriage become one flesh, may not be divorced by ban, belief or unbelief, anger, quarreling, hardness of heart, but only by adultery" (Sippel, 32).

The somewhat different position of the Hutterite group remained unchanged, however, and is not affected by the above statements from middle and south Germany. R.F.

Dock, Christopher, the "pious schoolmaster of the Skippack," was born in Germany (place unknown), and came to America about 1714. By 1718 Dock was teaching a subscription elementary school among the Mennonites of the Skippack settlement north of Germantown, Pa. His teaching career, probably begun in Germany, now continued for ten years at Skippack, until he gave up teaching for farming in 1728. In 1735 he bought 100 acres near Salfordville, and probably lived there the rest of his life. Soon after giving up the Skippack school, Dock says he felt the "smiting hand of God" calling him back to the teaching profession. He taught four summers in the (Mennonite) school at Germantown. Finally in 1738, after an interval of ten years of farming, Dock resumed full-time teaching at Skippack and Salford, and continued teaching until his death in 1771.

Christopher Dock's life and work is best known by reading his essay, School-Management (Schul-Ordnung), written in 1750, but not published until 20 years later. One of his pupils, Christopher Saur, Jr., of Germantown published the first two editions in 1770. This work reveals the gentle and loving character of Dock as a teacher and his successful methods of instruction. Printed in the German language, it found its way into many Pennsylvania-German homes and must have had a profound influence on those who taught the German schools of his day. Teaching was a divine calling; pupils were given individualized instruction; character and godliness were the chief objectives in Dock's school.

Christopher Dock was one of the selected contributors to Christopher Saur's Geistliches Magazien (1764-73). Among the articles he contributed were "A Hundred Necessary Rules for Children's Conduct," and "A Hundred Rules for Children," both of which reveal the interesting customs and practices among the Germans of colonial times.

Not only was Dock a successful teacher of the 3 R's, but he also made a real contribution in teaching art. Dock's specialty was Fractur-Schriften, or beautifully illuminated manuscripts. These consisted of Scripture texts or mottoes artistically penned in colored inks. It is said that Dock had 25 of them on the walls of his schoolroom. He used some of them as copy forms (Vorschriften) for his pupils. Others were given to pupils as rewards for excellent work. Some of Dock's originals have been preserved in the Historical Society of Pennsylvania and in the Schwenkfelder Library of Pennsburg, Pa. Dock's influence can also be seen in collections containing the work of his pupils. Teachers of the 19th century continued the practice of this art and used Dock's ideas for the encouragement of pupil effort.

Dock also wrote at least seven hymns. Five of these hymns found their way into the earliest American Mennonite hymnal, Kleine Geistliche Harfe (1803), and were retained in later editions. It is quite possible that Dock's emphasis on teaching hymns in the schools and his very probable able service as chorister in the Salford and Skippack churches were largely responsible for the unusual interest in singing among the Mennonite congregations of Montgomery County.

Dock was not only a good teacher of academic subjects, but also an effective character builder and teacher of religion. His education was "Christian" education, with perfect integration of the sacred with the secular. He used religious materials such as the New Testament and the hymnal in his regular classes, he opened every school day with worship, making religion a natural experience for the children, and infused his entire teaching with a warm, sincere piety. Furthermore his religion was not superficial and external, but essential, and was the firm foundation for a genuinely effective program of character building. Narrow sectarianism and theological dogmatism were entirely absent; a devout and wholehearted following of Christ was his great concern.

Dock's burial place is unknown, but tradition gives us a very plausible account of his death. It was his custom to remain at school after dismissal of the children to pray for each of his pupils in turn. One evening in the autumn of 1771 he did not return home at the usual time. He was found on his knees in the schoolroom, but his spirit had gone.

A memorial stone in honor of Christopher Dock was erected in 1915 by the Montgomery County Historical Society in the cemetery of the Lower Skippack Mennonite Church. It bears this inscription: "Here Christopher Dock, who in 1750 wrote the earliest American essay on Pedagogy, taught school, and here in 1771, he died on his knees in prayer."† (Vol. I). Q.L.

Doctrinal Writings of the Anabaptists. During the 16th century Anabaptism did not make a real distinction between doctrinal and devotional writings (q.v.). The doctrinal writings are not of a formal theological type but rather of a confessional character, stressing in the main the difference of Anabaptist viewpoints from those of the large churches of the Reformation. No Anabaptist ever felt the need for an elaborate system of theology, not even those who had the necessary education. Whether by Menno Simons or Pilgram Marpeck, Dirk Philips, or Peter Riedemann, all these books and tracts were at once confessional (doctrinal), devotional, and also polemical, but they were never scholarly and academic like many of the books by Luther, Calvin, or Zwingli. One source collection of such tracts is rightly called Glaubenszeugnisse oberdeutscher Taufgesinnter (by Lydia Müller, 1938). All Anabaptist writings were such testimonies of faith.

The amount of these writings must once have been rather large, though a complete list of them does not exist as yet, and a systematic study has never been undertaken. Lydia Müller's publication is perhaps the best collection yet published, though incomplete and too much abridged. The book presents South German and Hutterite material, taken from Hutterite manuscript books, our richest source. The contents of this book are as follows: Jörg Hauck (Anfang eines christlichen Lebens), Hans Hut (Vom Geheimnis der Taufe, Ein christlicher Unterricht . . .), Michael Sattler (Artikel und Handlung; for the famous Schleitheim Confession see below), Leonhard Schiemer (5 tracts, particularly profound writings of 1526-7, deserving special attention), Hans Schlaffer (Ein kurzer Unterricht zum Anfang eines rechten christlichen Lebens, like Schiemer very early and extremely penetrating), Eitelhans Langenmantel (Vom Nachtmahl Christi), Jörg Zaunring (Eine kurze Anzeigung vom Abendmahl Christi), Jakob Hutter (various epistles), Ulrich Stadler (next to Riedemann or Walpot the ablest doctrinal writers of the Hutterites; four tracts are published in excerpts), Peter Walpot (Die fünf Artikel des grössten Streites, 1547?) (see Article Book, a major work of the Hutterites), Antoni Erdfordter (Urlaubsbrief), Brüderliche Vereinigung mit dem Brüdern am Rheinstrom (1558), and Anschlag und Fürwenden (Hutterite, about 1560, by Walpot), etc. For volume II were scheduled: Peter Riedemann (Rechenschaft unseres Glaubens, q.v., 1545, the greatest doctrinal and confessional book of the Hutterites), Andreas Ehrenpreis (Ein Sendbrief brüderliche Gemeinschaft betreffend, q.v., 1652, a book of 200 pages), but the volume was not published until 1955. In brief, Riedemann and Walpot are shown as the two main authors of doctrinal books among the Hutterites. The compilation list is, of course, in no way complete. Many of the outstanding Verantwortungen (testimonies) are not mentioned though we have prints of most of them, e.g., by Claus Felbinger, Veith Grünberger, Hans Mändl, etc. (see Verantwortungen). Worth mentioning is also one tract by the Philipite brethren, Concerning a True Soldier of Christ (q.v.) by Hans Haffner, 1535.

The Schleitheim Articles of 1527, called Brüderliche Vereinigung etlicher Kinder Gottes, sieben Artikel betreffend, drawn up, most likely, by Michael Sattler (English tr. MQR. XIX, 1945, 242 ff.), must be considered the earliest doctrinal writing of the Swiss or South German Brethren. It was, according to F. Blanke, "a genuine confession of faith, intended to erect a dam against the intrusion of heretical views into the brotherhood" (MQR XVI, 1942, 85 f.). A number of similar doctrinal writings of the South German "Swiss" Brethren were discovered in a Sammelband in the Goshen College library, and translated by Wenger (MQR, 1945-47); authors and dates are undisclosed, but the style points to an early origin (Von der Genugtuung Christi, Von der Ehescheidung, Zweierlei Gehorsam, Von der Hörung falscher Propheten, von bösen Vorstehern, discussed in MQR XVI, 1942, 82 ff.). In Switzerland itself no Anabaptist literature of any kind could develop, though the brotherhood lived there, in spite of severe oppression, up to the great expulsion early in the 18th century and even later. Only disputations (Religionsgespräche) afford an insight into the doctrinal thinking of the Swiss Brethren, such as the meetings at Bern, Basel, and Zofingen (see Disputations; also MQR XXII, 1948, 19 ff.).

South German Brethren have produced at least one outstanding writer, Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.), whose great Verantwortung (1542) is a prime source, although it, too, is more polemical than systematic in its outline. There are also Marpeck's Testamentserläuterung, his Vermahnung, his Strasbourg Confession, and a concordance, Gestern und Heute. These writings were also used by Brethren in Grisons, Switzerland. The "Swiss" Brethren in the Rhine Valley (around and below Cologne) had as their outstanding teacher Thomas von Imbroich (q.v.), martyred 1558, whose Confessio oder Glaubensbekenntnis became extremely popular among other groups, spread by way of printed pamphlets (see Epistles, Anabaptist, non-Hutterite). As late as 1692, the Swiss authorities complained about this book found among the Anabaptists around Bern (Müller, Berner Täufer, 104). Likewise, all American editions of the Ausbund (since 1742) contain in an appendix this particular Confession. (For other writings of that region see Epistles, Anabaptist, non-Hutterite, also Güldene Aepffel.)

The Dutch brethren were much more fortunate than the Swiss Anabaptists in having in Menno Simons and Dirk Philips leaders who were also capable of formulating their new faith in a number of doctrinal writings of lasting effect. Menno Simons' Fundament des christelijcken Leers (q.v.) (in a translation of 1575) was widely read also among the Brethren in South Germany, particularly Württemberg (Bossert, Quellen). Dirk Philips' Enchiridion (q.v.) should not be forgotten. North German and East Prussian Mennonites were served mainly by their brethren in the Netherlands. The Altona (Hamburg) congregations were partly served by Jan de Buyser's Christelijck Huys-Boeck (1643) (q.v.), later by G. Roosen's (q.v.) writings (Christliches Gemüthsgespräch, and Unschuld und Gegenbericht, 1702).

The Prussian church had its first Glaubensbekenntnis in 1660, which became a standard work through the centuries. Far more elaborate and theologically refined were the writings by George Hansen (q.v.), namely, his Glaubensbericht an die

Jugend (1671, much used also among the Mennonites in Russia), Confession of Faith (1678), and Fundamentbuch (1696). Mennonites continued to produce confessions and catechisms, and also some doctrinal writings.

The printed records of the various disputations (q.v.), such as Zofingen (1532), Frankenthal (1571), and Emden (1587), contain much doctrinal material.

A few general remarks might well conclude this survey. Because of the exposed nature of the Anabaptists in a hostile world, all these early tracts have a polemical strain: Stadler's tracts are written like a discussion, "Rede und Antwort"; Marpeck's great book alternates "Rede und Gegenrede," and Walpot's Article Book is presented "punkt und argumentweis." There is always an undertone of defense in them, either against the world or against wavering or "heretical" brethren (as, e.g., the Schleitheim Articles have in mind). All these tracts do not present any formal theology but only statements of faith beginning somewhat like "Wir bekennen . . . ." Argumentation is achieved in the main by ample quotations from the Bible; a strict, sometimes even dry, Biblicism is the rule; yet there is no lack of genuine spiritual interpretation, as in the earlier writings of men like Schlaffer, Schiemer, Hans Hut, and Riedemann. Academic scholarship is rejected everywhere; simplicity (Einfalt) in thought and speech is the accepted standard, even though the popular allegorical (figürliche) interpretation of Bible texts is often refined and occasionally very rationalistic. The Christianity of these tracts is concrete and genuine. Baptism and the Lord's Supper stand in the foreground of all doctrinal interests while the question of salvation seems to be secondary to the life dedication of a man. The Trinity is accepted and defended, though not stressed. The eschatological element, though not altogether absent, remains in the background. The practical implications matter most, even in the most "theological" tracts of the 16th century. The 17th and 18th centuries show distinct changes toward formalism and a slackening of concreteness; but even then there is little likeness to the systematic theology of the state churches. Mennonitism is, after all, not a theological church but one which seeks to express faith in life.

Although the 17th and later centuries produced practically no doctrinal writings among the Mennonites in other European countries, the Netherlands produced a large number of such writings in the post-Anabaptist period and on down into the 19th century, when outstanding theologians, such as Sytse Hoekstra (q.v.), were productive. (See articles on respective authors; also Devotional Literature; Catechisms; Confessions of Faith.)

No specialized study is known dealing with the entire field. On the Hutterites, see R. Friedmann, "Eine dogmatische Hauptschrift, . . ." in Archiv f. Ref.-Gesch. XXVIII and XXIX (1931-32), with extensive discussions in general; other material in the MQR, 1942-48, particularly J. C. Wenger's translations of Anabaptist doctrinal tracts (Jan. and Oct. 1947; Jan. and July 1948). On Marpeck, see the special Marpeck issue of the MQR XII (July 1938); specifically J. C. Doctrine and Conduct Committee is a unique committee in the General Conference Mennonite Church, for it is not a standing committee, and must be completely re-elected at every session of the General Conference. This close control of the committee by the conference reflects something of the controversial issues under which it arose in the early twenties.

The principal issue giving rise to the committee was the traditional testimony against secret orders. Particularly vigorous leadership was given when the late P. R. Schroeder was secretary of the committee. From 1929 to 1933 the committee sent out 22,000 anti-secrecy leaflets featuring the conference anti-secrecy resolution and Article 12 of the Constitution, the longest single item in the doctrinal area.

Meanwhile, the committee began to broaden its work to include other questions such as the oath, the nature of baptism, the nature of the church and modernistic theological tendencies. Another trend in the church was the growing disinclination to enter into distinctly disciplinary problems and the development of a broadly educational approach to controversial issues in the conference.

In recent years the committee has continued to have a conservative orientation. But it has worked closely with the fundamental purposes of the conference in a wide range of educational activity, including the following: reprinting of the Ris confession, a statistical and descriptive study of divorce trends in the conference, a study of stewardship, preliminary studies of Christianity and communism, church discipline, universalism, as well as the production of an over-all book on the theology of the conference.

At the conference held at Freeman, S.D., in 1950 the Doctrine and Conduct Committee was absorbed by the Board of Education and Publication, and placed in a subcommittee on Education in Church, Home and Community. This was part of a major reorganization of the conference structure. D.E.S.

Doetinchem, a town in the Dutch province of Gelderland, where in 1903 a Doopsgezinde Kring (group of Mennonites) was founded, in charge of S. D. A. Wartena, pastor of Zutphen (q.v.). Services were regularly held and catechismal instruction was given; on July 12, 1903, a baptismal service took place here (DB 1903, 187). But a few years later this group had dissolved. A new group organized on Oct. 22, 1947, and was called Kring Doetinchem en omgeving. The group started with 29 members (34 in 1954). It meets one evening a month for discussion, and co-operates with the Nederlandse Protestanten-Bond (association of liberal Christians) in organizing church services. Miss J. M. Eelman, the Mennonite minister of Winterswijk, is now in charge of this group. vdZ.

Dohn, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake under Elector August of Saxony. In the records of his trial is found the version of the Lord's Prayer peculiar to the Thuringian Anabaptists, "Give us the eternal heavenly Bread." This version is attested in other records also.

Dohner Mennonite Church (MC), located near Annville, Lebanon Co., Pa., is a member of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. Bishop Frederick Kauffman gave land for a meetinghouse in 1768 two miles north of Annville. In 1851 when friction developed with the United Brethren, Bishop Jacob Dohner moved a mile east and built the present 24 x 36 ft. brick church. Membership and Sunday-school enrollment in 1954 were 29 and 45 respectively. Simon Bucher is bishop, Robert Miller preacher. I.D.L.

Dokkum, a town (pop. 5,600) in the Dutch province of Friesland. An Anabaptist congregation must have originated here between 1551 and 1557. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized at least 453 persons here, and in 1562 the Reformed congregation, which was also meeting secretly, requested the Reformed congregation at Emden to send them an ordained man, because the Mennonites were winning so many of the people that they comprised most of the inhabitants of Dokkum. In the early 17th century Dokkum had at least three Mennonite congregations, one of Waterlanders, one of High Germans (Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 169), and one of Jan Jacobsgezinden (q.v.). By 1695 the Waterlanders and High Germans had been united for some time and numbered about 180 members; the Jan Jacobsgezinden had disappeared by 1786.

The liberal spirit of the time was shown in a proposal by the Remonstrants in 1796 that all the Christian bodies in the Netherlands unite in a single Christian church. The proposal was rejected nearly everywhere. The Frisian Sociëteit also decided not to enter the proposed union, because adult baptism, the distinguishing mark of the Mennonites, would be dropped. But the Mennonite congregation of Dokkum thought otherwise about it. After the departure of Matthijs Siegenbeek they were without a minister, as was also the Remonstrant congregation, and consequently obeyed the summons. Although they numbered 70 or 80 members and the Remonstrants only 13, it was decided that the local united congregation should be attached to both creeds, but especially to that of the Remonstrants, since they had issued the invitation. The annual support of 550 florins which the Remonstrants received from their brotherhood, was to accrue to the united congregation.

On May 10, 1798, the union was completed, confirmed by the signature of 30-34 members of the Mennonite congregation, and six of the Remonstrants. Article 4 stipulated that it would be the duty of the pastor to baptize adults as well as infants; this was an obstacle to the union with the Frisian Sociëteit. After tedious correspondence it was decided at the Sociëteit meeting of June 6, 1800, that the Mennonite congregation had ceased to exist. Members who were unable to make the concessions necessary to the union became members of the Dantumawoude (q.v.) congregation. The united congregation meets in the old Mennonite church, which was completely renovated in 1852.

At first the congregation had difficulty in finding a preacher, although they asked many groups to help them. The Mennonite preachers refused because they objected to Article 4. In 1799, however, Karel Ayelts, the Reformed preacher at Laren and Blaricum, accepted the call, and since that time 3 Reformed and 10 Remonstrant preachers have served. In 1826-27, during an illness of Ayelts, the Mennonite pastor at Dantumawoude occasionally preached for the group. Since 1827 the congregation has had only non-Mennonite preachers. B. ten Bruggencate, the Mennonite minister at Baard, who received a call to this congregation in 1865, refused it. In that year there were some difficulties, resulting from the mixed character of the congregation. Since then its course has been smooth. In 1865 this United Christian Church of Dokkum was admitted to Ring Dantumawoude (q.v.); sometime later it withdrew, but was reinstated in 1917. In 1810 the congregation had 69 members (193 souls), and in 1951, 122 members (200 souls). In the census of 1910, 88 persons at Dokkum said they were Remonstrants, and 75, Mennonites; in 1947 there were 53 Remonstrants and 187 Mennonites. J.L.

Dokkumburg (Dokkenburg), Sjoerd Pietersz van, a Dutch Mennonite minister, originally of Friesland, who served the congregation of Berlikum until 1731, Heerenveen and Knijpe 1731-35, where his work was fruitful, but his salary very small, Enkhuizen and Venhuizen 1735-51, Koog en Zaandijk from 1751 until his death between 1775 and 1779. He was an ardent defender of the conservative Mennonite principles. He wrote: Eenige Artykelen van de Leere der Waarheid, die naar de Godsaligheid is . . . (Haarlem, 1743), De Gebeden van Jezus Christus . . . (Haarlem, 1745), and a long poem in the Frisian language for the dedication of the Mennonite church at Buitenpost (1742). This poem is found in A. Wynalda, Davids Liefde tot Gods huis (Amsterdam, 1743). (Biogr. Wb. II, 523; Catalogus Amst., 262.) vdZ.

Dokkumburg (Dokkenburg), Pieter van, a son of S. P. van Dokkumburg (above), born on Jan. 22, 1737, at Venhuizen, d. May 2, 1811, at Koog aan de Zaan, was a Mennonite minister. He served the congregations of Oudesluis, 1758-63; Twisk, 1763-70; and Koog-Zaandijk, 1770-1811. He trained a large number of young men for the ministry, for (like his father) he followed the principles of the Zonists (q.v.) and opposed the (Lamist) Amsterdam Theological Seminary. He wrote: Verhandelingen over wysgerige onderwerpen; De Wederleggende Godgeleerdheid; Het Stelzel van de Godgeleerdheid, all of which are found in manuscript in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. These treatises may have been composed for his theological students. (Biogr. Wb. II, 523; Naamlijst 1808, 75; 1815, 80 f.; Catalogus Amst., 221.) vdZ.

Dolton (Turner Co., S.D.) United Missionary Church was organized in 1924. In 1948 a community church building was used for a meetinghouse for the 26 members, with Marvin Engbrecht as pastor. M.E.

Dominicus, an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake with two preachers, Thomas and Balthasar, in Brno, Czechoslovakia, in 1528. When they were about to be sentenced they warned the Council against shedding innocent blood. One of the Councilmen replied that he was doing a service to God in condemning them to death. (*Mart. Dominicus Abels "van der Vecht," a goldsmith of Utrecht, was a preacher and bishop of the Anabaptists, called "bishop of Gooiland," preached in the Gooi near Amsterdam, baptized members in Amsterdam, and was beheaded there March 30, 1534. He was a man of great eloquence, and was one of the principal leaders on the journey from Amsterdam to Münster in March 1534. After his death his wife Janneken joined the revolutionary Batenburgers (q.v.). vdZ.

Dompelaars, a Dutch word meaning "immersionists" or "Dunkers," the name of a small branch of the Mennonite Church at Hamburg-Altona (q.v.), which led to a division of the congregation in 1648. The name indicates Dutch origin. It has been assumed that the Collegiant (q.v.) brotherhood, which had been formed in Holland in 1619 and which required and practiced immersion, was transplanted to Hamburg, with momentous consequences to the Mennonite congregation there. But it is more likely that Abraham de Vosz, who had apparently been a Baptist in Colchester, England, and who joined the Flemish Mennonites in Hamburg, caused the division. He won two preachers and fifteen laymen to his side, who now demanded the practice of immersion and footwashing before communion; communion services should be held at night with unleavened bread. In 1628 the Mennonite church board of Hamburg explained the difficulties which had arisen in the congregation concerning baptism by immersion in a 13-page letter to the Flemish congregation "bij 't Lam" at Amsterdam (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 567.) Most of the congregation, led by Gerrit Roosen, opposed this innovation. From 1648 on the two parties held separate services in the Mennonite church. After a violent quarrel the Dompelaars were forced out and thus the formal division ensued in 1650 which lasted 100 years.

In 1661 Bastiaan van Weenigem (q.v.), on a visit to the Mennonite church at Hamburg-Altona, preached a sermon against the Dompelaars. When he returned to Hamburg two years later the Dompelaar preacher handed him a document which he was to refute. This he did in nine letters which he published with the title, Maniere van Doop, in 1666. It was answered by Joan Arents (probably the Dompelaar preacher) in 1668 in Eindelycke verklaringe der gedoopte Christenen with an "Appendix by Antoony de Grijs." Thereupon van Weenigem published Antidotum ofte Tegengift in 1669.

The first church of the Dompelaars at Altona was a small, dark building below street-level, on Reichengasse. Baptism was administered in a pond at Barmbek near Wandsbek. On Nov. 5, 1670, they secured permission from Christian V of Denmark to hold religious services. Noted separatists like Jakob Taube and Christian Hohburg (q.v.) preached here for a while. On April 28, 1708, they were given permission to build a church; it was erected almost altogether by money given by the merchant Ernst Goverts. Here the last Dompelaar preacher, Jakob Denner (q.v.), preached. When he died (1746) the Altona Dompelaar congregation became extinct. The church, which belonged to Denner's heirs, was later used by the Moravians.

The Crefeld Mennonites also had a Dompelaar movement, but it was without any great significance, though the Crefeld Dompelaars were described in the records of the Cleve Synod (1717-20) as "particularly dangerous." In 1700-30 adherents of the "noble mystical enthusiasm," represented by men like Ernst Christoph Hochmann (q.v.) and J. Dippel, were deeply stirred by the question of the baptism of believers by immersion. In 1714 six men of the Reformed congregation in Solingen, who had close contacts with the Crefeld Dompelaars, were baptized by them in the Wupper, and after three years in the prison at Düsseldorf were subsequently condemned to life imprisonment in Jülich where they spent three additional years at hard labor, until they were released Nov. 20, 1720, at the intercession of the General States of Holland. They were also visited by Mennonites from Crefeld, among them Hubert Rahr (of whom Goebel records that as a zealous Mennonite, a friend of Tersteegen, he publicly reproved the Reformed preacher Pull in Crefeld for several harsh statements after the funeral sermon for George Heshus), Jahn van Jurath, Jan Crous (from 1716 to 1724 preacher of the Mennonite church at Crefeld), Wilhelm von der Leyen, and Gosen Goyen (q.v.), a Mennonite preacher who had himself been immersed in the Rhine in 1724. J. Crous was Goyen's opponent on the question of baptism. In a sermon on April 5, 1716, he advocated baptism by pouring.

In 1719 a part of the Crefeld Dompelaars and other like-minded persons in the county of Wittgenstein (Schwarzenau)—about 200, led by Christopher Seebach—emigrated to America, where they have since been known as Dunkers. In Ephrata (q.v.), Pa., they founded a monastic brotherhood with complete community of goods and work, which in 1739 consisted of 60 unmarried persons. About the same time as in Crefeld some difficulties concerning immersion (dompeldoop) arose in the Dutch Mennonite congregation of Leeuwarden. Here in 1714 the deacons favoring immersion were in the majority. In 1715 a baptistery for immersion was installed in the church. But the opponents of immersion having appealed to the city magistrates, the baptistery disappeared in 1720 (DB 1874, 63 ff.). This immersion movement at Leeuwarden may have come from pietistic influence from Germany. In a few other Dutch congregations, as Amsterdam, Leiden, Rotterdam, Schiedam, and Surhuisterveen, as a result of Collegiant principles, baptism was sometimes performed by immersion during the 17th and early 18th centuries (see Immersion and Baptism). Donatists, a brotherhood in the church which at the beginning of the fourth century caused a serious division in the Christian Church, until it was forcibly suppressed 100 years later. The initial cause was personal rivalry between bishops; but soon important fundamental differences rose, founded in the newly established relationship between church and state instituted by Constantine, and the ensuing increasing secularization of the Christian Church.

The Donatists, named after their bishop, Donatus the Great (316-46), wished the church to be a holy community; they required moral purity of their members, and especially of their bishops. They taught the following tenets: no one may spend what he does not have; no one shall impart purity who is himself not pure; a bishop or clergyman living in sin cannot effectively administer the sacraments. The church that tolerates in its clergy the "deadly sins" is unclean and spotted, and must be renounced. Their own brotherhood they considered the "pure bride of Christ"; anyone joining them from the Catholic Church must submit to rebaptism. In the Numidian church they grew to great strength. At a disputation at Carthage (A.D. 411) 279 Donatist bishops were assembled. The state, whose right to be concerned with spiritual matters they denied, broke their power by suppressing them; small remnants maintained themselves up to the time of Islam. In the struggle against them Augustine took a leading part, and summoned the might of the state against them. They can hardly be considered representatives within the Catholic Church of the Protestant doctrine of salvation. Among the Mennonites the Donatistic view that the church should be without spot or wrinkle (Eph. 5:27) and that bishops and preachers should be "pure" has found wide application. NEFF.

Donaumoos (Danube Moor), the site of the first Mennonite settlement in Bavaria (1802). It was a moor southwest of Neuburg on the Danube considered dangerous to man and beast. It was not until the reign of Karl Theodore in 1777 that any attempt was made to cultivate this infertile district. But in spite of the duke's desire to develop it in the interest of his own finances, the project failed.

Under Max Joseph (1799), however, who acted on the advice of experts, a more advantageous settlement of the Donaumoos was begun. He was interested first of all in acquiring the right kind of people to achieve this end, and therefore found it necessary to break into the hitherto jealously guarded Catholic unity of the Bavarian state. Thus the area of Bavaria proper was also made accessible to the Mennonites, and especially to them, in addition to the Palatinate, which had just been acquired by the Bavarian monarch. The elector was no doubt familiar with the reputation of the Mennonites in agriculture, and his agricultural director Kling (q.v.) was a native of the Palatinate. About 120 Mennonite families came to the moors of the Danube (and also the Schleissheim and Rosenheim moors) upon the invitation issued by the elector on March 6 and 12, 1802. Among these the first eight families were given waste forest land in Grünau, later called Maxweiler (q.v.). Kling expressly states that he selected a Mennonite of Grünau to be a member of the Agricultural Society composed of expert farmers. In this society agricultural reforms were to be discussed which had long been the practices of the Mennonites of the Palatinate. Mennonite farming techniques were to become a measure of the arability of the Donaumoos. The permission to settle at Rosing states, "The Mennonites are known to be not only very industrious, but also have the best understanding in the economic management of field and house, hence hereby an experiment could be made to determine to what extent the moor could be developed with the settlement of more families."

The settlers were to be granted the tax- and rent-free use of the land for ten years, and were given substantial subsidies for their buildings, and also temporary freedom from military service. The first eight families were first lodged in the hunting lodge Grünau. By the end of two years they had built four houses, and the colony showed every sign of becoming a thriving settlement. That it ultimately failed was not the fault of the colonists. On the 30 Tagwerk allotted to each they made astounding progress. Their religious unity was an important factor in their achievement. Elder Heinrich Zeiset of Willenbach, Württemberg, ordained the first preacher of the settlement in 1803.

The official records also reveal the untiring efforts of the settlers to set up their own schools. In 1807 they were already presenting an urgent petition to the government for permission to erect a church and school. Again and again their petition was rejected with excuses of all kinds. Finally, on Dec. 9, 1832, they were able to dedicate a church and school built by the labor of their own hands. (The opinion that King Ludwig drew the plan for the building is false. On the contrary, negotiations were needed to induce the king to grant a sum of 684 guilders in 1833 to defray building costs; it is also true that he made the final choice from among the various plans presented to him.) Not until 1850 was the "extremely defective corner school," as it was designated officially, supplied with a trained teacher. Meanwhile the Mennonites had supplied their own teachers. Among them were Johann Dahlem and "the aged Dester," and also a 16-year-old youth. Considering that their economic circumstances were becoming more and more difficult, this was indeed a notable achievement.

By the middle of the 1850's unfavorable economic conditions induced the Mennonite settlers to leave for other settlements, e.g., Eichstock near Dachau. In 1854-55 most of them left Bavaria for America. This was the end of the first Mennonite settlement in south Bavaria. Maxweiler, as a settlement of Knöpfler, i.e., Mennonites rather than Amish, became the center of that first migration into the Swabia-Neuburg-Bavaria region, which spread further to Münster, Mittelstetten, Illdorf, Heinrichsheim, Marienheim, Langlohe, and Doseshof. Little is known of these Mennonite localities after the great emigration, nor what happened to the settlers at Giglberg, Gietlholz, Hardt, Kreut, Dittenfeld, Seehof, Furthof, Probfeld, who were Amish. Maxweiler was later occupied by members of the Reformed Church. Since that time (and since the disbanding of the Eichstock, q.v., settlement) the Mennonites in Bavaria live on single farms rather than in colonies. E.H.C.

Donauwörth, a district of Swabia and Neuburg, Bavaria. At the beginning of the 19th century Alsatian Amish Mennonites settled here, all of whom except a few families have moved away. Since the 1890's Mennonites, mostly from the Neckar region of Baden, have settled here as leaseholders or owners of farms. The following farms in Donauwörth were occupied by Mennonites in 1921: Bartelstock, Bäldleschweige, Ellgau, Hellmaringen, Herrlehof, Hygstetten, Markt, and Urfahrhof. They were at first a part of the Ingolstadt (q.v.) congregation. But as they became more widely scattered they found it increasingly difficult to assemble there, and in 1914 formed their own congregation with its center at Donauwörth. In 1928 the congregation (67 souls) was renamed as the Augsburg (q.v.) congregation, having moved its place of meeting to Augsburg. (ML I, 461.) E.H.C.

Donauwörth, a town in Swabia, Bavaria, Germany, with a population of 4,800, at the time of the Reformation a free imperial city, to which the Reformation found early entry, so that the Protestant population soon predominated, and in which Anabaptists also found adherents. In 1527 Hans Denk (q.v.) is said to have lived here for a while after he had completed his translation of the Prophets; information is scanty. The bloody persecutions setting in on every hand made further growth very difficult.

The only extant information on the presence of Anabaptists in Donauwörth is found in the official records of the persecutions. Most of them fled to Moravia, where they were for a time unmolested. But when persecution broke out there in 1535, many hoped to find refuge in the home town. Their return was made extremely difficult, for the dukes Wilhelm and Ludwig had the border strictly guarded to prevent the entry of any Moravian Anabaptists. On May 19, 1535, a group of seven men, five women, and three children trying to return were arrested at Passau and put into the castle dungeon. Of these, Georg Lang, from a farm at Atzersweilen on the Swabian-Franconian border, had been baptized at Donauwörth by Adam Stock; and Adam Schlegel had baptized Hans Hultzhoder of Kupferzell, Amalie, the wife of Hans of Atzersweilen, Kunigunde, the wife of Dittrich of Heilbronn, and Katharina, the wife of Hans Haffner of Riblingen. On Sept. 24, 1535, the leader (Vorsteher) Hans Betz (q.v.) of Eger was seized, who had been baptized in 1530 above Donauwörth by Georg Haffner. According to the statements of court officials, the prisoners openly admitted belonging to the Anabaptist brotherhood (Wolkan, Lieder 29 and 21), and in spite of torture remained steadfast, comforting their persecuted brethren in a series of hymns which they and their fellow prisoners in Passau composed, thus laying the foundation for the Ausbund (q.v.), which was used for centuries by the Mennonites of South Germany and America and is still used by the Old Order Amish. Hans Betz, who wrote 12 hymns, died in prison in 1537; most of the others died after three years in the dungeon (V. A. Winter, Gesch. der bayerischen Wiedertäufer, Munich, 1809, 35; ML I, 461). Donauwörth, Bavaria, a Mennonite congregation 1912-28. Since 1900 Mennonites from Baden have purchased and leased land near the city. In 1912 they organized a congregation which met monthly in a rented hall in Donauwörth, had a membership of 42 adults and 36 children, and belonged to the Verband (q.v.). With the congregations at Munich, Regensburg, Ingolstadt, and Eichstock, it also belonged to the South Bavarian conference, which had been meeting quarterly since 1920. The elder was Daniel Lichti of Ellgau. In 1928 the congregation was reorganized and moved its meeting place to Augsburg. (ML I, 461.) Hege.

Dondi, a mission station (MC), located in Madhya Pradesh, India. The village of Dondi is situated 52 miles southwest of Dhamtari on an arterial highway which is extended through the western part of the Indian state of Kanker. At the close of 1927, as a result of negotiations during the year, the mission received word from the Rani Sahib (Queen) of the Dondi-Lohara Zemindari that she had granted a permanent lease for the occupancy of four acres of land in the village of Dondi on condition that medical work be carried on in addition to other mission interests. The land transfer was made without cost. The land is free of rent. An annual government tax must be paid.

A. C. Brunk was appointed the manager of the Dondi mission station and plans were started at once for the construction of living quarters for Christian workers, a medical dispensary, and the missionaries' bungalow.

In the Dondi district are found all classes of people from the most primitive aborigines to the different castes and classes of farmers and trades-people. This mission evangelistic station with its corps of Christian workers and its outstation Kusum Kasa is well located and organized for the witness of the grace of God among a spiritually needy people. In 1954 there were 27 members in the Dondi congregation, with O. P. Lal as pastor. G.J.L.

Donnellson is located in Lee Co., Ia., in the southeastern corner of the state. In 1940 it had a population of 518. The early Mennonites of this county came from Bavaria, Germany, more than 100 years ago. There are approximately 85 Mennonite families in this locality, most of them living north and northwest of Donnellson, and 25 living in the town. The Zion (q.v.) Mennonite Church (GCM) of Donnellson is the only Mennonite church now located in Lee County. (M. Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa, Iowa City, 1939; ML I, 462.) E.B.

Donner, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr of Austria. All that is known of him is the little information concerning his death in the chronicles of the Hutterites. From the phrase "aus Wels" it is assumed that he was probably in contact with the older group of Upper Austrian Anabaptists. In the summer of 1535 he offered comfort to his brother-in-faith Wilhelm Griesbacher (q.v.) who was about to be executed. From Upper Austria he went to Carinthia and worked in St. Veit, where active life was evident in connection with church reform. It is known that "heretical" books were offered for sale here. On Oct. 20, 1537, Hans Knyssler, the district clerk, reported to King Ferdinand that he had confiscated the wares of some booksellers and had the sellers put in chains. Perhaps this was the occasion of Donner's arrest, for the records say that "he lay in prison on Wednesday after Christmas of 1537, with his brother Hans Seydel of Murau." Both were sentenced to death and beheaded. From prison Donner wrote a moving letter to his "dearly beloved brethren and sisters." He and his companion did not forsake the truth "as long as their eyes were open and breath was in their nostrils." Two other manuscripts from his hand have been preserved. Donner is the author of the hymn, "Ich dank dir, lieber Herr, mein Gott, in dieser Not, du kannst uns helfen," printed in Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 83. LOSERTH.

Donner, Heinrich, an elder of the Mennonite congregation at Orlofferfelde in the district of Marienburg, West Prussia, 1772-1804, b. 1735 at Danzig, d. 1804. With his parents he moved to Tiegenhof and became a farmer. He was descended from an old Frisian family. His great-grandparents were Daniel Donner and Elisabeth Roosen of Hamburg; his grandfather was Johann Donner, preacher of the Frisian congregation of Danzig. Heinrich Donner was one of the leading elders in West Prussia in the closing decades of the 18th century. He lived first at Schönsee, then at Orlofferfelde. In this latter congregation discord arose between Donner and his coelder Hans Siebert (or Siewertsz) of Thiensdorf, which resulted in a schism and the building of a new meetinghouse in Markushof (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 856 f.) He read extensively and wrote much, rendering valuable service by keeping notes and collecting documents on the history of his church in Prussia. In 1778, with Gerhard Wiebe (q.v.), he published a catechism which was later known as the Elbing-Waldeck Catechism. In 1783 he published a brief report on the Hutterian Brethren, titled Kurzer Bericht von den Taufgesinnten Christen, welche die Huttersche Brüder genannt werden, based on an account given him by Joseph Müller, a Hutterite preacher of Moravia, who was visiting the Mennonites in West Prussia. This report was reprinted in Menn. Gemeindeblatt (VII, 1876, No. 6, 44 f.; No. 7, 53 f.). Other publications from his pen include Unterricht von der heiligen Wasser-Taufe (n.p., 1792, reprinted Tiegenhof, 1906), and Abendmahlsandachten, Gebete, und Lieder (Marienwerder, n.d.). (ML I, 463.) H.G.M.

Donner, Johann (1771-1830), son and successor of Heinrich Donner (q.v.) as elder of the Orlofferfelde Mennonite Church, West Prussia, 1804-30, equaled his father in importance to the Mennonite churches in Prussia, possessed an education quite unusual among the rural population of the time, knew the Bible from memory so that he could locate any passage at once, wrote much in the interest of his fellow believers, was their spokesman in five different deputations sent to Berlin to present the Mennonite cause to the king or the cabinet. He continued the chronicle his father had begun. By his warm, pious, upright personality he contributed to the elimination of friction between the Frisian and Flemish churches in West Prussia. He was born in Schönsee in 1771, owned a farm in Beyershorst, and died there in 1830. His valuable autobiography is published in the Gemeinde-Kalender for 1932, pp. 74-103. (ML I, 463.) H.G.M.

Donnersberg, the highest mountain (2,320 ft.) of the Haardt Mountains of the Palatinate, was once the seat of the worship of Thor (Thunder), hence the name. Until the early years of the 20th century there was on it a "Mennonite farm" (Mennonitenhof).

The first Mennonite family to live here was the Eymann family. In 1755 Michael Krehbiel, a great-grandson of the Peter Krehbiel who was the first Mennonite to settle on the Weierhof (1682) after expulsion from the canton of Bern in Switzerland, leased it as a hereditary possession from the reigning prince. It contained nearly 200 acres of arable land and meadow. The farm remained in the hands of the Krehbiel family for 100 years, the grandson of the original purchaser dividing it with his brother-in-law Jakob Danner.

During the Palatine Revolt of 1849 against the rejection of the constitution adopted by the Frankfurt Parliament (q.v.), the peace of the Mennonite farm was also broken (see A. Krehbiel, "Im Jahre 1849 auf dem Donnersberg," in Nordpfälz. Gesch.-Blätter, 1908, No. 7).

Since the lease of the farm carried with it also certain rights to the use of other pasture and forest lands, the government tried by various means to reclaim possession of the farm for the hunting and wood rights attached to it, about the middle of the 19th century. Finally, after lengthy litigation the Krehbiel and Danner families were compelled to sell it to the state in 1854 for the sum of 24,000 florins, and settle on land near by. NEFF.

Mont Tonnerre was also the name given by the French, who occupied the Palatinate from the time of the French Revolution until 1814, to a government district with its center at Mainz, extending far beyond the present district called Palatinate. In 1811 Ferdinand Bodmann, the divisional superintendent of the prefecture at Mainz, in an annual report to be found in the archives at Speyer, characterized the Palatine Mennonites as "being occupied solely with that which concerns their faith and their personal affairs, indifferent to political events, the consequences of which do not extend to them, reminiscent of the patriarchal life of olden times." The description of eight pages, characterizing the Mennonites of the Donnersberg Department, i.e., of the entire region of the Palatinate, is of interest as being the first official document that openly presents the religious and moral customs of the Mennonites as noninjurious to church and state. Hitherto such judgments had been expressed at most only in the secret official records, and then acted upon with the old prejudice. "Simple clothing and simpler manners" were to this writer the marks that distinguished the Mennonites from Catholics and Protestants. His interest in their civil rights is evident in the opening description of the Mennonites: "Industriously and soberly they carry on their agriculture and cattle raising with fortunate results. Agriculture in our department owes much to this sect." Bodmann estimated their number as 2,200 individuals, having increased by 850 in nine years. "The craze for emigration, which has not left the Mennonites untouched," is given as a reason why they were not still more numerous. In the department they were living chiefly in Speyer, in the cantons of Bechtheim, Kirchheimbolanden, Mainz, and a few in the Zweibrücken district.

Strangely, the Amish of the district are called "Anabaptists." They differed from the Mennonites (says the Bodmann account) in that they let their beards grow. Both the Anabaptists and the Mennonites are described as peaceful and moral; their legal difficulties were arbitrated by the elders, and their conduct was influenced by church discipline. "Tale-bearing and cursing are rare among them. They do not swear. . . . Their clothing and their homes are as simple as their customs and their manner of life. . . . Prosperity and cleanliness, but nowhere does one find signs of show or extravagance. They support the needy without regard for creed." Then he described the conscientiousness with which the Mennonites obey the law. War they do not consider permissible; but this religious opinion yields to the mighty law and they subject themselves to military conscription as obediently as other citizens. In order to reconcile their civil duty as much as possible with their faith, they have requested the emperor to grant them the favor of serving preferably with the transportation corps of the army. Donorodjo, a leper colony in the territory of the former Dutch Mennonite mission on the island of Java, Indonesia. The founding of Donorodjo was made possible by the gift of Queen Wilhelmina of the Netherlands, who used money given to her by the Javanese population in honor of the birth of her daughter Juliana (1909), to build an infirmary for lepers. The buildings were erected in a forest near the coast and on April 30, 1916, the infirmary was opened by Dr. H. Bervoets (q.v.). It was administered by the Dutch Mennonite Mission Society. In course of time the leper colony was much enlarged and many buildings were erected; a small church was built in 1923, a larger church in 1935 (Church of the Resurrection). The physicians in charge were H. Bervoets and K. P. C. A. Gramberg; the nurse was W. Steinmetz; the administrators R. W. de Clercq, Chr. van Rhijn, P. J. Bouwer and their wives. In 1936 the number of lepers was 200, 160 men and 40 women. One hundred and ten of them were Mohammedans, 90 Christians. Missionary N. Thiessen (q.v.) was the leader of the Christian leper population. He was ably assisted by Kandar, a native Christian, a leper who bore his cross with a strong faith. The colony achieved a certain prosperity both financially and spiritually. Here the lepers, outcasts from their own island society, found a quiet place where they could live (also as married couples if they wanted to) and work, and where they were cared for. In 1940 the number of lepers reached about 300.

In March 1942 when the Japanese occupied Java, the fanatical Mohammedans began the "holy war" against the Christians. Donorodjo was partly destroyed; the medical instruments and medicines were all destroyed. F. C. Heusdens, a Reformed missionary who had taken over the administration of the colony after the departure of Bouwer, was put to death by stoning because he refused to become a Mohammedan. During the Japanese occupation, March 1942-August 1945, the colony was somewhat restored. In 1948 the government of the new Indonesian Republic also took some care of the colony.† (Vol. I) vdZ.

Donskoye, a village of the Neu-Samara Mennonite settlement in Russia, located in the district Buzuluk, volost of Yemurau-Tabynsk, founded in 1898.

Doopsgezind, official name of the Mennonites in the Netherlands, by which they have been registered since 1796, and also the name which they gave themselves. The name is very old. Prince William of Orange wrote in 1578 a letter to the city government of Middelburg (q.v.), Dutch province of Zeeland, in behalf of a group of "citizens, called Doopsgesint" (DJ 1930, 128). From this expression it is not quite clear whether the Mennonites also called themselves Doopsgezind, or that they were merely called so by the outside world, but in a letter written by the Middelburg congregation to the magistrates of the city and also in a petition by this congregation to the Prince of Orange in 1582, they use the word in the same way: die men noempt Doopsghesinde (DJ 1930, 133, 137). At any rate this name was much more agreeable to them than "Anabaptist" and Wederdoper. The name Doopsgesinde, says T. J. van Braght in the foreword of the Martyrs' Mirror, was not assumed by them by preference, but by necessity, because their proper name rather should be Christgesinden, Apostelgesinden, or Evangelischgesinden. Mennonites in Holland soon began to call themselves Doopsgezinden; the Waterlanders used this term as early as 1580, the Young Frisians about 1600, and the Flemish shortly after 1620. Hence it is not quite correct for van Braght (Mart. Mir. 1660, introduction) to say that the name had "only lately come into use" (Eng. ed., 1950, 16). In the 17th and 18th centuries the more conservative groups (Old Flemish, Janjacobsgezinden, and also Zonists) preferred the name Mennonites, while the more progressive group of the Waterlanders and later on the Lamists called themselves almost exclusively Doopsgezinden, because they did not like to be named for an earthly creature, desiring to be only followers of Christ, while they rejected the name "Mennonite" particularly for the reason that they on the whole did not agree with the doctrines of Menno Simons. Still some conservatives also used the name of Doopsgezind: T. J. van Braght calls his book on martyrs the Martyrs' Mirror of the Doops-gesinde Christians (1660), and the Dutch Zonist minister and historian G. Maatschoen (q.v.), editor of Schijn's Historiae Mennonitarum, writes in his Dutch translation (Geschiedenisse dier Christenen . . . , Amsterdam, 1743, 97) that the name Doopsgezinden is right and well chosen.

Since about 1800 in the Netherlands the name Mennonieten or Men(n)isten has been replaced by Doopsgezinden, though until now in the province of Friesland, and here and there elsewhere, in common parlance the word Menist is often used. The derivation and meaning of the word Doopsgezind is not clear. It is composed of two words, doops (genitive of doop, baptism) and gezind, i.e., inclined to, or minded. Some authors are of the opinion that the word means "inclined to (the true Biblical) baptism (on confession of faith)" e.g., Galenus Abrahamsz (Verdediging der Christenen, die Doopsgezinde genaamd worden, Amsterdam, 1699, 28 f.). This explanation is more nearly correct than the opinion of G. J. van Rijswijk (Leerredenen II, Amsterdam, 1825, 55), who suggests that they were called Doopsgezind because of rejection of (infant) baptism.

The German word Taufgesinnt, used in Switzerland and Germany to indicate the Mennonites and so used by themselves, is the exact equivalent of the Dutch word Doopsgezind, and was taken over from the Dutch Mennonites. vdZ.

Doopsgezind Jaarboekje, a yearbook published by the Dutch Mennonites since 1902. In contrast to the more scholarly Doopsgezinde Bijdragen (q.v.) it presents a more popular type of reading matter of interest to the Mennonites of Holland. For every Sunday and holiday it has a devotional paragraph, followed by the biographical sketch of some person of note in the Mennonite world. Besides this it contains poetry and prose of stimulating and instructional nature and articles on current affairs. Its founder and first editor was A. Binnerts Sz. in Haarlem. Binnerts was the editor 1902-26. He was followed by J. Wuite, 1927-31, and S. H. N. Gorter, 1932-43. The Jaarboekje appeared annually 1902-43, when it had to cease publication by order of the German occupation authorities. Since 1949 it has been published by the Algemene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit, edited by L. D. G. Knipscheer and D. Richards. (ML I, 465.) A.Bi., vdZ.

Doopsgezind Kinderhuis Oud-Wulven, a Dutch Mennonite children's home, managed by the Stichting voor Bizondere Noden (Foundation for Special Needs). It provides a home for normal children (ages 5-13) from families that for moral or other reasons are unfit to care for them. The home Oud-Wulven, which is located near Houten, a few miles south of Utrecht, was opened on Sept. 16, 1947, and is conducted by Mrs. de Zeeuw, wife of the present secretary of the Algemene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit. In January 1953, 29 children were sheltered here. vdZ.

Doopsgezind Pensioenverhogingsfonds, a Dutch Mennonite fund, founded in 1929 to increase the pensions of retired ministers by giving a supplementary payment. These allowances were first paid in 1930. In 1948, after the Pensioenfonds van de ADS (q.v.) was founded in 1946, and the matters of pensions entirely reorganized, the original Pensioenverhogingsfonds was included with other funds in the general Pensioenfond. vdZ.

Doopsgezinde Bijdragen, a yearbook published by the Mennonites of the Netherlands 1861-1919. In 1837 S. Muller (q.v.) published his Jaarboekje voor Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in de Nederlanden in Amsterdam. It was to be a continuation of the Naamlijst (q.v.), which ceased publication in 1829—to furnish a list of ministers and congregations in the Netherlands. Muller added two sections to this list of names, one headed Kerknieuws (Church News), and the other Doopsgezinde Mengelingen (Mennonite Miscellany). Three issues of this significant yearbook appeared (1837, 1840, and 1850). Four years later D. S. Gorter (q.v.) published his Godsdienstige lectuur voor Doopsgezinden, also in three issues (1854, 1856, and 1858).

A need for such a publication concerning major events and information on church affairs had been established. Three years later (1861) the ministers D. Harting in Enkhuizen and P. Cool in Harlingen sought to meet this need by publishing the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen (Mennonite Contributions). They sent a circular to the Mennonite congregations stating the purpose of the new periodical; viz., "to cultivate and strengthen the spirit of brotherly communion among the Dutch Mennonites by means of historical information on the life and work of our forefathers, fraternal discussion of church affairs and concerns which can exert an influence on the welfare of our brotherhood, and finally collecting such reports from one another to promote acquaintance with one another and interest in the present status of the brotherhood."

The project soon grew beyond its original plan, becoming the most important periodical of the Dutch Mennonites. It gave reports not only on changes in ministerial charges and other events in the congregations, but also presented important scholarly articles on all sorts of questions from history and current affairs, so that the periodical has become a mine of information for the research scholar and is thereby of permanent value.

It was originally printed by Frederik Muller in Amsterdam; 1868-70 by H. Kuipers in Leeuwarden; 1872-80 by G. L. Funke, Amsterdam, and H. Kuipers in Leeuwarden; and 1881-1919 by E. J. Brill at Leiden. In 1866 and 1871 and 1913-15 it did not appear. In 1870 J. G. de Hoop Scheffer became the editor. After his death in 1893, it was edited by S. Cramer 1894-1912. In consequence of certain difficulties no further issue appeared until 1916, when W. J. Kühler took it over. The final issue appeared in 1919, when the project was discontinued. An exhaustive index of the first 50 volumes (1861-1910) was prepared by K. Vos and was published in 1912.

The DB, an annual volume of small format with a scholarly content of 110-190 pages, is the first Mennonite scholarly periodical to be published in any country, has the longest record of publication, and is one of the most valuable sources of printed information on the Dutch Mennonites. (ML I, 465.) Neff.

Doopsgezinde Bundel, a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook. From the middle of the 16th century until 1940 a large number of Dutch Mennonite hymnbooks were published (see Hymnology). In 1900 there were still 15 or 16 different hymnals in use in the Dutch congregations, most of them using two to five different books; in 1940, 13 different editions were still being used, though the Leidse Bundel (q.v.) and the two Protestantenbondbundels predominated. For many years it had been felt desirable to have a single songbook for the entire Dutch Mennonite brotherhood. In 1936 the church boards of the Amsterdam and Haarlem congregations co-operated with the Vereniging voor Gemeentedagen, which was also planning to compile a new hymnal for their Elspeet and other conferences. In 1937 the Nederlandsche Protestanten-Bond (q.v.) also appointed a committee to make a new hymnal, and this committee then joined the two Mennonite groups in composing a hymnbook for the use of all the groups. This book was ready in 1943, but was not used in the congregations until 1945. The book contains 250 hymns. Special attention was given to restoring the music for the hymns to its original form by removing extraneous additions.

This hymnal is used by a large number of Dutch Protestant churches, Mennonites, Remonstrants, Lutherans, Vrije Gemeente (Free Church of Amsterdam), and Vrijzinnig Hervormden (Liberal Reformed churches), besides the departments of the Nederlandsche Protestanten-Bond.

For many Mennonites, however, the book in this form was not quite satisfactory. For this reason 50 favorite hymns from former Mennonite songbooks were inserted. Some hymns suited to particular Mennonite services like baptism were also given place. So the Doopsgezinde Bundel, edited by the Algemene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit (q.v.) (preface of 1944), consists of 300 hymns. It is now in use in nearly all Mennonite churches of the Netherlands, the old hymnbooks all having been abandoned. Only the congregations of Ameland, Blokzijl, and Ouddorp did not adopt the Doopsgezinde Bundel, but retained the old Reformed songbooks. vdZ.

Doopsgezinde Jeugdraad (Dutch Mennonite Youth Council) was founded in 1946 after World War II by the ADS (General Conference of Dutch Mennonites) on the initiative of C. Nijdam, at that time moderator of the ADS, for the purpose of co-ordinating and promoting all work for and by Mennonite youth. The council has a board composed of representatives of several youth activities. The affiliated groups are the Doopsgezinde Jongeren-Bond (q.v.) (Dutch Mennonite Youth Union), ages 18-25. Menniste Bouwers Federatie (Federation of Dutch Mennonite Builders), ages 8-18, Elfregi (q.v.) (Mennonite Boy Scouts), ages 8-25, and West-Hill Sunday school for ages 4-12. The Youth Council has its office in the Amsterdam Singel Church. Special attention is given to training leaders for the different branches of youth work, and to this end a periodical is published entitled Koers (Course), Leidersblad voor Doopsgezinde Jeugdwerk.

The Dutch Mennonite youth is represented by the Jeugdraad in the Ecumenical Youth Council, in the Nederlandse Jeugdgemeenschap (Dutch Youth Association), and also for the purpose of broadcasts for youth. Each year a number of meetings are held. To promote the West-Hill Sunday-school work and to train its leaders an instructor has been employed who visits Mennonite congregations in rotation. The Youth Council also contacts Mennonite students of the seven Dutch universities. The work of the Jeugdraad is subsidized by the ADS, in the board of which the Jeugdraad has a representative with consultative voice. H.W.

Doopsgezinde Jongerenbond (Dutch Mennonite Youth Union), usually abbreviated DJB. After the Vereeniging voor Gemeentedagen van Doopsgezinden (q.v.) had been founded in 1917 it soon took care of the young members of the church, for whom special Jonge-Leden-dagen (Young members' meetings) were organized. In the course of time in many a congregation a Jongerenkring (youth circle) arose, and to promote mutual contact between those circles a general youth secretariat was founded, of which Gerrit Honig of Zaandam soon became the life and soul. In 1924, when the Friese Doopsgezinde Jongeren Bond (Frisian Mennonite Youth Union) was founded in Friesland, the young members of the church all over the country wanted to have a central organization, of which all young Mennonites would be members. This general Union was founded in 1926. Among the founders were Gerrit Honig, mentioned before, and the (now) Mennonite minister, Miss Aafke Leistra, then living at Grouw. During the first years the Youth Union was conducted by the Vereeniging voor Gemeentedagen, but on April 9, 1928, it became an independent association. All young Mennonites from 18 to 35 years and also sympathizing non-Mennonites can be members (in many congregations, however, only those from 18 to about 25 are engaged in the youth circles). From 1928 on the DJB was not a kind of organization conducted by church leaders, as it is often the case in other countries, but a self-conducted movement; it has a board of about ten members, being all representatives of the youth circles of all parts of the Netherlands.

First secretary of the DJB was Gerrit Honig. P. Vis, then minister of the congregation of Arnhem, who had also been a founder of the Frisian Youth Union, was the first president of the DJB. It is not exactly known how large the membership was when the DJB was founded. It might have been about 600, spread over 39 congregational youth groups. On Jan. 1, 1939, the membership numbered about 1,500 (in 78 groups); it reached its peak in 1944 with 2,250 members, spread over 94 groups. Since then it has decreased. Now (1953) there are about 1,200 members in 75 groups. In 1932 the DJB and the Frisian Youth Union merged.

In the course of time many activities were promoted. The most outstanding activity is the yearly general youth meeting, held in June in the brotherhood home at Elspeet (q.v.). Here sometimes 250 young men and women assembled. In former years the meeting was so large that two general meetings had to be held, one in June, the other in August, both at Elspeet. Besides these general meetings, provincial youth meetings are held in Friesland, Groningen, North Holland, etc. During the last years the interest in these meetings, also in the Elspeet meetings, is somewhat decreasing. The DJB also organizes youth camps: in 1954 three camps were held in Holland, and seven in Germany and Austria (total number of participants, 300). In 1937 the Union arranged a trip to the Mennonites of Danzig, Prussia, and Poland. The next years' trips were made to England and to the Alsatian Mennonites.

For a number of years the announcements of the DJB were published in the Brieven (q.v.) of the Vereeniging voor Gemeentedagen, but in 1935 they acquired their own monthly De Hoeksteen (the cornerstone), which still exists. In 1946 the DJB published the Menno-Bundel, an informational booklet of 80 pages. vdZ.

Doopsgezinde Kalender is a devotional calendar with a page for each day, and usually also in book form (diary), in the Dutch language, edited by a special committee. This calendar, the first issue of which appeared 1937 (during the years 1943-46 the calendar could not be published), is sometimes also called Zendingskalender or Broederschapskalender. (See Abreisskalender.) vdZ.

Doopsgezinde Liederen, a Dutch Mennonite hymnbook, usually called Nieuwe Haarlemsche Bundel. It was composed by a committee of the congregation of Haarlem and for the use of this congregation. This hymnbook, printed at Amsterdam 1895, contains 108 songs collected from older hymnbooks. It was also used in a few other congregations, viz., Apeldoorn, Beemster, The Hague, and Warns. Doopsgezinde Vredesgroep (Dutch Mennonite Peace Group). This group is a postwar continuation of the Arbeidsgroep (q.v.) van Doopsgezinden tegen de Krijgsdienst, which was a Dutch Mennonite antimilitaristic association, founded in 1922, which during the war co-operated with Quakers and other nonresistant groups to relieve the needs of the war times: help to Jews, to enable them to leave the Netherlands secretly, and later in sending food to the Jewish concentration camp at Westerbork, where the German Nazis had confined a large number of Jews (each week 700 packets of 10 lbs. were sent); to the population of Rotterdam after the severe German bombardment of May 14, 1940; in 1943-44, when food became scarce, by moving children out of the larger cities of the Western Netherlands to the country; and helping the onderduikers, i.e., persons who were in hiding because of the Gestapo, etc.

After the war, on Aug. 31 and Sept. 1-2, 1945, the Vredesgroep was founded during a peace meeting in the Elspeet Brotherhood Home (q.v.). The aims of the Peace Group are as follows: In loyal obedience to the Lord Jesus Christ they wish to give a testimony to the world by acknowledging Christ's command of love even to enemies, and the obligation of Biblical nonresistance; to strengthen the peace convictions in Mennonite congregations; to give spiritual and material help to those who are in trouble in consequence of their nonresistance, and especially to those who refuse military service for the sake of Christ; to contribute to a form of service of love, substituting for military service, like the Civilian Public Service (q.v.) of the Mennonites in the United States; they are willing to co-operate with other nonresistant organizations.

An important support for conscientious objectors is the Doopsgezind Vredes-Bureau (Mennonite Peace Office), founded by the Peace Group in 1946 (leaders: T. O. Hylkema and C. P. Inja), which gives assistance and instruction to all who wish to refuse military service, or who as conscientious objectors are in trouble. The number of C.O.'s to whom assistance was rendered from September 1946 to Jan. 1, 1953, totaled 700 (Mennonites 250, other Christian denominations 283, no church 167). Besides this, relief work was taken up "in the name of Christ." Supported by the whole Mennonite brotherhood, food was sent to Vienna, Austria, 1947-50, and from then to Emden, East Friesland. This relief work was largely stimulated by the example of the Mennonite Central Committee (q.v.) which had much impressed the Dutch Mennonites. The members of the Peace Group felt much allied to the American Mennonites, both groups holding the principles of nonresistance. By this positive principle the Dutch Mennonite Peace Group has much influence in similar non-Mennonite organizations.

The membership of the Peace Group, when founded in 1946, numbered 50; in May 1947 it had increased to 250; on Jan. 1, 1953, the membership was 607. Besides this there are about 100 belangstellende leden (sympathizing members, who do not agree on all points with the constitution of the group). Among the members there are 40 ministers (32 per cent of all Dutch Mennonite ministers).

Dooregeest, Engel Arendszoon van, was born Dec. 26, 1645, at Dooregeest, a polder near Uitgeest, Dutch province of North Holland, and at the age of about 30 was ordained Mennonite minister at De Rijp, serving there until his death on Aug. 16, 1706. At the same time he seems to have been a physician. He belonged to the more orthodox Zonists, but in his book Onderwijzinge in de Christelyke Leere na de Belijdenissen der Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1692) he differs from Menno's position with regard to original sin, ban, and communion, nor does he consider footwashing a sign of the covenant.

When Prof. Spanheim of the university of Leiden accused him of various heresies in his book Selectarum de religione Controversiarum elenchus (1687), Dooregeest showed himself a real champion of Mennonitism in his reply, Brief aan den Heere Fredericus Spanhemius (Amsterdam, 1694), which was translated into German in 1694, and in its third edition in 1700 was combined with a Brief aen den Eerw. Heer Hermanus Schyn, Leeraar der Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1700) in order to defend the good name of the Mennonites the better. In it he opposes Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan (q.v.), who, as he thought, had deviated rather far from the old doctrines in his Korte Grondstellingen.

When the Frisian preacher Jan Klaasz van Grouw seemed in his writings to have unitarian and socinian views, Dooregeest again came to the defense of the ancient orthodox doctrine with his Verantwoordinge Voor de Leere der Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1704); he likewise made an attack on the Reformed preacher at De Rijp in his Verdeediging van de Leere der Doopsgezinden, tot Wederlegginge van de twee Tractaaten, tegen dezelve uitgegeeven door Henricus Schevenhuisen, Predikant der Gereformeerden tot Rijp (Amsterdam, 1705).

The conference of the Zonist Sociëteit in June 1697 commissioned him together with Herman Schijn and Pieter Beets to draw up a Kort Onderwijs des Christelijke Geloofs, . . . geschickt na de Belijdenissen der Doopsgezinden (Amsterdam, 1697); its fifth reprint was issued in 1740. It is evident that van Dooregeest, though not formally educated, was a man of understanding, intelligence, and was highly respected. Though a Waterlander, who usually were more liberal, and serving a Waterlander congregation, he was an ardent adherent of the conservative Zonist (q.v.) principles. He was a coauthor of the booklet Grondtsteen van Vreede en Verdraegsaemheyt (1674), which invited the congregations to join the Zonist Conference. He was often the moderator of the Zonist Conference meetings. In 1684-85, when efforts were made to reunite the separated groups of Zonists and Lamists, van Dooregeest was one of the representatives of the Zonist branch.

With C. A. Posjager, the minister of the neighboring Noordeinde van Graft, he also wrote De Ryper Zeepostil, bestaande in XXII Predicatien, toegepast op de Zeevaart (Amsterdam, 1699), to which he added a brief account of the rise of Holland, a description of Waterland (a district of the Dutch province of North Holland) and the origin of fishing for herring and whales. He also wrote a foreword for a new edition (1686) of the Belijdenis des Christelyken Geloofs by Hans de Ries and Lubbert Gerritsz. J.L.

Do(o)reslaer, Abraham à, a Dutch Reformed preacher, coauthor with Austro-Sylvius of the only scholarly work comparing the doctrines of the Calvinists with those of the Mennonites, entitled, Grondige en klare Vertooninghe van het onderscheijdt in de voornaemste hooftstucken der Christelijcker Religie, tusschen De Gereformeerde ende de Weder-dooperen, . . . (Enkhuizen, 1637, 2d printing 1649). The book contains many quotations from extremely rare or now nonexistent books. The 1626 synod at Alkmaar commissioned Petrus Jakobus Austro-Sylvius (q.v.) to write this work, considering it necessary because of the confession of faith published by Jacques Outerman (q.v.), a Mennonite preacher, in 1626. At the synod of 1627 Austro-Sylvius was already looking for help, and Dooreslaer was appointed to the task. Dooreslaer was the pastor at Oude Niedorp in 1602, and at Enkhuizen in 1605. In addition to several sermons, Dooreslaer also made a new translation of the Bible with explanations (Amsterdam, 1614), a forerunner of the Statenvertaling (q.v.). He must therefore have been one of the most learned of the Calvinist theologians. After the outline of statements and counter statements had been approved by the synod committee (Antonides and Sibema), the two authors proceeded to work out the comparison. The book is divided into 24 chapters and contains no less than 856 pages (in two columns) with an exhaustive index. Dooreslaer died at Enkhuizen March 19, 1655. His three sons, Samuel, Isaac, and David, also became Reformed preachers. (Biogr. Wb. II, 557-60; ML I, 466.) K.V.

Doornaert, Hans, was a weaver at Gent, Belgium, and a preacher of the Mennonite congregation there, who fled to Haarlem, Dutch province of North Holland, with many others of his faith. Here he also served as a preacher (Vermaner) of the Waterlander Mennonites, opening and closing each meeting by asking the congregation to pray silently. Since this was permitted only to regularly appointed preachers of the congregation, Jakob Jansz Scheedemaker (q.v.) opposed him vigorously, while others considered it proper and defended Doornaert, inasmuch as he could do it in a more edifying manner than they were accustomed to hear. In 1587 a conference was held at Haarlem on this question, at which delegates from Amsterdam, Alkmaar, and several congregations in Waterland also appeared. Nothing was accomplished, and a division of the Waterlanders was averted only by the tact of Dirk Volkertsz Coornhert (q.v.). (Blaupot t. C., Holland I, 123, 124; DB 1877, 81; 1897, 93 ff.; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 368-71; ML I, 466.) J.L.

Doornbosch, Bernardus, was preacher of the Frisian Mennonites of Wormerveer, Dutch province of North Holland in 1764-80. In 1780 there was some disagreement between him and his congregation, so he resigned. He is supposed to have gone over to the Reformed Church, but this is not certain. Doornbosch is the author of Godgeleerde en Zedekundige proeven (Zutphen, 1784). From 1759 to 1764 he collected a large number of sermons preached by Mennonite and Remonstrant ministers. This curious manuscript, entitled Thesaurus Theologicus (10 volumes), is now found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. This library also contains another manuscript by Doornbosch, called De Christenleeraar . . . , a collection of extracts from theological and ethical studies and sermons. (Biogr. Wb. II, 552; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1748; Catalogus Amst., 246.) vdZ.

Doornik (Tournay), a town (pop. 32,500) in Belgium, where in the 16th century were found many adherents of the Reformation. The first victim of persecution was a former Augustinian monk, Hendrik van Westfalen, who was burned here on July 13, 1528. The total number of martyrs in this town was 227, only 30 of whom are listed in Mennonite or Reformed martyrbooks. Most of them were followers of Calvin, Calvinism being very strong in this town. In 1568 at least 92 Calvinists were put to death, and in the next year another 53.

There were six Mennonite martyrs of Doornik: Adriaen van Hee, Joos Meeuwesz, Willem the Hatmaker, Egbert the Hatmaker, Goossen the Hatmaker, and Lambert van Doornik, all in 1558. They were seized without resistance when a meeting was surprised in the forest of Obignies near Doornik. They were first brought to Doornik. Five of them were from abroad; only one was a native of Doornik. The trial was conducted at Bergen (Mons); after they had all remained steadfast and were sentenced to death, they were brought back to Obignies, where the execution took place; all six were burned at the stake in 1558, exact date unknown.

These six men may have been baptized by Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.). According to his list this elder baptized 11 persons at Doornik in 1554-56 and 20 in 1557-61. The Inquisitor Pieter Titelman (q.v.) wrote in a letter, that in 1561 there was still a Mennonite congregation in Doornik. Of this congregation nothing further is known. vdZ.

Doornkaat (Dorencate, Doorenkaate, or ten Doornkaat), a Mennonite family, which is found from the beginning of the 17th century in the district of Twenthe, Dutch province of Overijssel, where Hendrick Dorencate (d. 1755) became a preacher of the Old Flemish congregation of Hengelo (q.v.) in 1729, in which Hendrik Engbertsz Doorencate was a preacher 1735-*ca.*79. In later times this family lived especially in the Dutch province of Groningen and in East Friesland, Germany (see also Coolman). vdZ.

Doornkaat Koolman, Jan ten, b. Oct. 1, 1815, at Norden, East Friesland, Germany, part owner of the Doornkaat distillery, which his father, who came from Holland in 1806, founded in Norden. Anna Brons (q.v.) was the only child of his father's first marriage. Jan was the oldest son of the second marriage, to Jeikelina Kool. He and his brother Fiepko made a thriving business of the distillery. For his native city and his country Jan ten Doornkaat Koolman performed meritorious services. In 1848 he was elected president of the civic assembly; this was the beginning of a long and honorable career of political service in both elective and appointive positions in local and national government.

In addition to all this professional and political activity, he also found time and energy to follow his scholarly inclinations. Though he had no formal academic training, his work in several areas won the recognition of scholars. Evidence of his versatile interests is found in his book, Die Unendlichkeit der Welt, Eine Naturbetrachtung (Norden, 1866, 2d ed.). An imperishable gift to his home country is his three-volume dictionary of the Frisian language, 1862-65. In the Norden Mennonite Church he held the office of elder for many years. C.A.L.

In the Mennonite church of his home town of Norden, he served for many years as deacon, and after 1909 as senior deacon. In his leisure he studied the treasures in the archives of Norden and the Mennonite church of Norden and the community. In 1903 he published Kurze Mitteilungen aus der Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinden in Ostfriesland im allgemeinen und aus der Nordener Gemeinde im besonderen bis zum Jahre 1797. In 1904 appeared *Mitteilungen aus der Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Norden im 19. Dordrecht, a city in the Dutch province of South Holland (pop. 68,000 in 1947). In the 16th century there was a large Mennonite congregation here. Early Anabaptism, however, had no great number of adherents here, although Bartholomeus Boeckbinder (q.v.) and Willem de Cuyper (q.v.) preached here as early as 1533-34. Of great blessing was the activity of Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.), who baptized 6 persons here in 1557-61 and no less than 44 in 1563-65. About this time the congregation was greatly increased by immigrants from Flanders, as is indicated by the family names. Yet the congregation was severely persecuted. The Martyrs' Mirror names as martyrs here: Digna Pieters, 1555; Joris Wippe, burgomaster of Meenen, Belgium, 1558; ten persons in 1569; Jan Woutersz van Cuyck, an artist, 1572. When Calvinism prevailed, the Synod of Dordrecht in 1574 passed a sharp resolution against the Mennonites.

Among the important Mennonites of Dordrecht were the historiographer Matthijs van Balen (q.v.), the painter and poet Samuel van Hoogstraten (q.v.), and the artistic Houbraken family. The congregation once had many well-to-do members. In 1655 it made a donation of 300 florins for the victims of persecution in Savoy. Of the elders the following are known: Gerrit van Bylaer (d. Oct. 12, 1617), Hendrik Terwe (d. Oct. 2, 1625), Mees Ghijsbrechts (d. June 19, 1648), Bartholomeus van Stein, and Tieleman Jansz van Braght (q.v., d. Oct. 8, 1664); in the 18th century, Bartholomeus de Groot and Abraham Verduin (q.v.). One of their preachers was a Menno Simons, who resigned on Jan. 19, 1653. A statement in the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen (1862, p. 104) seems to indicate that the elders Cornelis van Braght and Abraham Ferrier were appointed to that office by the government in 1689 and 1691 respectively. The last preacher was Adam van Moerbeek, 1749-93. After that the Rotterdam preachers occasionally served the Dordrecht congregation.

In the 17th century the church, which belonged to the Flemish branch, was at its zenith. It was here that the Dordrecht Confession of 1632 was drawn up by Adriaen Cornelisz. Van Braght, the noted author of the Martyrs' Mirror, and Bastiaan van Weenigem of Rotterdam were the leaders of the conservative wing in opposition to the liberal views of Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan (q.v.), and the principal authors of the Zonist Verbond van Eenigheid.

In 1624 the congregation built a church on Lange Breedstraat, and in 1643 enlarged it. The Calvinists in 1664 persuaded the authorities to forbid the building of a little gate to the church. On Sept. 17, 1683, the Mennonites asked the city authorities for a new church location, apparently in vain.

During the 18th century the congregation decreased steadily. In 1732 there were 80 members left, in 1742, 40. After 1793 they had no pastor, and their church was used for other purposes, e.g., for meetings of the Dutch Missionary Association. About 1840 a certain Karsdorp exploited this state of affairs; he prevented any Mennonites who moved into the city from joining the church; and when he alone was left he sold the church and had the government grant him the capital. For ten years the Rotterdam Church was involved in litigation to secure these funds, but lost. The lower chamber passed a resolution acknowledging that the government director was in error in giving Karsdorp the funds, but could not make it retroactive.

When the membership had again increased to 60 in 1895, the congregation was reorganized (Dec. 13, 1895). A church council was chosen. Johannes Dyserinck (q.v.), a minister in Rotterdam, was consulent and gave religious instruction. On Jan. 12, 1896, the first sermon was delivered to the new congregation. In 1897 they built a church on Lenghenstraat, and dedicated it on Jan. 9, 1897, with a sermon by Dyserinck. On Oct. 15, 1899, they called a preacher of their own and the government, to atone for the error made earlier, gave them an annual subsidy of 200 florins. For preaching services they were united with Breda (q.v.) from 1899 to 1945. The ministers were A. J. van Loghum Slaterus, 1899-1908; W. Koekebakker, 1908-45; Abraham Mulder since 1946. The membership in 1898 was 74; in 1926, 180; in 1953, 148. The congregation has a Sunday school, Bible courses, women's circle, and many youth activities.

Dordrecht Confession of Faith. Written in the first draft by Adriaan Cornelisz, elder of the Flemish Mennonite congregation in the Dutch city of Dordrecht, this confession of faith, containing 18 articles, was adopted April 21, 1632, and signed by 51 Flemish and Frisian Mennonite preachers as a basis of union. The official (Dutch) title reads: Voorstellinghe van de principale articulen onses algemeynen Christelijcken Geloofs, ghelijck de selve in onse Gemeynte doorgaens geleert ende beleeft worden. On Feb. 4, 1660, six preachers and seven deacons from Alsace, in a meeting held at Ohnenheim in Rappoltstein, adopted the Dordrecht Confession "as our own." Later it was adopted by the Mennonites in the Palatinate and North Germany; the Swiss Mennonites never accepted it, perhaps because it teaches shunning (Article 17) which only the Swiss Amish practiced, not the Swiss Mennonites. Probably through the influence of the Dutch Mennonites of Germantown, Pa., the Mennonites of southeastern Pennsylvania, of the Franconia and Lancaster conferences (MC) adopted the Dordrecht Confession in 1725. The more conservative Mennonite bodies in America, including the Mennonite Church (MC), now recognize it as their official articles of faith, but its personal acceptance is not required either for baptism or ordination. Historically this symbol has been much used as an instrument of catechetical instruction in preparation for baptism.

The Eighteen Articles of Dordrecht teach the basic doctrines of the Christian faith: God is viewed as "eternal, almighty, and incomprehensible" and as existing in three Persons, "Father, Son, and the Holy Ghost." God created the first man Adam in His own image, gave him Eve as a companion, and from these two spring all the people of earth (Art. I). The original pair fell into sin by transgressing the divine command and became so estranged from God as to be utterly lost had not God "interposed in their behalf and made provision for their restoration" (Art. II). Even while Adam and Eve were still in the Garden of Eden God promised to give His Son as their Saviour, a divine promise in which they hoped, as did all the pious patriarchs, "expecting that He . . . would at His coming again redeem and deliver the fallen race from their sins . . ." (Art. III). In the fullness of time Jesus was born, the long-awaited Saviour: the Word became flesh, having been conceived by the Holy Spirit in the Virgin Mary. "But how or in what manner this worthy body was prepared . . . we content ourselves with the declaration which the worthy evangelists have given." Jesus died for all men, purchasing redemption for the entire race, for He "tasted death for every man" (Art. IV). Before His ascension Jesus established His New Testament with His followers, which Testament contains all that men need for the Christian life if they accept and obey it (Art. V). The first step in beginning the Christian life is "repentance and amendment of life" (Art. VI). Those who in penitence become Christian believers, those who "through faith, the new birth and renewal of the Holy Ghost have become united with God," are to be baptized with water in the name of the Holy Trinity to the burying of their sins, for their incorporation into the communion of the saints, and as a pledge of faithful discipleship, "to observe all things whatsoever the Son of God taught . . . His followers to do" (Art. VII). Those who have repented, become true believers and been baptized, constitute the church of Christ, the body which He redeemed by His blood and which He will preserve and protect until the end of the world. The true church is known by her evangelical faith, Christian love, godly manner of life, and observance of the "true ordinances of Christ" (Art. VIII). The Lord has appointed that the congregations of His church should be provided with elders, pastors, deacons and deaconesses, so that the Lord's ordinances, baptism and supper, might be administered, "the body of Christ may be edified, and the Lord's vineyard and church be preserved in its growth and structure" (Art. IX). The Lord's Supper is to be observed as a memorial of our redemption in Christ's blood and as a reminder of our duty to love one another and to maintain the unity of the church (Art. X). Believers shall also wash the feet of their fellow Christians as a token of humble service, "but yet more particularly as a sign to remind us of the true washing —the washing and purification of the soul in the blood of Christ" (Art. XI). Marriage is instituted of God and shall be entered into only with those who are members of the same Christian fellowship, who have received "the same baptism" and who belong to "the same church" (Art. XII). God has established the civil government for the punishment of the wicked and the protection of the good, and Christians shall recognize rulers as ministers of God, rendering honor to them, paying taxes and praying for them (Art. XIII). Christians shall follow only the law of love, manifesting to enemies the same spirit of love and forgiveness as did Jesus, being Biblical nonresistants in suffering and abuse. They shall pray for their enemies, "comfort and feed them," and seek their welfare and salvation: all this in obedience to the express teaching of Christ (Art. XIV). Christians shall make only a solemn affirmation of the truth; they shall not swear any oaths whatever: this also in obedience to the explicit instruction of Christ (Art. XV). When a member of the church reverts to a life of sin and loses out as a Christian, it is necessary for the church to excommunicate such an apostate, for his amendment and "not for (his) destruction": the purpose being to purge the church of such "leaven," to preserve the good name of the church, and "that he may again be convinced of the error of his ways, and brought to repentance" (Art. XVI). Excommunicated apostates are to be "avoided" or shunned; all social fellowship with them must be broken, even in eating and drinking. Nevertheless "such moderation . . . (shall) be used that such shunning and reproof may not be conducive to his ruin but serviceable to his amendment. . . . We must not treat such offenders as enemies, but exhort them as brethren . . . to bring them to a knowledge of their sins and to repentance" (Art. XVII). On the Day of Judgment all men will be resurrected from the dead and appear before Christ where the saved will be severed from the lost, the righteous to enter into the unspeakable joys of eternal life, and the wicked to be damned to "eternal, hellish torments" (Art. XVIII).

The language of the Dordrecht Confession is simple and direct, not literary or philosophical in character; it abounds in Scriptural quotations, and follows the general emphases of evangelical Protestant thought except that it teaches the baptism of believers only, the washing of the saints' feet, earnest church discipline, the shunning of the excommunicated, the nonswearing of oaths, marriage within the same church, strict nonresistance, and in general places more emphasis on true Christianity involving being Christian and obeying Christ rather than merely holding to a correct system of doctrine.

A number of documents pertaining to the origin and adoption of the Dordrecht Confession of Faith are found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Archives (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 569, 583-92). The confession was printed as early as 1633 (Confessie ende Vredehandelinghe tot Dordrecht anno 1632, Haarlem, 1633), and was reprinted in Dutch at least three times, but only one copy of the 1633 edition is extant. A reprint is found in the introduction to the first part of T. J. van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (Amsterdam, 1660; also Dutch Martyrs' Mirror of 1685 and the German and English translations). Shortly after this it was printed together with other confessions, in Algemeene Belydenissen (Amsterdam, 1665, reprints 1700, 1739). The oldest German translation, by Tieleman Tielen van Sittert, appeared at Amsterdam in 1664, entitled Christliches Glaubensbekenntnus (reprints in Europe at Amsterdam, 1691; n.p., 1686, 1711, 1742; Basel, 1822; Zweibrücken, 1854; Mümpelgart, 1855; Regensburg, 1876). A French translation, entitled Confession de Foi Chrétienne, des Chrétiens sans défense, connus surtout dans les Pais-bas sous le Nom des Mennonites, appeared in 1771 (n.p.) reprinted in 1862 (n.p.). There are numerous editions in English. The oldest, The Christian Confession of the Faith of the Harmless Christians, in the Netherlands Known by the Name of Mennonists, was printed at Amsterdam in 1712 at the request of the Pennsylvania churches. It was reprinted in Philadelphia, Pa. (1727), New Market, Va. (1810), Niagara, Ont. (1811), Doylestown, Pa. (1844), West Chester, Pa. (1835), Skippackville, Pa. (1836), Elkhart, Ind. (1890, 1895, 1900, 1906, 1914, 1917, 1925, and in numerous combinations). See also S. F. Dorfbrunner, Leonhard, one of the most successful of the evangelists of the South German Anabaptists in the Reformation period. All that is known of him is based on the statements of various persons he baptized when they were subjected to torture after his death. At his trial in 1528 he confessed that he had been ordained as a priest in Bamberg in 1524, and had received his title of imperial knight from a chapter of that order in Weissenburg in Middle Franconia (Nicoladoni, 205). His was a gifted and notable personality.

He joined the Anabaptists in the spring of 1527; he was baptized in Styria (Upper Austria) by Hans Hut (q.v.) and at once named as an evangelist and sent out with three others, Jerome Hermann (q.v.) of Mansee, Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.), and Jakob Portner, who was still the chaplain in the castle at Styria. Dorfbrunner went in the direction of Salzburg and Munich, participated in the Martyr Synod in Augsburg, which was led by Hans Denk (q.v.), on Aug. 20, 1527, and was here appointed to do evangelistic work in Austria with Hänslin Mittermeier of Ingolstadt, especially in the city of Linz, where after the destruction of the Styrian church a new congregation had formed, which became the center of Anabaptism in the region of the Ens. But Dorfbrunner apparently did not reach his destination; if he did, he was there only a few days. There is no mention of his work in Linz.

From the end of September he worked in Augsburg, the Anabaptist congregation there having been robbed of its leaders at the instigation of the Lutheran clergy between Aug. 25 and Sept. 19, 1527, when Jakob Dachser, Hans Hut, Jakob Gross, Siegmund Salminger, and many other members were arrested. Disregarding the risks, Dorfbrunner took charge of the church and very soon won new adherents, performing the first baptism before the end of September. By the end of the year he had baptized about 100 persons in Augsburg (q.v.) alone, the majority of whom remained true to their faith in spite of pressure by the authorities; there were among them a number of women who were seized at the Easter service in 1528 and cruelly mistreated, as Elisabeth Hegenmiller, whose tongue was cut out, and Anna Benedikt, whose cheeks were burned through on order of the council and who was then expelled from the city. In January 1528 Dorfbrunner apparently wished to visit the congregation at Linz; he was seized at Passau and died at the stake. Dorfbrunner must be considered one of the most successful pioneers of the Anabaptist movement in South Germany and Austria. In the very brief period of his ministry he is reported to have baptized about 3,000 converts. Hege.

Dörksen, Jakob Johann, a Mennonite Brethren elder, born in Rudnerweide, Molotschna, South Russia, June 18, 1853. In his sixteenth year he moved to Rosenort where he was baptized a year later. In 1873 he was married to Aganetha Rempel of Rosenort. In 1885 they emigrated to Memrik and settled in the village of Nordheim. Here he was ordained to the ministry on Sept. 8, 1885, for the Mennonite Brethren congregation at Kotlyarevka, and served until 1905, when he was called to Terek, where he was ordained to the office of elder by Elder Hermann A. Neufeld. In 1912 he moved back to Memrik, where he died Aug. 29, 1930. Mrs. F. I.

Dornseiffen, Hoite Godert, a Dutch Mennonite minister, b. Jan. 25, 1841, at Heerenveen, Dutch province of Friesland, d. Jan. 3, 1922, at Heerenveen. On Nov. 3, 1867, he preached his first sermon for the congregation of Terhorne in Friesland, where he lived and worked until his retirement in 1902.

In giving religious instruction to the children of 14 to 16 years, he noticed that many of them, the children of bargemen, could not read or write. He gave his attention to this problem. He established a fund to teach the bargemen's children in his own community, and beginning in 1882 he and his brother-in-law, H. Rutgers, extended the service to all of Friesland. There is now a permanent fund, supported by an annual government grant and many private donations. This example has been followed by the entire country. For thirty-five years Dornseiffen worked with pleasure and devotion, until his death in April 1918. The cross of the Knights of Orange-Nassau, which the queen bestowed upon him on the occasion of her visit to Friesland in 1905, is a worthy recognition of his services. In the School Fund he had erected a permanent monument to himself. (ML I, 469.) E.M. tC.

Dornum, Ulrich von, of the castle of Oldersum (q.v.) near Emden, Friesland, Germany, was an aggressive promoter of the Reformation, supporting Edzard I (q.v.) and Enno I (q.v.). His estate became a refuge for a wide range of persecuted reformers, such as Karlstadt (q.v.), who was given the privilege of publicly proclaiming his views from the pulpit, Melchior Rinck, and Menno Simons. Ulrich von Dornum was first influenced by Luther, but through Karlstadt he turned to the Swiss and Strasbourg reformers with Anabaptist leanings. He was in touch with Erasmus and Capito, and Sebastian Franck wrote a letter to his followers. Ulrich personally wrote a report on a disputation at Oldersum between Dr. Laurenz, a Jacobite of Groningen, and Jürgen Aportanus, an evangelical minister of Emden, East Friesland, which was published in Wittenberg (1523; sec. ed. Groningen, 1614; German translation by Ohling, 1955).

To what degree Menno and his followers were protected through the intervention of Ulrich von Dornum, as tradition records, cannot be fully ascertained because of lack of sources. Dr. Ohling states that he was "close to the Anabaptist movement but did not join it publicly as his descendants did." Ulrich von Dornum (b. ca. 1465) died in 1536, the year during which Menno Simons came to Oldersum for the first time. It is possible that the two met. Ulrich's daughter Essa married the Anabaptist Johan Gerdsema (Gersema), and the youngest is also said to have married an Anabaptist. C.K.

Dorothea Pieters, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr of Dordrecht, was drowned April 25, 1534, together with Marytgen Huig Cranen (q.v.). The place of execution probably is The Hague. Dorothea had joined a group of Anabaptists who were planning to go to Münster (q.v.), but were arrested at Bergklooster (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 745; Mellink, Wederdopers, 191 f., 229.) vdZ.

Dorrance (Kan.) Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Russel County, a member of the Southern District Conference, was organized on Oct. 24, 1913, with 30 members, under the leadership of the elders John Foth and M. M. Just. The first meetinghouse was built in 1913 and dedicated Oct. 26, 1913. By 1924 the membership had grown to 63. In later years, however, some moved away, so that the 1950 membership was down to 32. The first minister was Peter Wiens. Others have been J. B. Reh, Hermann P. Dyck, Elmo Warkentine, and E. C. Ollenburger. In 1954 the membership was 52, with G. Warkentin as pastor. P.C.H.

Dorsch, Jörg, of Wiebelsheim, an Anabaptist at whose home on June 11, 1528, about eleven Anabaptists of Munich and Augsburg met with a clothnapper from Upper Bavaria who preached to them. When they no longer felt safe there, Dorsch took them to a place of concealment in the Wiebelsheim woods, where they preached for people who came to them from Hohenegg and Windsheim. He was captured in the latter half of 1530 in Creglingen, and declared that he had never heard that the Anabaptists were opposed to government or had their wives in common. NEFF.

Doubs, a department in eastern France on the Swiss border. It was formed from the province of Franche Comté. In 1816 most of the county of Montbéliard was added to it, which was ceded by Prince Eugene of Württemberg to France in 1796. Count Leopold Eberhard of Montbéliard and Württemberg had accepted Mennonite refugees from Switzerland and Alsace in the first half of the 18th century as renters on his numerous farms. Until the present there has been sporadic immigration. In the southwest part of Doubs, which was not a part of the county of Montbéliard, the intolerance of the French kings prevented any Mennonite settlement.

Their proximity to the Swiss border and ties of relationship enabled the Mennonites here to keep the German language for a long time in the French environment. In religious respects they also had the advantage of living among a Lutheran population. The French language was not used in religious services until the 20th century.

Mennonites in the department of the Doubs formed the two congregations of Montbéliard (q.v.) and Seigne (q.v.). At the beginning of the present century the latter had decreased to a few families because members moved away, some into Switzerland and Alsace (see Courgenay). Montbéliard is thus today the only Mennonite church in the department of Doubs. (ML I, 470.) P.S.

Doucher, Susanna (Ducher), a member of the Augsburg (q.v.) Anabaptist congregation, wife of the Augsburg sculptor Adolf Doucher (Bode in Jahrbuch der pr. Kunstsammlungen, 1887, No. 1; "Zur Augsburger Kunstgesch.," in Ztscht des hist. Vereins für Schwaben und Neuburg, 1887, 95). She and her sister Maxencia Wisinger were baptized by a preacher named Thomas (probably Thomas Waldhausen) in the house of the lacemaker Huber. In their house in the Easter week of 1528 during the absence of her husband the last large meeting was held before the violent suppression of the Augsburg Anabaptists. This meeting was surprised, and the council had all those present who could not escape, eighty-eight persons, arrested. Whereas in Augsburg those who permitted Anabaptist meetings to be held in their homes had their cheeks burned through with irons, Susanna Doucher as an expectant mother escaped this inhuman treatment, but was expelled from the city. What became of her is not known. HEGE.

Douglas-Moultrie counties, Ill., Amish Mennonite settlement is located in the east-central part of the state. The first Amish residents, coming from Pennsylvania, settled in the community in 1865. Additional settlers, coming from Iowa, Ohio, and perhaps other states, increased the size of the church so that it was divided into two districts in 1888. By 1952 the Old Order Amish of the community were divided into eight church districts, which had a membership of 702. In addition a Conservative Amish Mennonite congregation, organized in 1945, had 45 members in 1952. The Mennonite Church in Arthur, begun in 1936 by dissatisfied members of the Old Order church, had 230 members in 1952. Douwe Eeuwouts, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, the father of five small children, was seized at Leeuwarden on Jan. 3, 1570 (van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, has erroneously 1571), and put into a dungeon. He steadfastly confessed his faith before the bishop who examined him repeatedly under torture. After months in a dungeon he joyfully suffered death by drowning on Oct. 12, 1571. When he was led to the execution place he sang a hymn, "Ic arm Schaepken aen groen heyde, waer sal ic henen gaen." This sentence was passed by a clergyman, the Catholic bishop of Leeuwarden, rather than by a secular judge as was customary. Douwe is the author of a song beginning, "Ich mach wel droevich singen in desen ellendigen tijt." It is found in an extremely rare booklet, Sommige Belijdingen . . . van Reytse Aysesz (ca. 1577), a copy of which is found in the Library of the Society for Dutch Letters at Leiden. NEFF, vdZ.

Douwe Schoenmaker (Shoemaker), a Dutch Anabaptist leader. Of his activity nothing is known but the fact that at Witmarsum, Friesland, he baptized Griet, the wife of Rein Edes, who was a sister of Menno Simons' wife. Douwe was a Münsterite (q.v.), and Griet, troubled because she had been baptized by a revolutionary preacher, asked first Menno Simons and then Leenaert Bouwens to baptize her again. But both these elders refused to do so. (BRN VII, 236; K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, 5, 42, 190; DB 1917, 119, No. 102.) vdZ.

He was a student at the Mennonite seminary and the university in Amsterdam, 1865-71, and was a man of thorough scholarship. He was pastor of the congregations at Borne, 1871-74; De Rijp, 1874-87; Bolsward, 1887-92; and Almelo, 1892-1911. He was the author of the important work, Socinianen en Doopsgezinden, Doops-

Douwes, Cornelis, a preacher of the Mennonite congregation (Jan Jacobsz group) on the Dutch island of Terschelling (q.v.) in the first decades of the 18th century. His grandson with the same name (b. 1712 at Terschelling, d. 1773 at Amsterdam) was director of the Algemeen Zeemanscollegie (School of Navigation) at Amsterdam. He was a man of great learning whose arithmetical theories in the field of nautical science were generally adopted and operative until the 19th century. VDZ.

Dowie, John Alexander (1847-1907), once a Congregational minister, born at Edinburgh, Scotland, pastor in Australia to 1878, who established the International Divine Healing Association at Melbourne in 1882, but moved to the United States in 1888. In 1893 he transferred to Chicago, in 1896 established the Christian Catholic Apostolic Church in Zion, and in 1901 founded Zion City on the shore of Lake Michigan, 42 miles north of Chicago. Here he enjoyed immense power and influence, both through his professed "healing miracles" and his magnetic personality, and received large gifts from his followers. Unfortunately a number of Mennonites from central Illinois, including some of considerable wealth, were drawn into the ranks of his followers. He was deposed from his office as "general overseer" in 1905 and died in 1907. H.S.B.

Downey Civilian Public Service Camp No. 67 was a soil conservation camp under the Mennonite Central Committee, located near Downey, in southeastern Idaho. The camp was opened in November 1942, when Camp Henry was transferred to Downey, and closed in February 1946. The work consisted primarily of the construction and improvement of irrigation systems and of emergency farm labor. Several side camps were operated by No. 67.

Doyer, a Dutch Mennonite family of Zwolle, province of Overijssel. They are said to stem from thatchers, who immigrated from France. The first member of this family found in the Netherlands was Antoni Doyer, b. about 1580 and d. before 1642 in Zwolle, who was a member of the Mennonite Church. His son Anthoni (1614-56) was married to Saartjè Crane, a daughter of Assuerus Crane, a Flemish Mennonite immigrant who may have been related to the great Dutch poet Joost van den Vondel, whose mother (Mennonite) was also called Sara Kranen.

His descendants at first were rietmakers, i.e., they were thatchers or worked in reeds or cane. In the course of time they became businessmen (linen, wood, tea), while a number of them in the 18th and 19th centuries were distillers, well-to-do stock dealers, or bankers. In the 19th and 20th centuries some were state-officials.

A number of the Doyer family have gone into the ministry. First of all was Assuerus Doyer (q.v.), son of the linen merchant Antoni Doyer. Two sons of Assuerus were also Mennonite ministers, Matthys, b. at Crefeld 1790, d. at Velp 1859, who served the congregation of den Hoorn on the island of Texel 1824-48, and Abraham, b. Zwolle 1794, d. Amsterdam 1851, serving successively at Joure 1818-23, Nijmegen 1823-28, and Amsterdam 1828-51.

Anthony Doyer, b. Amsterdam 1787, d. Leiden 1853, who was a son of the distiller Thomas Doyer (brother of Pastor Assuerus Doyer mentioned before) and Sara Fijnje (sister of Pastor Wybo Fijnje, q.v.), served the churches of Nijmegen 1810-18 and Leiden 1818-53.

A descendant of this family too is Miss Sara Elisabeth Doyer, b. Zuidbroek, 1897, pastor of the churches of Wageningen 1923-26, Rottevale 1926-43, Warga 1943-46, and since 1946 serving at Witmarsum-Pingjum-Makkum. Many members of this family also served as deacons at Zwolle, Leiden, Amsterdam, and other congregations. (Ned. Patriciaat XXX, 1944, 36-38; DB passim, see Index.)

Doyer, Assuerus, the son of Antoni Doyer and Tanneken Schimmelpenning, b. Dec. 13, 1758, at Zwolle, studied at the Mennonite seminary in Amsterdam 1778-83, then at the university of Halle, taking his doctor's degree under Prof. Wolff. After a period in Zwolle he studied under Prof. Hesselink at Amsterdam. In 1787 he was called to Cleve as pastor and in the following year to Crefeld. In 1793 he resigned and lived with his father-in-law Matthijs van Maurik on a small estate near Zwolle. In 1794 the Zwolle congregation asked him to assist their sick pastor Thomas Menalda and in 1799 he became Menalda's successor. In 1833 he sought to retire, but the church gave him an assistant, Lambertus ten Cate Coster, with whom he worked until 1836. He was an opponent of religious liberalism, which was prevalent at that time in Holland, and maintained active contact with the revival movement known as the Reveil (q.v.). He died on March 21, 1838, trusting, as he confessed, not in the perishable good that he had done, but in the mercy of his Saviour and Redeemer.

Doyer was characterized by great zeal, purity, and eagerness to learn, and occupied himself all his life in a study of the Bible. For many years he was vice-president of the board of directors of the Mennonite seminary in Amsterdam. In 1787 he married Katharina van Maurik (d. 1804) and in 1805 Magdalena Teune (d. 1836). The following books came from his pen: Specimen philosophicum de duello (Halle, 1786); Leerrede ter aanprijzing van de Koepok-inenting (Zwolle, 1808); Brieven over de aanbidding van Jezus Christus (Zwolle, 1911); Hulde aan Joannes Chrysostomus (Zwolle, 1815); Twee Leerredenen over het lijden van onzen Heiland (Zwolle, 1817); Leerrede ter viering van het derde eeuwfeest der Hervorming (Zwolle, 1817); Invallende gedachten (Zwolle, 1825); Vraagboek over de Wet der Tien geboden, het Gebed des Heeren en de Twaalf Artikelen des geloofs (Zwolle, 1825); Bijdrage ter instandhouding en bevordering van godsdienstige plechtigheden bij de Gemeenten der Doopsgezinden (Zwolle, 1825); Redevoering ter aanprijzing van het begraven der lijken buiten de steden (Zwolle, 1826); Vertaling en uitlegging van den Eersten brief van den Apostel Petrus (Zwolle, 1827); Vertaling van den Eersten brief van den Apostel Johannes, met Aanmerkingen (Zwolle, 1829); Schriftuurlijk Vraagboek voor kinderen (Zwolle, 1831); Verhandeling over den zelfmoord (Vaderlandsche Letteroefeningen, 1827). Doyer, Thomas, a Dutch Mennonite missionary, b. 1823 at Zwolle, the son of the Mennonite minister Assuerus Doyer (q.v.), first studied architecture. In England his contacts with the Wesleyan Church and his work in Sunday school inspired him for missions. In 1854 he was accepted by the Dutch Mennonite Mission Board for training. In December 1857 he sailed for Java. Here he founded a new mission field at West Java, at Pijaminka, district of Batavia, which through the warm faith and the great love of this very capable missionary soon promised abundant fruit. But in August 1861 Doyer fell ill because of too much exertion and hardship. He died Nov. 21, 1861, on the ocean en route to the Netherlands. Doyer was unmarried. (*Jaarverslagen Dg. Doylestown. A town of 5,000 in southeastern Pennsylvania and county seat of Bucks County; originally it was known as Doyle's Tavern, but by the time of the Revolutionary War, Doyle's Town. The Mennonite Church known as Doylestown is located a mile northwest of the city and has a membership of 260. The first building, made of logs, was erected about 1775, displaced by stone in 1808, enlarged in 1840, razed in 1900 and replaced by a new stone structure. The Mennonite settlement lies west and northwest of the city, but a considerable number of Mennonites also live in the city itself. There are a number of Mennonites operating stores in Doylestown, as well as a cabinet shop and building firms (building contractors). The church building stands in what is now Doylestown Township, but prior to 1818 this plot was a part of New Britain Township and the congregation was then known as New Britain rather than Doylestown. (J. C. Wenger, Hist. of the Menn. of the Franconia Conf., Telford, Pa., 1938, 192-99.) J.C.W.

Doylestown Mennonite Church, located northwest of Doylestown, Pa., is affiliated with the Franconia Conference (MC). Land for the building was bought in 1772, and the first building, a log structure, was erected about three or four years later. This log church building was displaced by a stone structure in 1808, which in turn was enlarged in 1840. In 1900 this enlarged stone building was razed and in its place the present building was erected. Prior to 1806 the services were conducted by the ministers in the Deep Run-"Perkasie" (Blooming Glen) - "New Britain" (Doylestown) circuit, but in 1806 a resident minister was ordained, John Kephart, a Revolutionary War soldier who had married a Mennonite girl and joined the congregation. He was followed by the following ministers: Jacob Kulp (who moved to Ohio in 1831), Abraham Godshalk, John K. Gross, David L. Gehman, Bishop A. O. Histand, Mahlon Gross, Bishop Joseph L. Gross, and Silas Graybill. The membership of the congregation (1954) is 260. The congregation has been one of the more progressive bodies in the Franconia Conference, having inaugurated evening services in 1906, sewing circle work in 1908, Bible instruction meetings (Bible conferences) in 1909, Sunday-school meetings in 1914, and young people's Bible meetings in 1915. The congregation also established an outpost known as Trevose Heights. (J. C. Wenger, Hist. of the Menn. of the Franconia Conf., Telford, Pa., 192-99.) J.C.W.

Drachten en Ureterp, a Mennonite congregation in the eastern part of the Dutch province of Friesland, about 15 miles southeast of Leeuwarden and 14 miles northeast of Heerenveen. The congregation, which formerly belonged to the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites, was apparently founded in the first part of the 17th century, when Drachten arose as a peat-cutting center. After the peat had been removed, the soil was suited to farming. The earliest account of a Mennonite congregation here is of 1645, though the congregation may have been older. In February 1645 a meeting was held in the home of Jan Wibbes, a shoemaker. From the beginning the congregation was closely connected with the Mennonites of near-by Ureterp (q.v.), who were farmers, and Ureterp should perhaps be considered as the oldest kernel of the congregation. As Drachten grew, more Mennonites moved to Drachten, and about 1690 a meetinghouse was built at Drachten. The membership then (1695) was 82.

Of its history little is known. Its members were mostly peat-diggers, farmers, and a few sailors, who were absent from their home town from about February to November. For this reason, as in other towns of Friesland, where sailors formed a considerable part of the membership, like Grouw, Joure, and Warns, baptism and communion services were formerly not held just before Easter, as is common in Dutch congregations, but at the end of January or the first Sunday of February. It is not quite clear whether Drachten and Ureterp were two more or less independent congregations or only one. Since the beginning of the 18th century the name of the congregation has been "Drachten en Ureterp." It developed peacefully; in 1695 it joined the Mennonite conference of Friesland (Friesche Sociëteit), founded in that year. It soon became more progressive in church practices, abandoning the old Flemish practices like footwashing and silent prayer. In 1708 a small group of conservative members, wishing to maintain the old principles and practices, separated from the main body; this group, the membership of which in 1710 was only 14, was dissolved in 1787.

The main congregation grew steadily both in membership and spiritual strength. This was due in large part to the apt leadership of its lay preachers, including Albert Sybolts (1690-ca. 1745), his son Sybolt Alberts (1718-67), his grandson Albert Sybolts, Jr. (1744-79), and Sybolt (1780-1809) and Tjalling Arends (1789-1805). The descendants of Tjeerd Arends, a brother of Sybolt and Tjalling, are still numerous in the congregation (see Arends family).

In 1790 the old meetinghouse at Drachten was replaced by the present church; an organ was acquired in 1857. Until 1808 the congregation was served by untrained preachers. Then it obtained a minister who had been educated at the Mennonite Seminary of Amsterdam, viz., Jan Plantinus, 1809-50. He was followed by F. Born 1850-54, H. A. van Gelder 1855-58, G. ten Cate 1858-83, S. F. van der Ploeg 1884-87, H. van Cleeff 1888-89, A. van der Wissel 1890-1903, J. Wuite 1904-12, M. van der Vegte, Jr., 1913-19, P. Vis 1920-26, M. A. Hijlkema 1926-35, J. E. Tuininga 1936-39, G. J. W. den Herder 1939-42, J. W. Sipkema 1942-47, and G. de Groot 1948-54. The membership numbered 82 in 1695, 142 in 1809, 265 in 1861, 220 in 1900, 223 in 1954.

Church activities include a Sunday school for children, Menniste Bouwers (youth group), young members' circle, ladies' circle, men's circle, Bible circle, ladies' choir; church services for youth in co-operation with the Reformed Church are regularly held in the Mennonite Church. P.V., vdZ.

Drechsel, Thomas, one of the "Zwickau Prophets," who at the beginning of the Reformation attracted much attention and were mistakenly called Anabaptists in many of the older histories. Little is known of Drechsel's life. When Nikolaus Storch (q.v.), who was to be given a hearing with 15 of his group at Zwickau, Dec. 16 and 17, 1521, before the assembled clergy and other dignitaries because of erroneous opinions on marriage and baptism, left the city before the hearing took place and betook himself to Wittenberg, Thomas Drechsel and Marcus Stübner joined him. At Wittenberg they talked to Philip Melanchthon (q.v.) on Dec. 27, and told him that at Zwickau several persons had been imprisoned on account of their views on the baptism of children. Their arguments proving the unscripturalness of infant baptism made a deep impression on Melanchthon, a young professor of theology; neither he nor his colleague Nikolaus Amsdorf (q.v.) was able to answer their argument based on Mark 16:16. Stübner said that in the light of some wonderful conversations with God, he would preach only what God commanded. On that very day (Dec. 27) Melanchthon wrote to Elector Frederick of Saxony concerning this visit and events in Zwickau, expressing a concern that God's Spirit should not be suppressed and, on the other hand, that Satan should not take them unawares.

Amsdorf, who did not feel capable of replying to the visitors from Zwickau, avoided meeting them, but on Dec. 28 also wrote a letter to the elector, suggesting that they be countered only with reasonable and Scriptural arguments, for rebellion and revolt might follow violent suppression. Meanwhile the Zwickau men sought adherents in the city, Storch relating his wonderful visions and dreams in the homes of the craftsmen, Stübner dealing more with the students and professors, and Drechsel remaining somewhat in the background. Stübner made a lasting impression on Martin Cellarius (q.v.), who at the time did not share the views of the other theologians on baptism.

The elector and Martin Luther, who had at once been informed of the presence of these men, were more reserved in judgment. To Luther the divine conversations of which they boasted seemed somewhat dubious. But he was also impressed by their objections to infant baptism, and now took pains to defend it anew, thereby developing further his view that through the work of the Holy Spirit faith is created which accepts the grace of baptism; faith is infused into the child. Let anyone who disagrees prove the opposite.

When Luther came to Wittenberg Drechsel paid him a visit. Luther was very short with him and warned him against playing with God's name. Drechsel left with an angry threat that in six weeks Wittenberg would perish, exclaiming, "Whoever does not say what Luther wishes must be a fool!"

Nothing is known of Drechsel's further activity. There is no evidence that he acted on his doubts concerning infant baptism. Neither he nor his companions Storch and Stübner were baptized on the confession of their faith, nor did they baptize others thus. Hence the Zwickau Prophets cannot be called representatives of Anabaptism. (P. Wappler, Thomas Münzer und die Zwickauer Propheten, Zwikkau, 1908; ML I, 472 f.) Hege.

Dreherthalerhof, a large estate, once the location of a settlement of Huguenots and Mennonites, today a hamlet with about 300 inhabitants near Otterberg (q.v.) in the government district of Kaiserslautern (q.v.), has an interesting connection with the Mennonites of Crefeld and of the Palatinate. The Heydweiller family, which later became prominent in the Crefeld Mennonite Church, settled at Otterberg in 1579 as religious refugees from Antwerp. Duke Johann Casimir, who again made Calvinism the state religion, settled about 100 families here, most of whom were weavers. Extensive commerce reaching Holland and England made them prosperous. In agricultural lines their contribution consisted in introducing clover seed into the Palatinate, and deep plowing with an iron plowshare.

The descendants of the refugee Heydweiller also excelled in agriculture, but were more prominent as cloth merchants. His great-grandson Johann Heinrich H. (1657-1724) was a wool-weaver, merchant, and master glassmaker, and in 1697 erected a factory of his own on the Dreherthalerhof, which had been in the family as a hereditary lease since 1579. Franz Heinrich Heydweiller (1720-95) moved to Crefeld (q.v.), married Sibilla von der Leyen (1740), and built an independent knitting mill for the manufacture of silk stockings. In 1770 his brother Johann Valentin Heydweiller (b. 1734) followed him to Crefeld and also engaged in the manufacture of silk materials, businesses which contributed to the growth of Crefeld.

The Dreherthalerhof with more than 2,000 acres of land was then devoted to agriculture. Johann Jacob Heydweiller, the youngest brother of those who went to Crefeld, died in 1772 as the last of the family. The Palatine Mennonite census list of 1773 lists a family of seven, named Höfli (Höfle, Hefli), as living on the Dreherthalerhof. For his progressive methods Hans Höfli received several public awards in the 1770's from the Kurpfälzisch physikalisch-ökonomische Gesellschaft. E.H.C.

Drenthe, a province of the Netherlands (population 272,000). In the Reformation period Drenthe was passed by. Only at the border, as at Koevorden, there were some Anabaptists about 1540. After the Reformed faith had become the established faith in the 17th century, we find some Mennonites in the border towns of Havelte and Roderwolde. At the former place there is record of them until 1659, though there was no organized congregation. At Roderwolde there was a small congregation, which had a preacher and its own church in 1639. In 1657 the Synod of Drenthe complained that there were several unbaptized children there. The congregation probably died out soon afterward. It was located in the territory of the castle of Nienoord belonging to the Ewsum family, several of whom were Mennonites. In the 19th century two churches were established in Drenthe, Assen (q.v.) and Meppel (q.v.). In Emmen (q.v.), Hoogeveen (q.v.), and Roden (q.v.) there are Mennonite groups, and other Mennonites live scattered through the province. The number of Mennonites (souls) in Drenthe was 286 in 1859, 641 in 1899, 933 in 1947. K.V.

Dress (Costume). Distinctive religious costumes have been worn by custom or by requirement by many and varied groups in Christian history; for example, by religious and monastic orders (monks and nuns), clergy of various ranks, and Salvation Army workers. Special garments have been prescribed for certain important religious occasions such as baptism, confirmation, weddings, and funerals. However, none of these has been directly based on the Scriptures and none has had any bearing or influence on Mennonite distinctive costume or dress regulations.

It is difficult at times to determine, either in Europe or America, whether what seems to have been (and may still be) a distinctive Mennonite item of costume is the result of deliberate choice on religious grounds established and maintained by action of the church, or is purely a sociological phenomenon such as the retention of older forms of costume because of resistance to change. Much of the peculiarly Mennonite costume and clothing regulation is probably of the latter character. For most Mennonites, with the exception of Holland and the North German city congregations, have been rural, and rural people have been notorious for their resistance to change, particularly in earlier times before modern urban culture penetrated rural areas, as well as in current pockets of cultural isolation. Religious sanctions have, of course, often been imposed to maintain earlier costume forms, and at times even Biblical sanctions by specific verses have been claimed, sometimes with a faulty exegesis or application of quite irrelevant passages (e.g., "boots" from the German of Eph. 6:15, "an den Beinen gestiefelt," or the beard requirement from Lev. 19:27, "[not] mar the corners of thy beard," etc.). Actually, the customs or traditions originated first, to be reinforced later by church sanctions. In the most conservative American groups (Old Order Amish and Old Colony Mennonites) most of the clothing regulations have never been written out or specified. The power of custom suffices.

On the other hand, the doctrine of separation from the world, and the strong sense of the actual separation of the small group from the larger general society has worked powerfully (1) to produce distinctive nonworldly costume, and (2) to restrain the group from following the changes of costume and fashion in "the world" about them. This, reinforced by the instinctive spirit of withdrawal, humility, and even inferiority resulting from persecution, besides a very real poverty in many cases, and a strong teaching against pride and for simplicity, has often furnished deep religious motivation for distinctive (though not necessarily uniform) costume. Distinctive and plain garb has been characteristic of many earnest Christian groups past and present, not only of Mennonites, and many such have resisted the changing fashions of the society in which they lived, which fashions were often not only extreme or unhealthful, but also immodest or expensive. Designers and manufacturers of fashionable costume have themselves stated that fashions are deliberately changed to increase sales, and have even been designed to emphasize sex.

The strongly patriarchal character of the more conservative Mennonite groups may also contribute to the emphasis upon controlled costume. The elders and ministers may have such a strong sense of domination as shepherds over their flocks that they consciously or unconsciously seek for outward signs of submission which are most readily furnished by uniform, conservative, distinctive items of costume and drab and dark colors. The emphasis upon submission as one of the chief virtues desired in members may well be an index to the psychology of costume in such a patriarchal or near-patriarchal type of church life.

Another principle affecting some Mennonite costume has been that of sex distinction in attire. (Deut. 22:5, "The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garment.") Although society in general has observed sex distinction in clothing, yet Mennonites have often been more conservative than the rest of society on this point, particularly in recent times when many women are wearing slacks or shorts.

In America plainness of attire was long characteristic of numerous "sects" in Eastern Pennsylvania and adjacent areas, who were often grouped together as "the plain people." This category, which once included Quakers, Moravians, Schwenckfelders, and Brethren or Dunkards as well, now includes only Mennonites, Amish, and Brethren in Christ.

It seems probable that the Quaker costume imported from England in the 17th century, when the Quakers were the governing class in Pennsylvania, and when they were a nonresistant, strict-living, nonworldly group, had considerable influence on the costume of the other "plain sects," who were all of German origin, and were all both nonresistant and strict-living. The later gradual but complete loss of plain attire by some of the "plain" people, and dilution in the practice by others, may be due in part to a loss of the sense of "separation from the world" accompanying cultural and religious assimilation. Sometimes the process of accommodation to prevailing styles was aided by the introduction of cheap factory-made clothing and the loss of the practice of weaving and clothing construction at home. On the other hand, the concomitant loss of distinctive doctrines such as nonresistance along with the loss of distinctive costume (nonconformity in dress) may point to spiritual decline or change as a significant factor in the change of costume.

Every item of men's and women's clothing has been involved at some time in Mennonite history, or in some Mennonite group, in the matter of a distinctive Mennonite costume, either as prohibited or prescribed in one form or pattern or another. A mere enumeration results in an enormous list. For most of these, special articles will be found in this Encyclopedia. Only a few summary notes can be given here. Some of the costume prescriptions have been purely traditional or customary and unwritten, while others have been put into specific rules by congregations or conferences. Disciplinary action has usually followed violation of the regulations, whether written or not. On the other hand, slow changes have usually modified the traditional practices or rules without direct action.

The following is a summary list of costume traditions or regulations which have been applied at one time or another in history in one or another Mennonite group or area. This list is probably not exhaustive and refers primarily to practices among the most conservative North American groups such as Old Order Amish and Old Colony groups, but also in part to the large Mennonite Church (MC) group and related groups, as well as to the more conservative Russian Mennonite groups in Canada and Mexico. Details of costume prescriptions among the earlier European Mennonites, particularly in Holland and Switzerland, have not been available. Headdress: for women, kerchiefs or bonnets have been required, and hats forbidden or a specific type of broad beaver or straw hat required; for men requirements have been black hats, broad brim, without crease in crown, or with a flat crown, or caps instead of hats. Hairdressing: for women, bobbed hair has been forbidden, a center part required; for men, short cut hair has been forbidden. Overcoats: for women coats have been taboo in favor of shawls, or only half-length coats allowed; for men, long overcoats with capes have been required. Pants: for men knee breeches or broadfall type (sailor type) have been required. Dresses: a prescribed cut (cape dress) has been required, and unfigured cloth of solid color with full-length sleeves, and the dress quite long. Aprons have been required for women, or for wives of ministers alone. Coats for men: collarless, divided tail or frock coat have been required. Fasteners: for men and women buttons have been forbidden, hooks and eyes required for men, pins for women. Corsets have been forbidden. Stockings for women: silk forbidden, black color required, anklets forbidden. Neckties for men forbidden, or required to be bow ties instead of four-in-hand. Suspenders for men have been forbidden in whole or in part. Shoes: buckle, lace, and button shoes have been required or forbidden, boots required for preachers. Shrouds: white has been required. Wedding dress: floor length and white color have been forbidden. Color: bright or light colors have been forbidden for all items of costume from hats to shoes, both men and women, and black or gray required. Clothing material: silk has been forbidden, and home-woven cloth required. Homemade clothes have been required rather than "store" clothes.

Interestingly often the minister (and his wife) has been required (by custom or regulation) to be more conservative than the group as a whole, as a result of which, unintentionally, a distinctive clerical garb has developed in a brotherhood which has strictly opposed clericalism. Sometimes this has meant for the minister a long black frock coat, in other cases a clerical coat much like the state church Protestant or Roman Catholic attire. Sometimes (in Europe, in Holland and North Germany) ministers and members of church boards are required to wear high hats and frock coats to church services. Sometimes boots have been required. Among certain conservative Manitoba groups the preacher is even required to continue to wear the coat he was ordained in.

Wedding costumes have often been fixed. Among the most conservative Manitoba groups brides must wear black. In some groups the floor-length wedding gown is forbidden. In some groups (e.g., Franconia Conference, M.C.) the dead must still be buried in white shrouds, while black mourning garments are forbidden.

In the Old Testament only priests were required to wear a religious costume, although Jewish men were required to wear garments with a fringe or tassel of blue as a reminder that they belonged to the Lord (Num. 15:37-40). The New Testament does not prescribe any form of garb or external dress symbol for Christians. But it gives a number of warnings against external adornment such as worldly styles of hairdressing, and the wearing of gold, pearls, and costly clothing (I Tim. 2:9, 10; I Pet. 3:3, 4), and it indicates that Christian women are not to shear off their hair which was given them by God for a "covering" (I Cor. 11:6, 15). It gives a few hints as to how not to dress, and warns about undue concern for providing food and clothing (in Matt. 5 a situation of poverty).

Anabaptist Costume. Many, though not all, of the early Anabaptists were drawn from the common people and evidently continued to wear the conventional clothing of the common people. There is no evidence to show that the early Anabaptists created any uniform garb for the members of the church. Neither the ministers nor the laity wore any distinguishable attire, as numerous incidents in the Martyrs' Mirror indicate. The Concept of Cologne of 1591 (q.v.) states that it is impossible to prescribe for each individual what he shall wear, but requires simplicity of attire. The Anabaptists took seriously the principle of simplicity of life and the avoidance of the ostentation, display, and luxury of the rich. Menno Simons made a vigorous protest against conformity to the world in attire (Complete Works I, 144), but did not demand a special garb for the brotherhood.

In the course of time the Anabaptists became recognizable at sight by their refusal to carry any kind of arms, and by their plainness of dress: no jewelry, lace, etc., were worn. This plainness tended to develop into a sort of standard garb. For as new modes of dress appeared the Anabaptists clung to the older forms, sometimes adapting them over the years, and refusing to keep up with the ever-changing styles—which T. J. van Braght likened to the changes of the phases of the moon (Mart. Mir. E 10). Consequently the Anabaptists early began to make some specific regulations on clothing. For instance, the Strasbourg Discipline (q.v.) of 1568 included the following: "Tailors and seamstresses shall hold to the plain and simple style and shall make nothing at all for pride's sake. Brethren and sisters shall stay by the present form of our regulation concerning apparel and make nothing for pride's sake" (MQR I, 1927, 65). This confirms the testimony of Johannes Kessler (q.v.) concerning the Swiss Brethren in 1525: "They shun costly clothing, and despise expensive food and drink, clothe themselves with coarse cloth, (and) cover their heads with broad felt hats. Their entire manner of life is completely humble. They bear no weapon, neither sword nor dagger, but only a short breadknife . . ." (Sabbata, 147 f.). Sebastian Franck (q.v.), perhaps in irony, wrote that the Anabaptists had a ruling on how many pleats the apron must have. By 1600 there were instances in South Germany of Anabaptists being recognized by their clothing (Bossert, . . . Württemberg I, 691, 741, 806, 881). But the Swiss and South German Mennonites never seem to have developed any specific religious garb; they remained simple Christians avoiding the luxury and ostentation of the rich. When Jakob Amann (q.v.) attempted to introduce avoidance (q.v.) and stricter clothing regulations into the church, he caused the division of 1693, after which his followers (the Amish) practiced extensive regulation of attire, maintaining until the present, in America, specific rules about headdress, hooks and eyes (instead of buttons), cut and color for coats and dresses, homemade instead of factory-made clothing, etc.

European Mennonite Costume. The Dutch Mennonites, even more than the Swiss, did not adopt a special religious garb. When Dutch believers were apprehended it was not by means of identifiable peculiar clothing. As early as 1550 a Dutch Mennonite martyr told the bystanders at his execution that if he could name 20 fellow believers in the surrounding crowd, he would not do so: this would indicate that they wore no specific garb. In 1572 a brother pressed his way through a crowd to encourage a man who was to be martyred, and then merged again with the crowd before the authorities could seize him: this again points to the fact that the Mennonites of Holland at that time wore no distinctive garb. This was even true of the preachers, for in 1565 a minister and part of his congregation were caught by the authorities: the officers could not tell which one was the minister, so the latter voluntarily stepped forward and confessed his identity (these illustrations are taken from van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror; documentation in Wenger, Attire, 22).

By the late 17th century Heinrich Ludolf Bentheim could still say of the Dutch Mennonites: "Above all, they insist on modesty in respect to clothing" (Horsch, Mennonites, 251), though he also states that some of the Amsterdam Mennonites were beginning to wear wigs and other worldly articles. That there was some clothing regulation among the Dutch Mennonites in the 18th century is evident from the testimony of S. F. Rues, who visited the Netherlands specifically to study the Mennonites there, and whose Aufrichtige Nachrichten (Sincere Reports) about them was published in 1743. Rues divided the Dutch Mennonites of that day into two general classes—the stricter groups, which he called "Fine," and the more lenient and tolerant groups, which he called "Coarse." The former prescribed the cut of men's coats and women's dresses, required that clothing be black, prohibited the use of shoelaces or buttons, and required the men to wear beards. On the whole, the stricter rules were followed more closely by the country congregations than in the cities (see summary in Smith, 211-15). Rues also reports (48) a bishop pushing back the cap on the head of a woman candidate for baptism.

In the course of time, such dress regulations were discontinued by the Dutch Mennonites, although the Balk congregation retained some of them until the middle of the 19th century (ML I, 113). Although the rural congregations generally dress more plainly and simply than do those of urban character, no prescribed garb remains among any European Mennonites.

The history of the costume requirements and traditions in Northwest Germany (Emden, Hamburg), Danzig, and West and East Prussia, was much like that of Holland, since these groups had not only largely Dutch antecedents but also continuing cultural and religious ties with the Dutch Mennonites. The Mennonites who emigrated from the Danzig area to South Russia in turn continued the traditions of their homeland. As rural people the latter remained quite conservative in their costume, and retained much of the simplicity of earlier times. Until the 20th century somber colors and conservative cut characterized the costume of both men and women, and the women wore only kerchiefs on the head, or a special dark hood. No uniform costume was required although the power of tradition tended toward uniformity and resulted in an apparent uniform simplicity. The remoteness of the Russian Mennonite settlements from the major metropolitan centers of culture and commerce reduced the influence of changing fashions considerably.

The Mennonites of South Germany, Switzerland, and France, being largely rural and conservative, long retained the emphasis on simplicity in costume which characterized their earlier Anabaptist forebears, but in recent generations have adapted themselves generally to prevailing styles, though with a certain conservatism. No uniform dress regulations were ever developed, although the women, especially in Baden, wore a black fascinator-type veil instead of hats, both for general public wear and church wear until into the early 20th century.

American Mennonite Costume. It is reported that in 1727 "a large number of Germans, peculiar in their dress . . ." had settled on the Pequea, a Lancaster County stream (Rupp, 194). But in what the peculiarities consisted is not made clear. The earliest known description of the costume of the 18th-century Mennonite immigrants to Pennsylvania (from the Palatinate), written by Redmond Conyngham in 1830 ("History of the Mennonites and Aymenists," ms.), but seemingly based upon earlier contemporary newspaper reports, whose authenticity cannot be checked, reads as follows: "The long beards of the men and the short petticoats of the females just covering the knee . . . . The men wore long red caps on their heads; the women had neither bonnets, hats, nor caps, but merely a string passing around the head to keep the hair from the face. The dress both of the female and the male was domestic, quite plain, and of coarse material, after an old fashion of their own." I. D. Rupp, a reliable historian of Lancaster Co., Pa., says of the Mennonites in 1844, "They are distinguished above all others for their plainness of dress." L. J. Heatwole (b. 1852), a Mennonite bishop and historian in Virginia, describes the Mennonite costume of that area in earlier days (Christian Monitor, 1922, 592-93) as follows: "The early habits and customs of dress among pioneer Mennonites in Virginia were strictly in keeping with separation from the popular styles of their time. It is known that the men held to the universal color of drab for all their clothing. . . . The breeches however barely reached to the knees. . . . The women wore the plain bodice, from which draped the linsey gown in comfortable folds to the feet, while the arms and shoulders were covered with a woolen home-made kerchief. The head was usually covered with a kerchief of home-made linen that was drawn close about the neck with corners tied under the chin."

It is evident that the American Mennonites of the colonial period (and on into the 19th century) dressed plainly, but there is no evidence that they then had a special uniform cut of coat for the men, or a peculiar form of headdress or costume for the women. Their difference from "the world" consisted of regulations proscribing luxuries and articles worn for display, such as lace collars, etc. Morgan Edwards (Baptists, 95) claimed in 1770 that the Mennonites were so strict in dress regulations that some had been expelled for wearing buckle shoes or outside coat pockets, but it is impossible to evaluate his report for accuracy. Since they lived in close proximity to the Quakers, who at this time had a distinctive garb for men and women which was very similar to that in time adopted by the Mennonites, it is quite possible that the Mennonites were influenced by them.

When long trousers for men came into general use, some of the older men, especially the ministers, clung to the old-fashioned knee breeches. The last minister of the Franconia Conference (MC) known to wear them died in 1834 (Wenger, Franconia, 286). Eventually all Pennsylvania Mennonites adopted long trousers, but they did not all adopt the modern sack coat with its short tail and lapels; the preachers and some of the laymen retained the use of the colonial plain-collared coat without turndown collar or lapels, and the ministers of the Mennonite Church (MC) in the Franconia, Lancaster, and Washington-Franklin conferences still wear the frock-tailed colonial coat.

Mennonite (MC) women in the Eastern United States and (some areas) elsewhere also wear a bonnet which used to be called a Quaker bonnet, the name being an indication of its probable origin. (The Pennsylvania Quakers adopted the bonnet around the year 1800; see Gummère, passim.) They also commonly wear what is called a "cape" over the shoulders, an article of dress which is probably an adaptation from the shawls which were current in the early decades of the 19th century. In the (MC) areas west of Pennsylvania fewer men wear the "plain coat," and the bonnet is no longer universally worn; in some areas only the older women cling to its use. But the members as a whole oppose the use of jewelry, insist on simplicity of attire, avoid the use of cosmetics, etc. The women generally wear their hair long. Furthermore, in worship the women wear a veil or cap, basing this on I Cor. 11:2-16. In this group and related conservative groups the wedding ring is forbidden.

The position and practice of the Old Order Mennonites and of the Conservative A.M. Church is similar to that of the Mennonite Church (MC), although generally more conservative and more uniform.

The Old Order Amish and the Hutterian Brethren require beards (q.v.) of the men, a definite garb by both men and women, the use of hooks and eyes in place of buttons, the worship veil for the women, etc. In the East Amish men wear a flat, black, very broad-brimmed hat. The Hutterite women wear a black polka-dot kerchief as a worship veil, which they also wear at all times. The Old Order Amish women wear a white cap for a prayer veiling, which they also have their daughters wear from infancy, and wear shawls instead of coats, a holdover from the earlier universal women's costume.

The Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, requires the beard for men, not as a symbol of nonconformity (they have no garb), but because they believe this requirement to be a part of the permanent law of God. The women wear a black kerchief head-covering during worship.

The Evangelical Mennonites of Canada (Kleine Gemeinde) have no special garb, but stress general simplicity of dress, and the women wear a black kerchief head-covering during worship.

Other Mennonite bodies such as the General Conference Mennonite Church, the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, the Evangelical Mennonite Church, the Mennonite Brethren, and the United Missionary Church, have been traditionally conservative in dress and opposed to outward display in clothing, but in recent decades in America have tended more and more to follow the general conventions of society so that nonconformity in attire has largely become a dead letter; the members of these groups are not particularly distinguishable from non-Mennonites by their appearance. In these groups there are no specific church regulations proscribing the use of jewelry, requiring a worship veil, or forbidding the cutting of women's hair, and wedding rings are commonly worn.

The Old Colony, Sommerfelder, Rudnerweide, Bergtal, and Chortitz Mennonites of Manitoba and elsewhere are conservative groups in which the older traditions are strong, but in which there is little interpretation of cultural patterns in terms of specific Biblical teachings. The dress of members of the Old Colony, Sommerfelder, or Chortitz groups as worn to church services has the appearance somewhat of a prescribed uniform garb; the Chortitz men, for example, wear hooks and eyes. Some of the groups, Sommerfelder and Rudnerweide, e.g., now permit the wearing of the wedding ring. Short hair for women would be frowned on in all these groups though it would not be made a test of membership in most of them. In many of the groups (such as Old Colony, Sommerfelder, and Chortitz) it is traditional for the women to wear a black kerchief (head shawl) during worship, but the average member would not associate this with any Biblical teaching on the veilng of women.

A review of the history of costume in the Mennonite congregations of Europe and America reveals that among the original Anabaptists and the stricter bodies of Mennonites in later centuries there was a strong sense of estrangement from "the world" which resulted in a deliberate nonconformity to the generally accepted cultural patterns of the current society. This involved the rejection of jewelry and anything worn for the display of wealth. In the course of time, especially among the Dutch Mennonites, this crystallized more or less into a garb in the stricter Mennonite groups. Eventually, however, much of the internal vigor of the European groups tended to disappear and the process of cultural accommodation continued until the whole concept of nonconformity to the world disappeared entirely and with it went usually not only nonconformity in dress but the practice of rejection of military service (q.v.) as well. In America the same processes have been at work, but some groups have withdrawn in reaction and settled into a formalism which tends to be devoid of spirituality; in these groups there is apt to be a feeling of contentment in being different in dress, etc., whether or not there is any inner spiritual life, evangelistic outreach, or program of missions and relief service to the needy of the world. Other groups have allowed the process of cultural accommodation to go on with little or no resistance, sincerely believing that Christianity does not consist in outward forms, but they have often tended to underestimate the power of the forces in contemporary society to mold the members of the brotherhood into the same types of character, belief, and practice, as are current in America in general. This has resulted in a loss of sense of unique mission as well as the partial surrender of basic Mennonite doctrines such as nonresistance. Groups of the first type, which lean toward formalism, have been labeled as "conservatives," and those of the second type, which tend to become more like American Protestants than the Mennonites have historically been, have been called "progressives." This leaves a third type (of which the largest group is the M.C.), the "moderates" (Smith, 744-46). These "moderates" constitute about two thirds of the entire Mennonite population of the Americas. They are attempting, though not always successfully, to maintain a vigorous inner sense of mission, and a voluntary simplicity of life which is applied even to their external appearance as described above. In this respect the "moderates" are seeking to have more of the type of spirituality which characterized their Anabaptist spiritual forebears with a truly Biblical separation unto God with its consequent nonconformity to the evil world about them, interpreting this nonconformity to apply to all areas of life. The progressives have a similar concern for spirituality, but do not usually apply the principle of nonconformity to the dress area. Neither of these two groups today attempts to maintain a uniform garb, except in so far as the Eastern wing of the moderate group still strictly requires a uniform garb for women, though not consistently for men.

The special ministerial garb which is today uniformly required in the Mennonite (MC) Church and the Conservative Amish in the 19th and 20th centuries, has no antecedent in earlier Mennonite-Anabaptist history. It is probably a survival from earlier practice when all male members wore the distinctive garb. The origin of the special ministerial garb among the Old Colony Mennonites is obscure, but the garb has become stiffly fixed in tradition, ministers wearing a special coat and boots to the services. There is no connection between any of the special types of American Mennonite ministerial garb and the clerical garb of Roman priests or high-church Protestant clergymen of various denominations. Nor have Mennonite ministers anywhere in the world ever worn a gown in the pulpit, except in Danzig, where some of the pastors wore the clerical gown with the white neckbands; Jacob Mannhardt wore a special square cap (biretta). In certain North German churches (e.g., Hamburg, Emden, Danzig, Crefeld) and commonly in Dutch churches, the ministers wore (and in part still wear) special high black hats, gloves, and frock coat to the Sunday services. Driedger (Driediger, Drüdger, Dridger, Driger), a Mennonite family name in the rural Flemish congregations of West Prussia, numbering 7 families in 1776 and 105 persons in 1935. Members of the family emigrated to Russia and subsequently to America. Jacob N. Driediger and Nic. N. Driediger are Mennonite (GCM) ministers in Ontario. Among those bearing the family name were Peter Driedger (1831-1921), minister of the Heubuden congregation, main editor of a two-volume collection of sermons, and originator of the Heubuden church library; and Abraham Driedger (1868-1945), son of the former, influential in conference activities, promoter of church music and historical research, who revised the West Prussian Choralbuch for its second edition, and wrote "Die Entwicklung des Gemeindegesanges in unseren westpreussischen Gemeinden" (Menn. Bl., 1931, 30-32), and the article Heubuden and others in Mennonitisches Lexikon. G.R.

Driscoll Mennonite Church, located in Burleigh Co., N.D., had a membership in 1911 of 19 and a Sunday-school enrollment of 40. Particulars are lacking and the conference connection unknown.

Dronrijp, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) 1568-82 baptized eight persons. There was never a congregation at Dronrijp; the newly baptized persons may have joined the congregation of near-by Blessum. vdZ.

Drooge, Alexander Hubertus van, a Dutch Mennonite pastor, b. Oct. 4, 1872, at Bakkeveen, Friesland, where his father was a schoolteacher, d. June 22, 1942, at Warga, Friesland, where he lived after retiring. He was educated at the university of Amsterdam and the Amsterdam Mennonite Theological Seminary and served two congregations: Holwerd-Blija, 1897-98; and Deventer, 1898-1939. He was a very serious and modest man, with a warm heart for his congregations. From 1934 to 1939 he was president of the Algemene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit (General Conference of the Dutch Mennonites).

In this capacity he preached the closing sermon of the Third World Conference at Witmarsum, Friesland, on July 3, 1936 (Der allgemeine Kongress der Mennoniten, Karlsruhe, n.d., 18-20, 168, 173-83). He also served for a number of years as president of the Elspeet Doopsgezind Broederschapshuis. He was also active in general liberal Protestantism: in 1911-21 he was a member of the board of the Nederlandsche Protestantenbond and 1920-21 its president. He was especially interested in religious education; for the Mennonites of Holland he projected a booklet for baptismal candidates. (DJ 1943, 18-35, with portrait.) vdZ.

Drug, a Mennonite church (MC) in India: see Durg.

Dry River Union Church was located one mile northwest of Lily, in Ashby District, Rockingham Co., Va. It was originally sponsored by the Methodist Episcopal, German Baptist, and Mennonite (MC) denominations. After the old early 19th century log building was destroyed by fire on Sept. 22, 1912, the church was rebuilt the same year under the auspices of the United Brethren, Methodist, and Mennonite churches. The Mennonites held their last service here in the 1930's. In 1942 the trustees sold the building. Two unkept graveyards separated by the main highway are all that remain. H.A.B.

Dublin (Pa.) Union Church was built in 1869 by the combined effort of Lutherans, Reformed, and Mennonites (MC). The church, now known as St. Luke's, is used alternately by Lutheran and Reformed groups. Mennonites have never conducted services here, although many of the present members are of Mennonite background. Q.L.

Dubnitz, a market town with (1900) about 1,800 Slavic inhabitants near Trentchin in Hungary, center of the former Trentchin government, where Hutterian Brethren, expelled from Stigonitz (q.v.) in Moravia in 1622, found refuge. The feudal lord, Count Kaspar Illéshazi, permitted them to establish a Bruderhof a half hour below Trentchin on the Soblahof (q.v.), which they, however, had to abandon in 1688 on account of continued plundering. Dubrovna, a town in the Russian province of Mogilev, the stopping place for the winter for the first Mennonites coming from Danzig in 1788 on their way to South Russia. Two hundred and twenty-eight families were cared for here by the Russian government during the winter of 1788-89 through Baron von Staal. The delegate Jakob Höppner was with the group but there was no elder or minister to care for the spiritual needs. It was here that the first attempts were made to elect a spiritual leader with the help of the mother congregations in Danzig.

Early in the spring of 1789 Höppner and the delegates went on to Kremenchug on the Dnieper in the Poltava region to make arrangements for their settlement. Here they met Potemkin, who informed them that the land promised them near Berislav (q.v.) in the province of Kherson was not available and that they should proceed to the area where the Chortitza River flows into the Dnieper. Four weeks after the arrival of the delegates the total Dubrovna group arrived in Kremenchug by wagon and by barges on the Dnieper, and from Kremenchug proceeded to Chortitza (q.v.) for settlement. Duchess Mennonite Church (MC), approximately 120 miles east of Calgary, Alta., is a member of the Alberta-Saskatchewan Conference. Duchess is located in a prosperous irrigation district. The first Mennonite to settle in the Duchess district was S. B. Ramer, who came in 1915. J. H. Brubaker and family came in 1916, others following later. In April 1917 the congregation was organized by Bishop N. B. Stauffer. Services were held in the schoolhouse in Duchess until 1923. A church was dedicated March 9, 1924. The Duchess congregation, while of Pennsylvania origin, nevertheless has members from various other places, including some from Duchess itself.

In 1948 the church was enlarged. Its membership in 1954 was 100. Ordained men who have served the congregation are J. S. Ramer, H. B. Ramer, C. J. Ramer, Paul Martin, Chris Snyder, Eli Kauffman, David Ramer, and Marlin Brubaker. Prominent family names in the congregation are Ramer, Martin, Brubaker, Burkholder, Friesen, and Torkelson. In 1954 the bishop was Clarence Ramer, the ministers H. B. Ramer and Paul Martin. E.S.

Dück (Dick), David J., large estate owner and benefactor, b. June 29, 1860, at Rosenhof (Brodsky), Melitopol district, South Russia; attended the Gnadenfeld Zentralschule, became a member of the Petershagen Mennonite Church, married Katharina Schmidt Oct. 27, 1887, and lived at Steinbach until 1894, at which time he took over the large estate "Apanlee," on which he lived until his death on Oct. 16, 1919. The net income of this estate amounted at times to 100,000 rubles. Dück was above all a model farmer who greatly improved the breed of cattle and horses among the Mennonites. He emphasized the significance of rural life and was opposed to the tendencies toward capitalistic speculation in industry. In 1904-10 he was president of the Mennonite forestry service camps (q.v.) in Russia, looking after the spiritual, cultural, and economic welfare of the young men in alternative service. He was one of the founders and benefactors of the Alexanderkrone Zentralschule (q.v.) and the Halbstadt Kommerzschule (q.v.), and member of the boards of these schools. He was the benefactor of most of the Mennonite welfare organizations and institutions.

Dück also sponsored teachers' and Bible conferences, which were held at the estate Apanlee, Steinbach, and Yushanlee and were attended by all Mennonite groups of the various settlements. He was a founder of a Mennonite tract society, of which he was the chairman 1904-14, which distributed tracts in the Russian and German languages. When he was imprisoned during the Revolution friends solicited seven thousand signatures among the neighboring Russian population requesting his release, evidence of his popularity with the peasants. On Oct. 16, 1919, he and his wife were killed by armed bandits who came to rob them of their possessions. C.K.

Dück, Gerhard Gerhard (1863-1949), a Russian Mennonite minister, was born Sept. 9, 1863, in Schönau, a Mennonite village in South Russia, the oldest son of Gerhard Gerhard Dück (1835-73), a tailor, and Anna Kliewer Dück (1840-82). He attended the Zentralschule in Orloff for four years, and then taught the village school in Fürstenwerder. The date and place of his baptism are not known. He married Justina Penner (b. Feb. 19, 1866), and became the teacher in Schardau, where their only child, Elizabeth, was born (Sept. 2, 1891). In 1894 they moved to Zagradovka. He taught a village school in Nikolaifeld until 1898. Then the family moved to Ufa and took up farming. On June 30, 1902, he was ordained to the ministry by Johann Schartner of Alexanderwohl. In 1910 he resigned from this office, sold his farm, and in 1911 moved to Slavgorod, in the Barnaul settlement in Siberia. His wife died there in the same year. In the following year he married Helena Toews (b. Dec. 26, 1883), a deaconess in Bethania (q.v.). This marriage was blessed with three sons and two daughters, all of whom are still in Russia. In 1923 Dück and his wife moved to the home of their daughter Elizabeth in Goloshevo, Ufa, and in 1924 they went on to Blumstein in South Russia. Though his daughter Elizabeth and his brother and sister succeeded in emigrating to Canada, he was unable to do so on account of eye trouble. For a number of years they lived in a Russian village in Samara. On Feb. 27, 1949, nearly deaf and blind, he died. E.E.

Dueck, John D. (1856-1918), a son of John and Agatha (Dück) Dueck, was born on Aug. 3, 1856, at Muntau, Russia. His mother died when he was 18 weeks old. His father then married Margaretha Reimer. He was reared in Russia, where he received a fair education. Immigrating to America in 1875, he settled near Steinbach, Man. He married Margaretha Hiebert on Oct. 7, 1877. Nine sons and six daughters were born to them. He was converted in his early years, and baptized on Dec. 25, 1881, joining the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite (q.v.). He was ordained to the ministry on Jan. 6, 1884. Soon after the ordination he moved to Gretna, Man., to serve a small congregation. In 1887 he moved to Hillsboro, Kan., and served the Alexanderfeld congregation until his death. Much of his time was spent in serving the church at large. In the early years he was appointed to serve different churches which did not have a residing minister, and was called to Oklahoma, Missouri, Ohio, Michigan, and Manitoba for special services. He possessed a very amiable character. In his preaching he was emotional and blessed with an exceptional ability to unfold the love of God. He served as associate manager of the Botschafter der Wahrheit (q.v.) from the time it was founded in 1897 until 1900, when he became the editor and in that capacity served another 12 years. At the age of 61 years he died in his home near Hillsboro, Kan., and was interred in the Alexanderfeld cemetery. P.G.H.

Duerksen, John F. (1863-1932), a pioneer educator in the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America, was born in Alexanderthal, Molotschna Mennonite settlement, South Russia, July 25, 1863, the oldest of the seven children of Jacob J. and Katharina Funk Duerksen. After receiving an elementary education in the village, John attended the Zentralschule at Gnadenfeld and the teacher-training school at Neu-Halbstadt. Then he entered the teaching profession and taught in the Mennonite schools for three years.

At the age of 15 he was converted and on April 30, 1879, joined the M.B. Church. He early felt called to definite Christian service and at the age of 21 dedicated himself for such service.

In 1887 he emigrated to America and came to his parents in Kansas, who had preceded him three years earlier. Here he taught school near Lehigh, Kan., 1887-90, and in a Mennonite Vereinsschule near Buhler, Kan., 1890-99.

In 1899 the Mennonite Brethren Conference decided to affiliate with the Brethren College at McPherson, Kan., and to establish a department of its own in that institution. John F. Duerksen was principal of this educational effort for six years, during which he was instrumental in training many of the early leaders of the M.B. Church. When this German department school at McPherson was discontinued in 1905, the Duerksen family moved to Corn, Okla., where he established the Corn Academy and Bible School, serving as its principal for 11 years. He was ordained to the ministry in 1919, and served as assistant pastor of the Corn M.B. Church for 16 years in addition to his work in education.

Duerksen was a very active conference worker, serving repeatedly on the secretarial staff and was the secretary of the General Conference, 1919-21. He was editor of the Sunday-school quarterly of the M.B. Church for many years.

Duerksen married Katharina Warkentin on Jan. 9, 1890. To this union seven children were born. After the death of his first wife, he married Mrs. Gertrude Warkentin on Sept. 24, 1924. He died May 1, 1932, and was interred in the Corn M.B. cemetery. J.H.L.

Dühren, a village in the Sinsheim area of the Heidelberg district in Baden, Germany, where a Mennonite church came into being in the second half of the 17th century. The founders were refugees from the Swiss canton of Bern. In spite of the Palatine decree of tolerance of 1664, the religious activities of the Mennonites were still subject to arbitrary Palatine officials. This often led to conflict between the government and the noblemen on whose estates the Swiss exiles were settled. A register of 53 Mennonites arrested at a meeting in Steinfurt in 1662 includes the names of Rudolf Hagi and Martin Maylin of Dühren.

The refugees arrived in a pitiable state; e.g., in Dühren the family of the forty-year-old Ulrich

Widmer with three children aged three years to six weeks. To alleviate their dire poverty the Dutch Mennonites gave them brotherly aid in 1672. The adjacent farms were already in Mennonite hands. On the Birkenauerhof were Ulrich Rieck, the widow Magdalena Neglee, and B. Mengel (Arch. Amst., No. 1196). The earliest list of members extant is dated 1731 (Müller, Berner Täufer, 210) and includes 13 families. Only two of the names, Bletscher and Sauter, on the list are still found in the congregation. Some families emigrated to America, while others moved in from neighboring churches. In 1858 most of the members dissolved their connections with the Mennonite Badischer Verband and became followers of Michael Hahn (q.v.), but without leaving the Mennonite Church. In 1921 the congregation numbered 37 souls, living in seven towns, and most of them farming. They held their services three times a month in Dühren and in the neighboring Ursenbacherhof (called Bleihof), hence was called Ursenbacherhof-Dühren. It appeared for the last time in 1941 in the directory of the Gemeinde-Kalender with a membership of 50 plus 7 unbaptized children. In 1945 the group joined the Sinsheim (q.v.) Mennonite congregation. (ML I, 485.) HEGE.

Dühren (von Dühren, von Düren, von Dihren, Dieren), van, one of the oldest of the Dutch Mennonite families who immigrated into Prussia. Most of the van Dührens lived in Danzig and were numerous in the Mennonite congregation there; formerly there were also some in Königsberg and Elbing. Hendrik van Dühren served as elder of the Frisian church on Neugarten in Danzig, 1676-94; his oldest son Albrecht succeeded him until 1696, and after his untimely death the younger son Hendrik (or Heinrich) served, 1701-46. During the eldership of this Hendrik van Dühren a number of difficulties arose in the congregation, mostly caused, or at least aggravated, by his obstinacy and extreme conservatism. In 1739 he refused to ordain Johan Donner, who had been chosen as elder. Finally two elders from Holland, Abraham Koenen (q.v.) and Jacob Ouwejans (q.v.), in 1740-41 succeeded in settling the quarrels. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1624, 1628; II, Nos. 2637-75; II, 2, Nos. 742, 751.) Other members of the family have served as preachers (e.g., Isaac van Dühren, q.v.) and on the council. The name did not spread beyond Berlin and Prussia. Heinrich van Dühren (d. 1945) was president of the Berlin Mennonite Church and a judge in the Prussian courts. (ML I, 485.) H.G.M., VDZ.

Dühren, Isaac van, b. 1725, a Mennonite dyer and weaver in Danzig, served as preacher from 1775 until his death in 1800. In 1782 he wrote a book, Geschichte der Märtyrer oder kurze historische Nachricht von den Verfolgungen der Mennonisten (Königsberg, 1787). The book has three chapters: (a) Verfolgung der Mennonisten von den Catholiken; (b) id. von den Lutheranern; (c) id. von den Reformirten, which is followed by a supplement Von der Kindertaufe. The first part (a) is taken from van Braght, Martyrs' Mirror, and gives information on 102 Dutch martyrs; the sources of (b) and (c) are J. Mathesius 5e Predigt vom Leben Lutheri; Gottfried Arnold (q.v.), Unparteiische Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie; Gerber, Historie der Wiedergebohrenen; Crespin's (q.v.) martyrbook, and others. The book by van Dühren, which contains 169 pages, was printed without the name of the author, but a copy belonging to the Amsterdam Mennonite Library (Catalogus Amst., 16) contains a note that Isaac van Dühren, minister of the congregation of the Frisian Mennonites at Neugarten near Danzig, is the author. The book was reprinted in 1863 at Stuttgart (Bibliographie, 259-60) and at Winnipeg in 1939. Concerning his development and inner life see his correspondence with Elder Cornelius Regehr in Heubuden (reprinted in Menn. Bl., 1885, 3 and 14 ff.). H.G.M., VDZ.

Duisburg, a city in the Ruhr district, Rhine Province, Germany. There is evidence of some participation of Duisburgers in the Münsterite affair and its sequels 1534-38. No actual peaceful Anabaptist congregation was ever established in Duisburg in the 16th century, although as late as 1560 Duke Wilhelm of Cleve called the noted Catholic scholar George Cassander to Duisburg to convert the Anabaptists there. There may have been some continuing traces of Anabaptism in Duisburg throughout the 17th century, but it was apparently not until the 18th century that a regular Mennonite congregation existed. When there was no minister, the baptisms were apparently conducted in the Crefeld Church, whose church book records the names of 17 persons from Duisburg baptized. Risler (Menn. Geschichtsbl., 1951) reports 20 families definitely identifiable as Mennonites in the early 18th century. Most of these were refugees from persecution elsewhere. Evidence shows that there was at this time considerable interconnection between Duisburg and Crefeld, Cleve, Goch, and Emmerich, the other Mennonite congregations along the Lower Rhine.

The first evidence of an organized congregation is the record in the church book of the Mennonite congregation at Goch, under date of Oct. 14, 1706, that Christian Kray was a preacher of the Duisburg Mennonite congregation.

According to the Naamlijst of 1731, which calls this town Doesburg, there was here a Mennonite congregation, which had no minister at that time but was served by the minister of Crefeld. In the Naamlijst of 1743 two preachers of Duisburg are mentioned, Johan Pryer and Gerhard Decker. In the Naamlijst of 1755 no mention is made of this congregation; the congregation must have died out between 1743 and 1755. In 1726 the widow of Pieter Andriessen of Duisburg requested financial support from the Amsterdam congregation. VDZ.

Dukhobors (Wrestlers with the Spirit), a Russian "Protestant" sect, probably an outgrowth of a dissident Khlysty group, which derived its peculiar doctrines from a number of sources, including heterodox Protestantism, Freemasonry, and Khlysty teaching. The sect arose in the village of Okhochee about 1755 and in the Russian province of Kharkov, and shortly thereafter in 1785 received its present name from the archbishop of Ekaterinoslav. In 1802 they were deported to the province of Taurida, where they adopted semi-communism. They were located as next neighbors to the Mennonites in the Molotschna colony in nine villages. In 1841 under pressure they settled further east in Transcaucasia, when they numbered about 4,000. In 1886 the group split. One part, under Peter Verigin's leadership, was much influenced by Count Leo Tolstoy and adopted complete nonresistance as well as rejection of private property.

In 1898-99 the Verigin group of 7,400 migrated to western Canada with the strong financial aid of Count Tolstoy. Their anarchistic views and practices have resulted in frequent and prolonged conflicts with the Canadian state. Only with great difficulty and gradually have they arrived at a modus vivendi with the state. The total of about 17,000 have broken up into several parties, one of whom, the moderate independent Dukhobors, has drawn near to the United Church in Canada. Another group has continued to follow its anarchistic and communistic practices and has come into frequent conflict with the authorities. Those Dukhobors who remained in Russia survived in a few places and are now affiliated with the Pentecostal Christians.

The Dukhobors are unitarian and pantheistic in theology, denying a personal transcendental deity. They attach very little importance to the Bible, and claim that their only source of doctrine is the living tradition of the sect, supposedly originally derived from Christ Himself.

The superficial similarity in a few points to the Anabaptists, Mennonites, or Quakers, has led some to assert a genetic connection with these groups, though without any proof at all. There is no ground whatsoever for the confusion which has occasionally arisen in the popular mind, both in Europe and America, with the Mennonites. The only contact with Mennonites was the period 1802-41 when they lived in the Molotschna, where Johann Cornies (q.v.) rendered them considerable assistance. H.S.B.

Dülken in the Brüggen district of the duchy of Jülich had some Anabaptists in the first half of the 17th century, whose names are listed in the registers of 1638 and 1652. Among them was the father of Jan Floh, who came to Crefeld (q.v.) from Gladbach in 1694. They had been expelled in 1652. (State archives of Düsseldorf, Jülich-Berg II, 252.) W.N.

Dülmen, a town located southwest of the city of Münster in Westphalia, Germany, in which Bernhard Rothmann introduced the Reformation in 1533. On Sept. 8, 1533, Bishop Franz of Waldeck had two preachers of this movement arrested. That the Anabaptist movement had also gained a foothold here and that a group survived after the collapse of the movement in Münster is indicated by the fact that even at the beginning of the 17th century, after the severe activity of the Counter Reformation, at least one Anabaptist is reported to have resided here. Duma. Long before the socialist movement, and then parallel with it, there were movements in Russia whose objective was a democratic free state. But not until the 20th century did the absolutism of the czars yield to the pressure of all strata of Russian society, and then only to a very limited degree, when (in 1905) Russia established a popular, although weak representation in government. Until the March Revolution of 1917 four Dumas tried, in the face of tremendous difficulties and handicaps, to undertake legislation.

The Mennonites had, of course, no representatives in the Duma elected specifically by them; nevertheless there were two Mennonite representatives who had their interest at heart and defended them. They were the landowners Abraham Bergmann (q.v.) of the province of Ekaterinoslav and Peter Schröder of the Crimea. The former was a member of both the third and fourth Dumas, the latter only of the last. Bergmann belonged to the Octobrist Party, whose aim it was to bring into actuality the October Manifesto (1905) granting a constitution, but which again and again turned to a reactionary course. Schröder was a member of the Cadets Party. Both representatives worked only in committees and used their influence especially in working out a liberal solution to religious freedom preparatory to passing a law on the question. Bergmann became a tragic victim of the Revolution of 1917.

In the elections for the new national assembly of 1917, the Mennonites tried hard to elect a representative, combining with the other German elements for this purpose, but failed in spite of their hard campaigning in the summer of 1917. (ML I, 485 f.) B.H.U.

Duncanus, Martinus (or Maerten Dunck), of Wormer, b. ca. 1506 at Kempen near Crefeld, a Catholic priest, who lived in the focus of the Anabaptist movement in Waterland in Holland in 1535. At least 57 persons in his village were persecuted, of whom 32 had taken part in the procession to Münster. He was one of the first Catholic opponents of Menno Simons. His book, Anabaptisticae haereseos confutatio (1549 at Antwerp), is one of the most violent ever published against the Dutch Anabaptists. He gave it to the city of Amsterdam and received as a gift from the mayors of the city the sum of 22.80 guilders (12 "Caroli-daalders"). As inquisitor of several persons baptized by Gillis van Aken (q.v.) he earned 5.70 florins in the same year. Later Duncanus was priest at Delft, deacon at The Hague, and from 1572-78 priest at Amsterdam. He died in Amersfoort in 1593. It is probable that he gave Simon Walrave information on a number of items mentioned in Walrave's Successio Anabaptistica (1603). In addition Duncanus wrote a less significant book, Van die Kinderdoop (Antwerp, 1593). When Amsterdam joined the party of William of Orange, Duncanus was one of the persons expelled from the city. Dunin-Borkowski, Stanislaus von (1864-1934), an Austrian Jesuit scholar, who made a very thorough scholarly research of the anti-Trinitarian writings of the 16th century prior to the coming of Socinianism. In this research he included also several Anabaptist writers (above all Pilgram Marpeck) whom he falsely classified as anti-Trinitarians. Since his scholarship is of the first rank, his studies have added to the confusion of the concept of the Anabaptists. He published (a) Quellenstudien zur Vorgeschichte der Unitarier des 16. Jahrhunderts, in 75 Jahre Stella Matutina (Feldkirch, Austria, 1931, 91-138) (b) Untersuchungen zum Schrifttum der Unitarier vor Faustus Sozzini, ibid. II (1931) 103-47 (on Pilgram Marpeck 110-12); (c) "Die Gruppierung der Anti-Trinitarier des 16. Jahrhunderts," in Scholastik VII (Bonn, 1932), dealing also with Adam Pastor (q.v.) and other Unitarians with Anabaptist leanings. Dunin-Borkowski's findings were extensively used by E. M. Wilbur, A History of Unitarianism (Harvard Press, 1946), and by Roland H. Bainton, "The Left Wing of the Reformation," Journal of Religion XXI (1941), where these early Anti-Trinitarians were misleadingly called Anabaptists. John C. Wenger in his study, "The Theology of Pilgram Marpeck," MQR XII (1938) 214-16, convincingly refutes the contentions of Dunin-Borkowski of Marpeck's alleged anti-Trinitarian leanings. R. Friedmann, "The Encounter of Anabaptists and Mennonites with Anti-Trinitarianism." MQR XXII (1948) 139 ff. (particularly 146), likewise analyzes the material, arriving at a more clear-cut ideological distinction. (For details see Anti-Trinitarianism.) R.F.

Dunkard, Dunker. This name, popularly used throughout the 19th century and into the 20th for the denomination now called Church of the Brethren (q.v.), is a corruption of Dunker, English for Tunker, a German word meaning "Dipper" or "Immerser," referring to the mode of baptism practiced by the group. The name is still used today by two minor conservative bodies deriving from the original body namely, Old Order Dunkards (q.v.), and Dunkard Brethren. The name Tunker (q.v.), once the official name for the Brethren in Christ in Ontario, has no doubt a common origin, since this group adopted immersion from the Church of the Brethren at the time of the former's founding in Pennsylvania in the 1770's. However, "Dunkard" has never correctly been used as a name for this group. H.S.B.

Dunnville Mennonite Church (OOM), located in Haldimand Co., Ont., had a membership of 18 in 1911. Particulars are lacking.

Durango (area 48,000 sq. mi., pop. 484,000 in 1940) is a state of northern Mexico directly to the south of the state of Chihuahua. The climate is generally dry and healthful and the rainfall very light in the eastern part. There are no rivers of any size in the state. The principal industry of the state is mining, although extensive cattle ranges are found on the higher elevations. The capital city is Durango (pop. 33,412 in 1940), which is located in the picturesque Guadiana Valley about 6,200 feet above sea level. It is an important mining and commercial center and is famous for the great mountain of iron that lies northwest of the city. Its manufacturing establishments include cotton and woolen mills, glass works, iron foundries, tanneries, flour mills, sugar refineries, and tobacco factories. It was founded in 1563.

An Old Colony Mennonite settlement with a population of 3,000 is located about 75 miles northwest of the city of Durango. (See Patos.) J.W.F.

Durango Mennonite Settlement was established in the state of that name in Mexico some 75 miles northwest of the city of Durango in 1924 by Old Colony Mennonites (q.v.) coming mostly from the Hague (Sask.) Mennonite settlement. Johann P. Wall (q.v.) and B. Goertzen, delegates who investigated Mexico for possible settlement, were instrumental in choosing this site instead of the one in the vicinity of Cuauhtemoc, Chihuahua. Thirty-five thousand acres of land were purchased through the mediation of Arturo J. Braniff from Juan L. Losoya for $7 per acre, on which 17 villages were established. In the years following additional land was bought as it was needed for landless families.

The settlement has its own elder, Peter P. Wiens, a civic leader called Oberschulze (q.v.), and other organizations characteristic of the Old Colony Mennonites. The economic development of the Durango settlement has been similar to that of the others in Mexico. During the last years they have experienced a setback because of the severe drought. In 1925 the population was 946, in 1949 it was 2,861, and in 1953 the total was 3,281. (See also Old Colony Mennonites and Mexico.) C.K.

Durg (English, Drug), a Mennonite (MC) congregation in Madhya Pradesh (formerly Central Provinces), India. It is situated on the Bengal-Nagpur railway 25 miles west-southwest of Raipur and about 50 miles northwest of Dhamtari. The center consists of a bungalow for the missionaries and living quarters for the Christian workers, and a well-constructed chapel.

Durg was founded by Methodist Episcopal missionaries before 1900, but because of their enforced retrenchment after World War I they asked the American Mennonite Mission to take over the Durg field, comprising about 2,000 square miles with a population of about 350,000. The members of the Christian community living in the town and adjacent villages were formerly Methodist, but soon after the work was taken over in 1935, they were reorganized into a Mennonite church.

In this area, because of the intense evangelistic program of the missionaries and their Indian workers, Hindus have accepted Christ and many more were open to the Gospel, although they were opposed by organized non-Christian forces. The congregation in 1954 numbered 157 members, besides about 50 children. J. Haider was the pastor. G.J.L.

Durgerdam, a small town near Amsterdam, in the Dutch province of North Holland, an Anabaptist center as early as 1534. Shortly after there must have been a congregation, of which the martyr Willem Jansz (q.v.), executed at Amsterdam on March 12, 1569, was a member. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) had baptized 11 persons here about 1565. Later the congregation joined the Waterlander Conference in North Holland. In 1675 the membership numbered 100. In 1687 the church burned down, but was rebuilt soon after. Continuously during the 18th century there was no minister and the membership decreased rapidly. In 1727, 1733, and 1736 the small congregation generously contributed to the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs to help the Prussian Mennonites. In 1817 the congregation was dissolved; an amount of 6,000 guilders which was the property of the church was turned over to the Waterlander (Rijper) Sociëteit. vdZ.

Durham Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located six miles northwest of Durham, Marion Co., Kan., a member of the Southern District M.B. Conference, was organized on Dec. 29, 1906, by a few families who had remained there after an unsuccessful attempt in 1885-90 to establish a church, known as the "Mennonite Brethren Group North of Lehigh." Jacob Kliewer and Henry Bergthold had served the earlier congregation as ministers. Because of poor soil and high land prices, the group broke up. The remaining families elected John A. Nickel as leader, who was succeeded by Abraham Pankratz at the time of the organization as a church in 1906. New families moved in and the membership of the church in 1911 was approximately 34. In 1934 the church was discontinued when members continued to move to neighboring Mennonite Brethren communities and to Texas and Oklahoma. I.G.N.

Dürkheim, Bad, a town (pop. ca. 8,000) in the Palatinate, Germany, until the French Revolution the residence of the counts of Leiningen-Hardenburg. Since the end of the Thirty Years' War Mennonites have been living in this region. A report by Michael Frey (Versuch einer geogr.-hist.-stat. Beschreibung des königlichen bayerischen Rheinkreises dermalen Pfalz, Part IV, Speyer, 1837) states that there were in the canton of Dürkheim in 1801, 159 Mennonites; in 1823, 284; and in 1834, 198. They lived in Dürkheim, Dackenheim, Erpolzheim, Freinsheim, Friedelsheim, St. Grethen, Röhrig, Hausen, Seebach, Herxheim, Leistadt, Ungstein-Pfeffingen, and Wachenheim. Emigration to America has been the principal cause of the decline in the Mennonite population (1922) to 74 souls: 48 in Friedelsheim, one in Gönnheim, 9 in Erpolzheim, 2 in Freinsheim, 11 in Dackenheim, and 3 in Dürkheim. All belong to the Friedelsheim (q.v.) congregation. ¶

On Oct. 15, 1949, the Mennonite Central Committee (q.v.) opened a Children's Home in the city, to provide relief for 40 undernourished children sent by public welfare organizations of cities of the region. Each group of children stays for three months to rebuild their health, and is then replaced by another similar group. The home was still operated in 1955, but with some government support. Dürksen, David Gerhard (1850-1910), an elder of the Mennonite Brethren Church in the Crimea. Not much is known of his childhood and early youth, except that he grew up in a Mennonite (not Mennonite Brethren) home. He did not have the opportunity for educational advancement in his youth; but since he was not interested in becoming a farmer, he studied independently to prepare himself for the teaching profession. He taught first in the village school of Margenau. By his use of modern methods of instruction, his excellent discipline, and his friendly relations with the pupils and their parents he set an example to his younger colleagues, who looked up to him as their leader.

Before long the Margenau Mennonite Church chose him as minister. About this time he underwent a deep spiritual experience, as a result of which his preaching differed from the customary sermon in content and manner. Instead of reading aloud to his congregation for an hour or more from the yellowed pages of the sermons used by the previous generations, he spoke freely and directly to his audience, reviving the religious life of the congregation and leading many to conversion. Though his innovations also evoked some hostility, he was one of the most sought-after speakers for special services and conferences among all the Mennonites of South Russia.

His type of piety brought him in close contact with the Rückenau Mennonite Brethren congregation; he felt at home in this circle. His desire to live only in accord with the Word of God, to build the church on the apostolic pattern, and the warm fraternal love he found in Rückenau must have influenced his decision to leave the Margenau congregation and unite with the Rückenau M.B. Church. At first there was some tension between the Mennonite Brethren and the Mennonites in consequence of this step, but his conciliatory manner and his obvious devotion and spiritual depth soon overcame this tension, and he was again invited to preach in Mennonite pulpits.

For a time Dürksen tried to do justice to both his teaching and preaching offices, but soon gave up his beloved school to devote himself entirely to preaching. He was appointed as traveling evangelist by the General Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church, serving in this capacity with outstanding success. He preached in nearly all of the Mennonite churches in both European and Asiatic Russia, in many M.B. churches of America, and also in West Prussia. He also took part on one occasion in the Blankenburg Alliance Conference (q.v.) at Blankenburg, Germany.

Dürksen was also an able writer. Unfortunately most of his powerful addresses were never put in writing, but whenever he found time he wrote for the Zionsbote (q.v.) and the Abreisskalender (q.v.), as well as other periodicals.

Dürksen's most successful field of service lay perhaps in his work on the Crimean Mennonite school board, of which he became a member soon after his ordination as elder. His wide experience and understanding of human nature did much to raise the standards of Mennonite education. The Zentralschule in Spat and Karassan and the Crimea Mennonite girls' school were the result of his influence.

Dürksen was ordained elder of the Spat M.B. Church (q.v.) in 1899. His duties as elder in the Crimea restricted his evangelistic tours more and more. The rise of Alliance groups, who sought to introduce open communion in the M.B. congregations, led to bitter struggles in the entire Mennonite Brethren group, which were at times waged by carnal methods. Dürksen was at first pacific, but gradually espoused the side of the proponents of closed communion, adopting also the violent methods used by both sides. In addition, he made a very unfortunate second marriage, which blighted the rest of his life, so that his rugged physical frame broke under the strain. After an illness of nine months he died, mourned by Mennonites of all branches, including those who had been his severest critics. (ML I, 493-95.)† J.K.

Durlach, a city near Karlsruhe, Baden, Germany, where an Anabaptist congregation was formed in the first years of the movement, which succeeded in maintaining itself for decades in spite of the severest persecution. It belonged to the branch known as Philipites, after their preacher Philip Plener (q.v.), who worked as an evangelist in this region in 1527-28 (Chr. Hege, Die Täufer in der Kurpfalz, Frankfurt, 1908, p. 60). Severe persecution by Margrave Philip (d. 1533), who in a mandate of Dec. 15, 1527, ordered the extermination of the Anabaptists, caused many to emigrate. Some must also have given their lives for their faith. The chronicles state that there were 12 executions in 1531.

Under Philip's successor Ernst (d. 1552), the progenitor of the Baden-Durlach line, the Anabaptists had more freedom. In the region of Jöhlingen two or three hundred sometimes met for worship. Some of the Anabaptists who had fled to Moravia a few years earlier wished to return to Durlach when persecution broke out in Moravia in 1535 and were seized en route at Passau on Sept. 15, 1535. Among them was Hans Steubner of Durlach, who had been baptized by Konrad Lemlin and whose wife Anna had been baptized by Hans Kellner at Haidlitzen (probably Heidelsheim near Bruchsal) (Wolkan, Lieder, 30). A later trial reveals that in 1543 Michael Jungmann was sheltered in Durlach, and Margarete, Bernhard Bierer's widow of Pfaffenheim, had moved there. In Königsbach, which at that time belonged to the Imperial Knights, there were also some Anabaptists, for whom Hans Schoch preached about 1555 (G. Bossert, Ztscht für die Gesch. des Oberrheins, 1905, 86). The Anabaptists around Maulbronn also found asylum here; Eberhard von Venningen received Hans Braunsbacher of Rudersberg in 1574 when he no longer felt safe in Freudenstein (Bossert, Supplements of Staats-Anzeiger für Württemberg, 1895, 271).

Under Margrave Karl II, 1553-77, who was only 24 when he assumed government, the Lutheran theologians called Jakob Andreae (q.v.) and Michael Diller (q.v.) from Württemberg and the Palatinate to introduce the Reformation. These men took a position at Worms in 1557 favoring ruthless extermination of the Anabaptists by means of dungeon and death, and very likely used their influence to root them out. The fact that from now on for over 150 years nothing more is heard about Anabaptists in the region leaves no doubt as to the success of their cruel effort.

Not until the beginning of the 18th century was the brotherhood tolerated in the country. Then the Mennonites exiled from Switzerland found refuge in the margravure of Baden-Durlach as well as the adjacent regions. Centers of the Durlach settlement were Hohenwettersbach and Königsbach. Toward the end of the 19th century several families moved into Durlach; other Mennonites were already living on leased farms near by, and together in 1901 they organized a congregation in Durlach, which the Mennonites in Karlsruhe as well as the Thomashof have also joined. The census of December 1910 showed 81 Mennonites living in the Durlach area; of these, 43 lived in Durlach (including 7 on the Lamprechtshof and 8 on the Rittnerthof), 33 in Königsbach (5 on the Johannistalerhof), and 8 in Hohenwettersbach. In 1954 the congregation had 109 members and 22 unbaptized children. The elders were Chr. Schnebele, Joh. Hodel, Martin Funck, Heinrich Bachmann; preachers were Heinrich Schneider, Theo Glück, Rudolf Bletscher. Durlach is now incorporated in the municipality of Karlsruhe. Its population is 18,000. Durr, John N. (1853-1934), the son of Jacob J. and Annie Johnson Durr, was born near Masontown, Fayette Co., Pa., Sept. 3, 1853, the fourth child in a family of six children. In the spring of 1855 the family moved across the Monongahela River into Greene County. On Feb. 17, 1876, he married Malissa Jane Steele of Masontown, who transferred her church membership from the Methodist Church to the Mennonite Church, in which church she remained active until her death, March 18, 1889. To this marriage were born six daughters: Annie Frances, Sara Elizabeth, Mary Magdalene, Hannah Malissa, Katie Mae, Laura Jane. These six daughters were married to two bishops, three ministers, and a deacon. The family moved back to Fayette County about 1880. In August 1898 he moved from Masontown to Martinsburg, Pa. On Sept. 22, 1898, he married Mary Susan Caufman of Chambersburg, Pa. One son, who died in infancy, was born to this marriage. His second wife died Jan. 1, 1929. On Dec. 30, 1931, he married Sarah B. Gsell Leidig at Lake Charles, La., where they lived until her death in 1932. From 1932 until his death he lived with his daughter Hannah (Mrs. N. E. Miller) of Springs, Pa.

Durr was baptized Nov. 18, 1871, and became a member of the Masontown Mennonite Church. His conversion took place at a series of revival meetings held at the Huston Schoolhouse by the Methodists during the fall of 1870. Following a three-week series of meetings in January 1872 he was ordained to the ministry (MC) on Feb. 5, 1872, by John F. Funk and Daniel Brenneman. On Nov. 26, 1873, he was ordained by lot to the office of bishop by Jacob N. Brubacher. He is the youngest ever ordained to these two offices (aged 19 and 20) in the Mennonite Church (MC) as far as records show.

John N. Durr served as bishop in the Mennonite Church from the time of his ordination until his death, a period of 61 years. During this time he served for various lengths of time as bishop of the following churches: Masontown, Rockton, Scottdale, Schellsburg, Altoona, Martinsburg (Morrison's Cove). His longest term was at Martinsburg, 1899-1931. He assisted in the organization of the Southwestern Pennsylvania Mennonite Conference and was elected as its first moderator, serving 1876-98. In the district conference he served on the following committees: Bible conference, missions, Sunday-school conference. He served as vice-president of the district conference mission board and was its representative on the local board of the Altoona Mennonite Mission 1918-34.

He served as representative from the Southwestern Pennsylvania District Conference on the General Conference Committee and was elected as moderator of this committee from its first meeting in 1896 and served also as moderator of the preliminary General Conference held in 1897.

He died Nov. 17, 1934, at Springs, and was buried in the Martinsburg Mennonite cemetery. E.D.Z.

Dürr, Martin, an Anabaptist of Augsburg, concerning whom nothing is known except that he wrote hymn No. 49 in the Ausbund, "O Herre Gott, in meiner Not, Kläglich ich zu Dir ruffe." (Wolkan, Lieder, 146; Wackernagel, Das deutsche Kirchenlied V, 1101; ML I, 496.) NEFF.

Dürsrüttilied, an Anabaptist hymn containing 21 quatrains, describes the seizure of a congregation of Anabaptists with their preacher, Uli Baumgartner, on the Dürsrütti in the Emmental (q.v.), Switzerland, in 1659. Most of the prisoners were, after prolonged imprisonment, taken to Holland. The song is found in Müller, Berner Täufer, 123-25. (ML I, 496.) NEFF.

Dusentschuer, Johann, a Münsterite Anabaptist, a goldsmith from Warendorf, Westphalia, Germany, played a significant role in the attempt to establish a "New Jerusalem" in Münster. Zurhorn reports "that he limped on one leg and when he came to Münster he was at first considered a fool, but soon the fool became a prophet." According to Brune he sent out 27 apostles to preach repentance and he himself is supposed to have proclaimed and anointed Jan von Leiden king of the "New Jerusalem." In October 1534, Dusentschuer was in a group that came to the city of Soest and preached repentance on the streets. They entered the city hall stating that the king of Zion had sent them to preach the Gospel of peace and repentance in Soest. When the burgomaster did not receive them, Dusentschuer threw his coat and a "peace penny" to his feet saying, "Since you are not willing to accept the peace, we are turning to the common people to reveal the will of the Father to them. Your blood be upon your head." They proceeded to the market preaching the same message. After their arrest, the Soest record reports, they stated that infant baptism was vain, that Christ had no human flesh, that the Lord's flesh and blood were not present in the Lord's Supper, and that they had all goods in common. On Oct. 21, 1543, they were beheaded. C.K.

Düsseldorf, a government district in the Rhine Province of Prussia, includes the former duchy of Cleve (q.v.) as well as parts of the duchies of Jülich (q.v.) and Berg, where the Anabaptist movement attained considerable strength in the 16th century. Large congregations maintained themselves in Gladbach and Cleve; the former died out in the 17th century, and the latter in the 19th, although there have always been several Mennonite families living in Cleve. Mennonites expelled from adjacent territories and towns gathered in Crefeld (q.v.) in the 17th century. They laid the foundation for the velvet and silk industry there, which soon acquired a leading position in Germany. Crefeld was the only modern Mennonite congregation in this district. When many Danzig refugees located in this area, a congregation of this group, called Bergisches Land (q.v.), was organized in 1948, and had a membership in 1952 of ca. 250 including children. Most of the members live in the district of Cologne. (ML I, 496.) HEGE.

Dutch Mennonite Mission Association (Doopsgezinde Vereniging tot Evangelieverbreiding, previously called Doopsgezinde Vereeniging tot Verbreiding des Evangelies in de Nederlandsche Overzeesche Bezittingen, i.e., Mennonite Association for the Spread of the Gospel in the Dutch Colonies), founded Oct. 21, 1847, as a separate organization, preceded however by the Dutch Section of the (English) Baptist Missionary Society 1821-47, whose officers (and most members) were Mennonites and took the initiative in setting up the new Mennonite missionary organization. Samuel Muller of the Mennonite seminary was the first president, having been president of the previous Dutch Section, whose entire treasury balance (8,000 guilders) was transferred to the new organization. An attempt (1849) to make the new organization a section of the Dutch Missionary Society of Rotterdam (founded 1797) failed because of the refusal of the Society to permit the nonpractice of infant baptism by the future Mennonite missionaries. This was a fortunate decision in that it permitted the Dutch Mennonites to enlist the support and co-operation of foreign Mennonites (German, Swiss, Russian) which would otherwise have been impossible, and which proved to be so very essential. The Missionary Association, because of the small interest in the congregations which was further hindered by the growth of modernism among the Dutch Mennonites, was from the beginning a private association, with a self-perpetuating board of directors. Besides the contributions of the Dutch Mennonites gifts were soon received from abroad, first from certain Mennonite congregations in Germany—Norden, and Neuwied, followed by Friedrichstadt, Heubuden, and Danzig, then Liebenau and Gnadenfeld in Russia (1854), and later by congregations in the Palatinate. Some contributions were received from the United States, especially from the General Conference Mennonites. (Kaufmann, 49, 67, 73, 98, 103-4, 165.) Associate members were later appointed to represent the German and Russian Mennonites who were supporting the work. Then in 1951 a larger European Mennonite Mission Committee was formed to co-ordinate the missionary interests of the various national mission committees (German, French, and Swiss), particularly with a view to the support of the work of the Dutch Association in Java and New Guinea, but the actual administration has always remained fully in the hands of the Dutch organization.

The first mission field to be opened was Java (q.v.), with P. Jansz (1820-1904, q.v.) going out in 1851 (first baptism of 5 converts in 1854) as a teacher. A second and third worker were also sent out with secular occupations, H. C. Klinkert (q.v.) in 1856 and Thomas Doyer (q.v.) in 1857. The first worker to go out as a formally (government-) approved missionary was N. Schuurmans in 1863. The four first missionaries were Dutch, but after the appointment of P. A. Jansz in 1878 (son of P. Jansz) no other missionaries were sent out from Holland to Java, the next three being Russian Mennonites. After World War I two South-German and one Swiss Mennonite (statistics as to wives were not available) plus two single women missionaries, daughters of a Russian Mennonite missionary, were the only missionaries sent out from Europe. The formal mission work came to an end in 1940 when the mission congregations were organized as an independent Javanese Mennonite Church. The Chinese Mennonite Church in Java, though arising out of contacts with the Dutch missionaries, was always independent. Since it was very difficult to find a way to spread the Gospel among the Mohammedan Javanese, who by strong religious and social traditions (adat) were very dependent on the dessah (village) communities (in 1877 the number of converts was only 77), P. Jansz suggested (1864) that special agricultural colonies be established, where Christians could live together and make their own communities; but it was not before 1879, that P. A. Jansz, the son of P. Jansz, carried out this idea and founded the colony Margoredjo (Way to Happiness), which was followed by other colonies; this proved to be a success; about 1925 the number of Christians was 4,000. Special attention too was given to medical help and several hospitals and clinics were erected.

The second mission field, Sumatra (q.v.), was opened by Heinrich Dirks (q.v.) in 1871. In 1928 it was turned over to the German Rheinische Mission at Barmen. All the missionaries (7 men) in Sumatra were Russian Mennonites. The third mission field, called Inanwatan in Dutch New Guinea (q.v.), was opened in 1950 with the sending out of a Dutch missionary couple, followed by a second couple from Holland in 1953. At the same time, a Dutch missionary (with wife) was sent as Bible teacher to serve in the Javanese Mennonite Bible School, followed by a second Dutch teacher in 1953.

Numerous contacts were established between the Dutch Missionary Association and the United States Mennonites, particularly of the General Conference group, beginning as early as 1868, and in 1921 J. M. Leendertz visited North America in the interests of the Dutch mission work whose financial state was very precarious. Plans to send American workers (e.g., S. S. Haury, q.v., in 1888) and to have an American board take over the Sumatra work (1921 ff.) did not materialize.

After World War II interest in the missionary enterprise increased considerably among the Dutch Mennonites, though the hope to make the Missionary Association an official work of the entire Dutch Mennonite Church failed to be realized. The visit of the president of the Javanese Church to Holland (and other European countries) in 1952 in connection with the Mennonite World Conference in Basel had a strong beneficial effect upon the missionary interest and support.

Annual reports (Verslag van den Staat en de Verrigtingen der Doopsgezinde Vereeniging tot Bevordering der Evangelieverbreiding, etc.) have been published in Dutch (1848-) and in German (Bericht über den Stand und die Thätigkeit der Taufgesinnten Gesellschaft zur Beförderung der Ausbreitung des Evangeliums) for most of these years. A monthly periodical, Evangelie-verbreiding, has been published since Aug. 20, 1949. A centennial booklet was published in 1948, Uit Verleden en heden van de Doopsgezinde Zending, Jubileum-Uitgave van de Doopsgezinde Zendings-Vereniging 1847-1947. H.S.B.

Duttweiler, a region in the Neustadt district of the Palatinate, Germany. In 1716 three Mennonite families, Janzen, Berdoldt, and Egli, were living there. When in 1724 a register was made of the Palatine Mennonites "in what state of nutrition and wealth" they were, only two families are named: the wealthy Abr. Egli, hereditary leaseholder of the monastic estate of St. Lamprecht, and the "poor" family of Ulrich Burkhart, who had taken over Bergtholdt's farm. The list of Mennonites of 1738 names only Abr. Eichli; that of 1743 lists three families—Jac. Egel, Joh. Lichti, and Egel's widow; in 1759 two families, Joh. Lichti and Isaac Bergthold; in 1768 the same; in 1778 a total of nine Mennonites, presumably two families. In 1832 only four Mennonites are named. (Chr. Neff, "Quellen zur Gesch. der Menn. in der Kurpfalz," manuscript; ML I, 496 f.) E.H.C.

Dyck (Dueck, Dück, Dick, Dieck, von Dyck, van Dyck, von Dick, van den Dyck), a Mennonite family of Dutch descent in the Flemish congregations of West Prussia, first mentioned in 1592. 119 families of this name were listed in West Prussia (without Danzig) in 1776, 492 persons in 1910, 385 persons (with Elbing) in 1935. Members of these families moved to Russia and America. Among the better-known European members of the family were Gerhard Dück or Dyck, elder of the Chortitza congregation from 1855, delegate to St. Petersburg 1871; Jacob Dieck or von Dieck, first elder of the Heubuden (West Prussia) congregation, 1728-48; and Jacob Dyck, elder of the Chortitza congregation, whose pastoral letters written in 1846-47 were published in 1900 by the Mennonitische Rundschau and separately. American members of the family include the following number of ministers: 21 M.B., 4 Kleine Gemeinde, 2 E.M.B., 24 G.C.M., 7 Old Colony, and 6 in Paraguay. G.R.

Dyck, David, was an elder and pioneer leader of the Mennonite Brethren Church, born at Chortitza, South Russia, Jan. 25, 1846. His educational opportunities were limited; yet he procured a remarkably wide range of knowledge through independent study. In September 1867 he married Helena Rempel. To them 15 children were born. In the spring of 1873 he was converted and joined the M.B. Church. He immediately had a strong desire to enter Christian service and became active as a colporteur.

In 1876 he emigrated to America, coming first to Marion Co., Kan. In 1877 he went to the new Mennonite Brethren settlement of Woodson Co., Kan., where he lived seven years. Here he was soon elected minister and a little later elder of the church. He attended Rochester Theological Seminary for a short time. In 1884 he took charge of the church at Lehigh, Kan., where he ministered six years, and was ordained elder in 1890. In 1892 he went to Kirk, Col., where he served as elder of the M.B. Church for three years.

When the Mennonite Brethren Church began to develop in Manitoba, the conference appointed Dyck to take charge of the work at Winkler. During his ministry of eleven years a strong congregation developed. As new settlements were made in Saskatchewan, Dyck moved there and continued a very active ministry in the churches of Borden, Bruderfeld, and Waldheim. He was also much interested in mission work in the Russian settlements of that vicinity, helping at the stations Petrofka and Eagle Creek.

David Dyck was a most active worker and leader of the M.B. Conference. The early yearbooks mention him 17 times as engaged in itinerant evangelism. For many years he served on the Board of Foreign Missions. He was the first moderator of the Canadian District Conference and filled this office for 13 years. After a fruitful ministry of 53 years, he died at Waldheim, Sask., Jan. 6, 1933, and was buried at the Bruderfeld cemetery. J.H.L.

Dyck, Gerhard G., was born in the Chortitza community of South Russia, either in Rosenthal or in Nieder-Chortitz, on June 4, 1809, chosen to the ministry in 1848, and to the office of elder March 29, 1855. He was ordained by Jakob Braun of Bergthal (Mariupol). He died May 11, 1887. He resigned from his duties in 1885 on account of the infirmities of old age. His term of service saw the Crimean War, the Mennonite alternative civilian public service, economic and religious growth, development of the school system, and the establishment of several daughter colonies. Since daughter colonies were under the care of the elder of the mother settlement, the intervening distance caused some difficulty, in view of the difficulties of traveling in those days in Russia.

When compulsory military service threatened the Mennonites of Russia, he was one of the delegates who made several trips (1871, Feb. 26, 1873, and autumn 1873) to St. Petersburg to request permission to have Mennonite young men perform some alternative service; this was a strenuous task for the aged elder. B.J.S.

Dyck, Isaak, elder of Chortitza Mennonite Church, son of Elder Gerhard Dyck (q.v.), b. Dec. 9, 1847, Chortitza, Russia, d. in the same place, Aug. 24, 1929. He attended elementary and secondary schools at Chortitza, married Margaretha Hamm (June 28, 1870), taught at Fürstenland settlement 1873-76, and was called into the ministry in 1876. From 1882 to 1888 he was minister and leader of the Anadol Forestry Camp (q.v.) where Mennonite boys did their alternative service. In 1888 he returned to Chortitza where he was elected elder in 1896 to succeed H. Epp (q.v.). He was a minister for 53 years and an elder for 26 years. He served several times as president of the Allgemeine Bundeskonferenz. His motto was Bete und arbeite.

For many years Dyck was the president of the committee which maintained and supervised forestry camps and president of the board of the Chortitza Zentralschule and Mädchenschule. Repeatedly he was delegated to negotiate with the government of St. Petersburg regarding the Mennonites. His sound judgment and vision usually assured him success. During the Revolution and civil war following World War I, he felt that a younger person should shoulder the task and responsibilities. Thus he ordained and introduced Peter Neufeld (q.v.) as his successor in the office of elder in 1922. His wife followed him in death in 1931. Mrs. J. P. Klassen of Bluffton, Ohio, Mrs. Franz Epp of Hanley, Sask., and Mrs. Peter Klassen of Hanley, Sask., are daughters of the Dycks. Gerhard Dyck, a son, was a minister at Hague, Sask. The other children have died or remained in Russia.† C.K.

Dyck (Dyk), Jakob, was elder of the Chortitza Mennonite Church in Russia. He was born in Neuendorf, June 5, 1779, and chosen elder in 1812. In 1851 Fr. Wiens was chosen as coelder but he died in 1853 without having served in the office. Jakob Dyck died Oct. 18, 1854.

His pastoral letters written in Neuosterwick to Isaak Penner, a teacher in Rosengart (dated 1846-47), bear eloquent testimony to his faithfulness as a shepherd. He states: "The repentant sinner receives the justification of Jesus through grace without the merit of works (Rom. 3:24). A thorough conversion must be followed by a life that demonstrates who dwells within us" (Friesen, 104). "Without Him I am a doomed sinner, who errs and falls but whatever good I want and do is done through my Lord Jesus" (Friesen, 106). Friesen refers to these letters as crowning evidence that spiritual life was not extinct in the Mennonite congregations at that time and that this should be kept in mind when the origin of the M.B. Church of Chortitza is considered. B.J.S.

Dyck, Jakob, was elder of the Chortitza Mennonite Church, South Russia. He was born Nov. 29, 1813, chosen to the ministry in 1844 (probably on June 1), ordained elder in 1854, and died March 5, 1855. B.J.S.

Dyck, Jakob J., b. Dec. 7, 1890, in the Crimea, South Russia, to Jacob J. and Sara (Reimer) Dyck, who owned a large ranch. He was the fifth in a family of nine children. He completed his secondary education in the Crimea and then went to Ilmenau, Germany, to study engineering, and worked for some time as an engineer in Berlin. Just before World War I he returned to Russia and in 1914 entered the medical service (Sanitätsdienst) in Moscow. On Aug. 26, 1916, he was married to Tina Fehderau of Neu-Halbstadt. To this union one son was born, who died in infancy.

Jacob J. Dyck was converted at the age of 17 under the preaching of Johann Warns, and was received into the Mennonite Brethren Church at Rückenau, Molotschna. Immediately he manifested a special interest in the salvation of his fellow men, and distinguished himself by his leadership in fostering Christian organizations among the men during the war. Upon his release from the medical service he devoted his talents to evangelism in tent-missions, preaching the Gospel and traveling from village to village with his colaborers until he and his party were seized while conducting evangelistic meetings by Machno bandits in the village of Eichenfeld, Yazekovo settlement, and murdered on Oct. 26, 1919. The former Mrs. Jakob J. Dyck now lives in Kitchener, Ont. (1950). A.A.T.

Dyck, Johannes Dietrich, b. Dec. 5, 1826, in Poppau, West Prussia; d. Nov. 11, 1898, in Fresenheim, Am Trakt, Samara, Russia. At the age of 12 he was apprenticed to a grocery and dry-goods merchant. In 1844 he was baptized and received into the Ellerwald (W. Prussia) Mennonite Church by Elder Jacob Kroeker. He continued in the grocery business at Marienburg and Caldove until 1847. In August 1848 he left for the United States, promising his fiancee, Helene Janzen of Gross Lesewitz, that he would return in two or three years. Upon arrival in America he spent the first year in Chicago and in Wisconsin, from where he went to the gold mines of California early in 1850. On his return trip to the East, probably in 1853, he was attacked by Indians and lost all his possessions, whereupon he returned to the gold mines. In 1858 he came back to Prussia, and was married to Helene Janzen. Because her relatives had moved to Russia and because of increasing militarization, they left for Russia in 1859, settling at Fresenheim. He soon proved to be a successful farmer. In 1865 he was elected Oberschulze (mayor) of the Trakt settlement, which office he held for 18 years. He was active in many community affairs and strongly promoted the interests of the settlements. For this leadership he received two medals from the Russian government, engraved "For Faithful Service," and the third time a ribbon bearing the inscription "For Service to the Czar and the Fatherland." Dyck, Peter (1821-85), the first elder of the Zion Mennonite Church of Elbing, Kan., was born in Klein Montau, near Marienburg, West Prussia, on April 3, 1821. On July 12, 1849, he was married to Agathe Entz. They had five children, Catharine, Agathe, Peter, Johannes, and David. Peter Dyck served the Ladekopp Mennonite Church in West Prussia as minister until his emigration in 1876. In May 1869 he and four other men visited friends and relatives in Russia. In 1870 various interested families and churches commissioned him to visit Russia again, this time to determine the possibilities of settlement there. He was accompanied by Wilhelm Ewert of Thorn and Abraham Regier. Peter Dyck again visited the various settlements and went to much trouble to study the farming possibilities. He apparently preferred South Russia as a future location for the Prussian Mennonites, and he even entered into negotiations with government to this effect. It is of interest to note that Cornelius Janzen (q.v.) strongly urged him to investigate America before deciding in favor of Russia. In 1876 Peter Dyck and his family came to Kansas with many other Prussian Mennonites, and settled several miles south of Peabody, Kan. He served the Emmaus church as minister until 1883, at which time he was instrumental in organizing the Zion Mennonite Church at Elbing. He was one of 14 charter members. In May 1881 he left Peabody for a visit to his former home in Prussia, in July went on to Russia, returning to Kansas in September 1881.

The record clearly indicated that Dyck loved the ministry and worked hard to be a good shepherd. He had keen insight and good interest in many things. His records reveal minute descriptions of churches, farming methods, and spiritual conditions as he found them in Russia and elsewhere during his travels. He was respected and loved as a community and church leader. C.J.P.

Dyck, Wilhelm I., an elder in the M.B. Church, b. Feb. 4, 1854, at Rosental, South Russia. Upon the early death of his parents he was brought up by Gerhard Krahn of Neuenburg. He completed the Zentralschule at Chortitza. He was drawn into public work and served as secretary treasurer in the municipal office with such ability that he was decorated by the czar with a medal for meritorious service. He was known as always showing sympathy with the oppressed and needy, deciding for what he thought right and equitable. Soon he came to be used as mediator between the church and the then generally suspicious Russian government. Together with Elder D. Schellenberg he obtained full legal recognition for the M.B. Church in Russia.

Elder Dyck also prospered in a material way, becoming owner and director of a large milling concern; but neither business nor municipal duties ever kept him from manifesting a deep interest in the work of the church and the salvation of souls. In 1890 he gave up his municipal duties and devoted himself largely to the ministry, pioneering in many areas, including travel to Poland, Siberia, Bulgaria, Turkestan, the Terek, and Orenburg, ministering also to the native Russians, which was contrary to the wish of the ruling powers.

He was married to Maria M. Ridiger in 1877, who died in 1896. About a year after, he was married to Emilie Petker. In 1907 he visited the churches in America, but returned to his native Russia, where he was ordained elder in 1914.

World War I together with the Russian Revolution cost him the loss of his business and all his property, including his home. He emigrated to Canada in 1924, where he continued his spiritual ministry until shortly before his death in 1931. C.A.DeF.

Dyserinck (also Dyselinck), a Dutch Mennonite family, originally from Flanders, Belgium. Cornelis Dyserinck, b. at Brugge, Belgium, in 1608, left the Roman Catholic Church and emigrated to Aardenburg (q.v.), Dutch province of Zeeland, in 1637; in 1639 he was baptized here (DB 1877, 7-8) and was a strong pillar of the congregation until his death, April 30, 1688. He was a deacon for many years, and after 1681 he seems also to have been a preacher (DB 1884, 40). After the middle of the 18th century the Dyserinck family moved from Aardenburg to Haarlem, where they were engaged in several kinds of business and industry. During the 18th century a wing of this family was living at Middelburg.

A prominent member of this family was Hendrik Dyserinck, b. 1811 at Haarlem, d. 1906, who after a successful military career became a Dutch state Minister of the Navy, 1888-91 (N.N.B.Wb. IV, 550-51). He was a brother of the Mennonite minister Johannes Dyserinck (q.v.). (Ned. Patriciaat II, 1911, 116-21.) vdZ.

Dyserinck, Johannes, a Dutch Mennonite minister, b. March 12, 1835, at Haarlem, d. Sept. 26, 1912, was at first a painter, but then decided to devote himself to study, studied at Amsterdam and Leiden, especially under the professors Hoekstra, de Hoop Scheffer, and Kuenen. His first call to preach came from Helder and Huisduinen in 1861. At the request of the Minister of War, L. G. Brocx, he composed a volume of Godsdienstige Overdenkingen en Gebeden (Devotional Meditations and Prayers) for use in religious services on board warships. In September 1879 he accepted the pastorate of Vlissingen, remaining there until July 1884, when he transferred to Rotterdam. He remained here until his retirement in December 1901. Until May 1912 he lived at The Hague, then moved to Baarn, where he died on Sept. 26, 1912.

Dyserinck was the most versatile of the Dutch Mennonites of the 19th century, without doubt publishing more books than any other. As a distinguished scholar of Hebrew he made a new translation of the Psalms, which won him an honorary doctor's title, and translations of some Apocryphal and Talmudic writings. Well at home in the fine arts, on which he wrote several studies, he showed that Rembrandt's "Night Watch" was disfigured in that pieces of canvas were cut off. In literature and history few surpassed him in learning; he wrote comprehensive biographies of several novelists and poets (Beets, Bellamy, Bosboom Toussaint, Wolff and Deken, Haverschmidt, Winkler Prins are among them). Among his articles in periodical literature, mention should be made of "Het gebed voor de zitting van de gemeenteraad van Amsterdam" (1887) and "Het vraagstuk der onsterfelijkheid" (1901). In addition, he wrote a collection of sermons, Laatste Godsdienstige Overdenkingen (1908). On Mennonite history he published two treatises of particular importance in the Gids: "De Vrijstelling van den eed voor de Doopsgezinden" (1882) and "De Weerloosheid volgens de Doopsgezinden" (1890). He was awarded many honors. The king bestowed on him the Order of the Lion.

The university of Leiden conferred an honorary doctor's degree upon him. In addition he was a member of a number of learned societies.

Of his other writings several deserve mention: (1) Waarop moet volgens Paulus, de Christen zijn hoop der zaligheid bouwen? (Helder, 1864); (2) Verscheidenheden (Haarlem, 1867); (3) De Spreuken van Jezus, den zoon van Sirach (translation from the Hebrew, Haarlem, 1870); (4) Vrede zij in uwe vesting. Een toepasselijk woord ter wijding van het tweede eeuwfeest van Aardenburgs verdediging, 1672 (with pictures of the Mennonites, A.M. van Eeghen and H. van Eeghen, Haarlem, 1872); (5) Bloemlezing uit de Spreuken van Jezus Sirach (1872); (6) Sparsa. Verzameling van verstrooide opstellen en kleine geschriften (Amsterdam, 1882); (7) Stillen in den lande (The Hague, 1895); (8) Het recht der waarheid tegenover den Staat. Bijdrage tot de eedsvraag (Amsterdam, 1902).

East Aldergrove Mennonite Brethren Church, located near Abbotsford, British Columbia, was organized on June 13, 1947, by a group of 34 families because the North Abbotsford church, to which they belonged, was overcrowded. At that time the membership was 100; by 1953 it had increased to 207. Its leader in 1953 was George P. Warkentin, who had served from the beginning. G.P.W.

East Bend Mennonite Church (MC), located near Fisher, Champaign Co., Ill., was largely developed in the "east bend" of the Sangamon River by settlers from Dillon Creek, Goodfield, Hopedale, and other Amish Mennonite communities in Illinois. The first Amish Mennonite settler in Champaign County was Charles Stormer, who came in 1882. Other early settlers were August Ingold (1883), Jacob Heiser (1887), Andrew Birky (1888), and Peter Zehr (1889). Sunday school was begun in the Dixon schoolhouse near by in the spring of 1889, and the next year a congregation was organized under the leadership of Peter Zehr, which for a time rented the Houstonville Methodist church. In 1895 the East Bend congregation dedicated a new frame church. In 1907 this building was wrecked by a tornado and was replaced by a larger frame church, 40 x 60 ft., seating 300, which was remodeled in 1919. In 1948 a new brick church, 50 x 80 ft., seating 750, was built adjoining the old structure, now in brick veneer.

The ministers who have served this congregation are Peter Zehr 1889- (ordained bishop in 1893), Daniel Grieser 1890-1923, Joseph Baecher 1893-1931, George Gingerich 1893-1907, Samuel S. Zehr (a deacon who preached when an English sermon was required) 1906- , Joseph A. Heiser 1917-52 (ordained bishop in 1921), Harold Zehr 1931- , Dr. George Troyer (retired missionary) 1937-44, Howard Zehr 1953- , bishop and pastor.

The East Bend congregation has through its Christian Workers' Band sponsored a number of extension projects. In 1936 services were begun in the home of a member living in Arthur. In 1940 this work was organized as an independent congregation with 59 members, and an extension Sunday school was opened in Dewey. Ivan Birkey served the Dewey group as acting pastor for a number of years. In April 1946 the A.M.E. Colored Church was reopened by the East Bend congregation, and services are held there each Sunday afternoon. In 1948 the East Bend congregation began to sponsor services at Lake City, Ill., and Harold Oyer, a minister of the Morton congregation, was asked to move to that community to serve it. The East Bend congregation was a member of the Western District Amish Mennonite Conference, which merged in 1921 with the Illinois Conference of the Mennonite Church. In 1951 a group of about 130 left the East Bend Church and formed the Gibson City Bible Church, with J. A. Heiser as pastor. The 1954 membership of East Bend was 350. H.Z.

East Brewton, Escambia Co., Ala., is a mission center (MC) established by the Itinerant Evangelizing Committee of the Lancaster Conference. John R. Lehman was ordained for this work in 1944, J. Wilbur Martin in 1945, and Elam B. Hollinger in 1947. The work was started by short-term social service workers from the north in numerous summer Bible schools and in evangelism in Alabama and Florida. In 1954 Edgar S. Denlinger was in charge of the congregation of eight members. I.D.L.

East Cardston Hutterite Bruderhof near Cardston, Alberta, was founded in 1918 by members of the Hopson (Mont.) Bruderhof. Their preachers are David Hofer, chosen by the Jamesville (S.D.) Bruderhof in 1911, and Joseph Hofer and Jakob Hofer, chosen in East Cardston in 1927 and 1933. In 1947 the Bruderhof numbered 76 souls with 28 baptized members. D.D.

East Chestnut Street Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Conference, is located at East Chestnut and Sherman streets, Lancaster, Pa. The first meetinghouse was built on this site in 1879, services having previously been held in a rented building on Charlotte Street. This meetinghouse was replaced in 1906 by the present larger brick church. The trustees of the first meetinghouse, members of adjoining country churches, took their turns in caring for the afternoon services. A Sunday school was opened in 1894 with Benjamin F. Herr and David Lantz as superintendents. On Dec. 11, 1904, John H. Mosemann was ordained to the ministry, and in 1926 to the office of bishop. On June 30, 1907, David H. Mosemann was ordained to the ministry. For years the church has been a young people's center every second Sunday night. Numerous all-day meetings are also held here. The ministers in 1955 were Noah G. Good, Jacob E. Brubaker, and Mylin Shenk. Services are held twice each Sunday, with a Sunday school, a summer Bible school, and a weekday Bible school each fall.

The congregation has been directly or indirectly the mother of a number of mission congregations in and near the city of Lancaster, among them being Vine Street (q.v.), North End, Rossmere, South Christian Street, Laurel and Freemont Streets, Lyndon. It has also suffered many losses by withdrawals. A considerable number of the present Calvary Bible Church (independent) come from East Chestnut Street, while a block of members leaving in 1952 organized the Neffsville Mennonite Church under the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference. Earlier a number had left to share in the organization of the Monterey Mennonite Church under the same conference, near Bird-in-Hand, Pa. As a result of these vicissitudes, the congregation has declined severely in membership (1955, 200). I.D.L.

East Chilliwack (B.C.) Bible School (MB) was established Oct. 20, 1947, with 56 students and G. Thielmann as principal, by the East Chilliwack M.B. Church, which had purchased a former store building for this purpose. At first a 5-month school with a 3-year curriculum, it was changed in 1955 to an 8-month school with a 2-year curriculum. By 1955 a total of 303 students had attended the school. G. Thielmann was still serving as principal in 1955-56, with 33 students enrolled. H.S.B.

East Chilliwack (B.C.) Mennonite Brethren Church, a member of the Canadian Conference, was organized on Jan. 6, 1945, under the leadership of N. A. Rempel, with a membership of 82. The services were held in a newly built Sunday-school house. Because of the influx of Mennonites, this place was soon overfilled and a second group, the Chilliwack M.B. Church, was organized in the city. The 1953 membership of East Chilliwack was 236; the leader was Gerhard Thielmann. There were in addition seven ordained ministers in the congregation.

East Chilliwack (B.C.) United Mennonite Church (GCM), formerly known as the Westheimer Mennonite Church of Chilliwack, located 3½ miles southeast of Chilliwack, was organized in 1945, the first members having arrived in the previous year. In 1947-48 a school was remodeled to serve as a church. The 1953 membership of 162 has its background largely in the Russian Mennonite immigrations since the 1920's. Abram J. Peters was the minister in 1953. C.G.T.

East Fairview Mennonite Church (MC), northeast of Chappell, Deuel Co., Neb., since 1953 called the Chappell Mennonite Church, was founded by families who had previously moved from Holmes Co., Ohio, to Seward Co., Neb. In 1883 Abraham Stutzman, who had in the previous year filed claim to a homestead in that section, settled here together with five other families. Sunday school was held from the beginning. In 1890 a meetinghouse was built 6 miles northeast of Chappell and a church organized. N. C. Roth was ordained to the ministry by Joseph Birky of Tiskilwa, Ill. The membership in 1954 was 63, about 75 per cent of whom live either in Chappell or in Julesburg, Col., 15 miles distant. The ministers in 1954 were John Roth and Fred Gingerich. The congregation is a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference. F.Gi.

East Fairview Mennonite Church (MC), located west of Milford, Seward Co., Neb., is a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference. The first communion service was held in 1875, with eleven members, and the first meetinghouse was built in 1878 and dedicated with a membership of 50. The 1954 membership was 440. Bishops who served this congregation were Joseph Schlegel, N. E. Roth, P. R. Kennel, and J. E. Zimmerman; ministers were P. P. Hershberger, Joseph Gasho, Joseph Rediger, Jacob Stauffer, William Schlegel, and George S. Miller. In 1954 the ministers were Ammon Miller and Oliver Roth, with W. R. Eicher serving as bishop.

East Friesland (Ostfriesland), Germany, made a principality on April 22, 1654, became Prussian in 1744, Dutch 1807, French 1810, a part of Hannover in 1815, and Prussian again in 1866. The government seat is located at Aurich. East Friesland has played a significant role in the history of the Anabaptist-Mennonite movement in Northwest Europe.

The East Frisian historian Eggerick Beningha reports in his Chronyk (p. 652) that Anabaptists appeared in East Friesland in 1528 for the first time. This statement has been repeated many times, but specific information about who these Anabaptists were and where they appeared is lacking. Count Enno wrote to Philip of Hesse in 1530 that there had been unbaptized children in East Friesland for five years (Cornelius, Anteil Ostfrieslands, p. 20), and Gründlicher warhafftiger Bericht (p. 21) speaks of followers of Müntzer who found refuge in East Friesland. On Jan. 19, 1530, before Melchior Hofmann baptized in Emden, the counts Enno and Johann published the Edict of Speyer banning all Anabaptists from their territory. The first Kirchenordnung presented in 1529 strongly emphasized infant baptism.

As long as specific information as to sources, contents, and proponents of these views is lacking, it is questionable whether they can be called Anabaptist. Warnings against Anabaptism may simply be an echo from Wittenberg or may refer to views held by Carlstadt, who indeed had followers in East Friesland. There is no record available to prove that believers' baptism was practiced in East Friesland prior to the coming of Melchior Hofmann from Strasbourg in 1530, where he had joined the Anabaptists. Everything preceding this must be considered as premonitory of coming Anabaptism. On the other hand, Melchior Hofmann did not bring much that was new to East Friesland and the Low Countries except the seal of the Covenant, believers' baptism.

The success of Hofmann and the rapid spread of the early Anabaptist movement in East Friesland, its survival and later cultural contribution are due to factors unique to the country and its Reformatory movement in general. Culturally and politically it had close ties with the provinces of the Low Countries, particularly Groningen. The Brethren of the Common Life and Humanism (Georg Aportanus, Johann Wessel Gansfoort, Wilhelm Gnapheus) also paved the way for the Reformation. Friesland was ready to accept the light coming from Wittenberg, was in touch with Strasbourg and Zürich, and developed a Sacramentist movement similar to that in Holland, but was in all matters quite independent in accordance with the Frisian national characteristic. The chief promoters of the Reformation here were Edzard I (q.v., 1491-1528), Ulrich van Dornum (q.v.), and Hicco van Oldersum. Aportanus of Zwolle, the tutor of Edzard's three sons, publicly preached "the new Gospel" in the Grosse Kirche of Emden, and Ulrich van Dornum sponsored a Catholic-Evangelical disputation at Oldersum in 1526, sheltered Carlstadt and Melchior Hofmann in 1529 (both dedicated books to him and he had his printed in Wittenberg), and was in touch with Sebastian Franck. This indicates somewhat the scope and nature of the original Reformatory movement in East Friesland. One of the most significant factors, however, of the later development was the great influx of Dutch refugees in the days of the Inquisition. Among them was Hinne Rode, who introduced the Reformation in Norden. Until the death of Edzard I the Reformatory movement of East Friesland showed little of the characteristics of "Lutheranism" and "Zwinglianism," but was rather of a Sacramentist nature, to Luther's great disgust. It was in this atmosphere that Carlstadt, Hofmann, and Franck found a hearing. In these crucial days young Enno II (leaning toward Lutheranism) saw the Spiritualist-Sacramentist forces come to the foreground which likely caused him to publish the Edict of Speyer on Jan. 19, 1530. On March 25, 1530, he reported to Philip of Hesse that his ministers held Sacramentist views and denied its sacramental character; some advocated baptism at the age of 33, not having had their children baptized for the last five years (Cornelius, 58).

Thus when Melchior Hofmann (q.v.) appeared in East Friesland in May 1530, this time coming as an Anabaptist evangelist, he found the soil well prepared. Contrary to his first visit he could now appear publicly. Even the doors of the Grosse Kirche of Emden were opened to him and he is said to have baptized some 300 persons there, both "burgher and peasant, lord and servant." This bold act can be explained only by the assumption that he had followers in leading circles, including the ministry (Kochs, Reformation III, 74). That Count Enno was moved to tears by Hofmann's deliberations is likely a fable. Whether Hofmann voluntarily left East Friesland or was compelled to do so is not definitely known; in any event he went to Strasbourg in October, unfortunately leaving no able leader behind.

This was the origin not only of the Anabaptist movement in East Friesland but in Northwest Europe in general. From here it spread in all directions and to this place Anabaptist refugees returned for protection in spite of mandates issued against them. Although they did not achieve numbers and strength to compete successfully with the Lutherans and Zwinglians, they greatly benefited from the rivalry between them. From Emden Jan Volkertszoon Trypmaker took the message to the Low Countries. Thousands of Anabaptist refugees from Antwerp to Friesland, among whom were Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, Leenaert Bouwens, and Hans de Ries, and even extreme mystics like David Joris and Hendrik Niclaes, found a haven there.

In 1534-35 Enno II issued warnings against the Melchiorites, which apparently had little effect. After his death his widow, Anna of Oldenburg (1540-62), called on John a Lasco to complete the Reformation and organize the church. Under pressure of the imperial government Anna issued decrees against the Anabaptists which through the mediation of a Lasco were applied primarily against David Joris and his following. With Menno Simons he had a public discussion in January 1544, hoping to win him. During the same year Menno left East Friesland and the following year Countess Anna stated that those "Mennisten" who were not willing to accept the instruction of her ministers were to leave the country.

The extent of the movement during the 16th century can be estimated to some degree by the number of individuals baptized by Leenaert Bouwens, who kept a record for the years 1551-82, which lists over 600 persons baptized in East Friesland, over 400 of whom were living in Emden and vicinity. It is likely that many of them were the second generation of refugees from the Netherlands. If the other elders mentioned were only partly as successful, the total number of Anabaptists of East Friesland during the 16th century could easily have been several thousand. The fact that the ministers and church councils of the Reformation churches were so alarmed about the spread of the Mennonites is also an indication that they must have been numerous. In addition to those baptized in Friesland the Dutch Anabaptists continued to pour in throughout the 16th century. It is interesting to note that there was little change in the location of the Mennonites during the 16th century as found in Leenaert Bouwens' list of baptismal candidates and those lists compiled by the government to solicit payment (Schutzgeld) during the 17th century. They were living in Leer, along the Ems River, in Emden, in the Greetmer Amt between Emden and Norden, and in Norden and the rural area north of it. It is likely that their services as experts in draining the land were appreciated and for generations they were welcome renters on the estates of the nobility. Thus the Mennonites were mostly located in the western part of East Friesland including the area of Aurich. However, at least one settlement of Mennonites was already located in the east on the estates of Freitag at Gödens near Neustadt in the days of Leenaert Bouwens, where he baptized 20 persons.

Today there is hardly a Mennonite located on a farm. Not only are they mostly urban, but their number has shrunk considerably (the total, including children, is about 500). No scholarly research has been made about the socio-economic changes and contributions of the East Friesland Mennonites similar to those of Hamburg and Crefeld, with the exception of the part played by the Mennonites in the linen industry of Leer. It can be assumed that the constant pressure, restrictions, and high payments (Schutzgeld) which were extracted from them for centuries and the decrease in vigor and vision within their ranks caused many to escape the stigma by joining the Reformed and Lutheran churches to acquire equality and full citizenship. The cultural and economic contributions of a number of prosperous families in Emden, Norden, and Leer were outstanding and have been sketched by Abram Fast (Die Kulturleistungen).

The manifold divisions among the Mennonites of the Low Countries during the 16th century were also transplanted to East Friesland, including the Flemish, the Old Flemish (Ukowallists), the Frisians, and the Waterlanders. During the 17th century the lists referred to above, however, speak only of two groups—the Mennonites and the Ukowallists. Some of the significant Anabaptist meetings of elders during the 16th century, at which far-reaching decisions were made, were held at Emden. In 1547 nearly all elders of the Low Countries met there to discuss matters pertaining to discipline, and in 1568 the Waterlanders met there to draw up 16 articles pertaining to their congregations and ministers. In 1578 the Flemish and Frisians met at Emden to discuss matters pertaining to a pending union. Nikolaas Biestkens van Diest, the well-known Mennonite publisher, here produced Bibles, New Testaments, and the songbook Het Offer des Heeren, through which he greatly helped to spread the movement. Some of the numerous disputations between the Anabaptists and the churches of the Reformation took place in East Friesland. In 1544 Menno and a Lasco held their discussion in Emden. In 1556 there was a similar discussion between the Mennonites and their opponents at Norden and in 1578 the better known disputation of Feb. 27-May 17 took place at Emden. In addition to John a Lasco (q.v.), Gellius Faber (q.v.), Marten Micron (q.v.), Menso Alting (q.v.), all of whom tried to "win" the Mennonites, although not so vehemently as Luther and his co-workers, there were the following less known representatives: Georg Aportanus (Emden), Hermanus Aquilomontanus (Oldersum) (whose letters to Heinrich Bullinger throw significant light on the early development of the Anabaptist movement and have not yet been made use of), Johann Oldeguil (Emden), Gerhardus Nikolai (q.v., Norden), and Bernhardus Buwo (q.v., Eilsum). Nikolai translated Bullinger's Adversus anabaptistas and Buwo published a Dialogus . . . (1563) against the Anabaptists, which is, considering the age, exceptionally tolerant. Ubbo Emmius (q.v.) wrote against David Joris. The Reformers of Bremen and Lüneburg, i.e., Bugenhagen and Luther and their followers, and the Strasbourg Reformers, i.e., Bucer and Capito, as well as Zwingli, not to speak of the Catholic and imperial forces, tried to shape or influence the future of the Reformation in East Friesland. Had it not been for Edzard I, who refused to follow the example of many Reformation-minded rulers of his day, i.e., to reform his country from above (cujus regio, ejus religio), and who let the Reformation take its own course in East Friesland by giving it gentle and wise direction, its fate would have been different. Because of this independent attitude East Friesland became the haven of the greatest variety of factions who had fled from many places because of their convictions. Even a survivor of the Münsterite kingdom, Hermann Krechting (q.v.), became a respected citizen in Neustadt-Gödens.

The question as to what percentage of the Reformation-minded forces and the Anabaptists came from the Low Countries and other places has not been investigated. Neither is it known to what an extent East Friesland served as a temporary shelter whence they proceeded to other places. That this was the case is established. Many Anabaptists must have returned to the Netherlands after the Catholic authorities had been overthrown. Others had already gone east to Schleswig-Holstein, among them Menno, and to the Vistula region. How long this process continued and the relationship between the homeland and the daughter settlements has not been studied. The culture and language, particularly in worship, in the "church of strangers" remained Dutch until the middle of the 19th century. However, little was published after the 16th century. The congregations obtained their ministers from Holland and were members of the various Dutch Mennonite organizations, including the A.D.S., of which they are still members. Since World War I the remaining congregations—Emden, Leer, and Norden—are being served by one German minister. Among the outstanding leaders of the early days were Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, Leenaert Bouwens, Hans de Ries, and Uko Walles, and many others resided and worked here for longer or shorter periods. A list of elders and preachers of the Old Flemish wing from 1640 to 1750 (DB 1879, 7-8) names 7 for Emden, 5 for Leer, 7 for Neustadt-Gödens, 3 for Norden, and 1 for Oldersum. The Oldersum congregation must have died out soon after this report; the Neustadt-Gödens congregation was discontinued during the 19th century.

The successors of Edzard I, with the exception of Anna van Oldenburg (q.v.), 1540-62, did not all follow the example of their great ancestor regarding the Reformation and basic principles of tolerance. Edzard II (q.v.), 1562-99, under whom the Emden Disputation of 1578 took place, and Enno III (q.v.), 1599-1625, issued severe edicts against the Mennonites. Rudolf Christian, 1625-28, issued a Schutzbrief (guarantee of protection) for the Mennonites on May 26, 1626, granting them limited religious freedom for the payment of a certain amount per family, thereby setting the pattern for his successors until East Friesland became Prussian in 1744. At this time the Mennonite church at Emden was exempted from all special payments. Step by step the congregations had to struggle to gain full liberty and equality as citizens and congregations, a status which was not fully attained until the Revolution of 1918. The German constitution of 1919 made provision for complete equality. Meanwhile the principle of nonresistance, not the refusal to swear an oath, had been given up.

Not only did the government extract large sums annually under the pretext of granting an "intolerable" religious group a letter of protection, which was usually issued to "Jews, Mennonites, and Ukowallists," but also the ministers, particularly of the Lutheran church at Norden, joined in the extortion by demanding of the Mennonites taxes for the upkeep of their churches and fees for services such as funerals which they did not conduct. Weary of this situation, the Mennonites of Norden petitioned the government in 1821-22 to be admitted to take part in the public affairs of the city and the country, particularly in view of the fact that though they constituted only 4 per cent of the population, they contributed one eighth of the revenue of the city. This was achieved only through a long struggle. Not until 1892 were they exempted from paying contributions to the state church. (A detailed account of the struggle with the state is to be found in the article "Ostfriesland," ML III, 319-21.)

In modern times (since 1700) there have been only four Mennonite congregations in East Friesland: Emden, Leer, and Norden, which are still in existence, and Neustadt-Goedens, which died out about the mid-19th century (in 1840 it had 10 members). The membership of the three surviving congregations has been recorded as follows: 1888 total 298 (Emden 81, Leer 52, Norden 165); 1940 total 300 (Emden 200, Leer 20, Norden 80); 1954 total 373 (Emden 218, Leer 40, Norden 115). The 1954 figures include some Danzig area refugees. East Goshen Mennonite Church (MC), 2600 East Lincoln Ave., Goshen, Ind., was organized Dec. 6, 1947, and was admitted to the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference on June 2, 1948. A new brick meetinghouse was dedicated Oct. 17, 1949. The congregation began in 1946 as an extension Sunday school of the Goshen College Young People's Christian Association. Its membership in 1954 was 180. The bishop-pastor was Paul M. Miller and the minister Ray Keim. P.M.M.

East Gwillimbury Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, Ravenshoe, Ont., now extinct, was served by W. H. Yates in 1948.

East Holbrook Mennonite Church (MC), located near Cheraw, Col., originated when the Mennonites living there met to worship with other denominations in a school building. Eventually, the Mennonites were responsible for most of the services. In 1904 they built a church with John M. Nunemaker as the charter pastor. This building burned down in 1907, and was replaced with the present building.

In 1954 this congregation had 134 members. Richard Birky was the bishop, Aaron Leatherman the minister, and Bert Snyder deacon. The congregation is a member of the South Central Conference. It co-operates with the La Junta congregation in holding quarterly singing programs and annual Sunday-school workers' conferences. L.C.

East India Company. Under this name there arose in the 17th century several enterprises with special privileges from various European governments for trade with the East Indies. The oldest and most important of these trading companies were founded by the English and the Dutch. The English East India Company received a charter on Dec. 31, 1600, from Queen Elizabeth. The Dutch East India Company was formed in 1602 through the union of several companies founded after 1595. Their field was principally the East Indian islands. In a short time this company became dominant there. In it there were Mennonites at first; but they withdrew when the company became involved in conquest and violence (Cramer, 611).

The council of Bern hoped that it might be able to use the Dutch East India Company in its suppression of the Mennonites. The expulsions previously carried out had not shown the desired results, since the exiles could not take their families with them and therefore frequently returned. By taking them to a distant island the council hoped to make a return impossible. On May 17, 1699, it therefore applied to the company in Amsterdam with the request to take the Mennonites to the East Indies. The Amsterdam company, however, did not comply (Müller, 253). HEGE.

East Jordan United Missionary Church, Charlevoix Co., Mich., in 1953 had 35 members, with E. W. Thompson as pastor.

East Petersburg (Pa.) Mennonite Church (MC) is a member of the Lancaster Conference. From 1831 this congregation had a meetinghouse in East Petersburg on the site of the present Brethren church. It was an old log house that had formerly been a union church-schoolhouse, probably built in pre-Revolution days. The membership at that date was but 12-15, although numerous Mennonite families had settled in this area. But by 1867 the group was sufficiently large to build a brick church 40 x 60 ft. on the present location on the north edge of the village; and by 1896 the present church became necessary. This has since been enlarged and remodeled. David B. Huber and Benjamin F. Charles were the first Sunday-school superintendents (1893). In 1954 the membership was 450. The deacon is Wallace M. Hottenstein and the ministers are Frank N. Kreider, his son Irvin Kreider, and James B. Siegrist.

East Prussia. (1) The Anabaptists in the Early Years of the Reformation. East Prussia consists for the most part of the eastern part of the former land of the Teutonic Knights, as it existed for several centuries as the duchy of Prussia, whereas West or Polish Prussia was separated from the Teutonic Knight state in 1466 and assigned to the Polish crown. The last grand master of the Teutonic Order, Albrecht von Hohenzollern, secularized the remainder of the Teutonic Order lands in 1525 and made of them a hereditary duchy under the loose sovereignty of Poland. Thereupon the pope excommunicated him and Charles V outlawed him.

Although Duke Albrecht's decision can be traced to the influence of Luther, in the first years of his reign he was not unfavorable to the separatist religious groups, being influenced by the mighty Baron Frederick of Heydeck. Because of an initial scarcity of Protestant pastors in the duchy, Heydeck traveled to Silesia, came in contact with Caspar Schwenckfeld here, and brought clergymen of his stripe to Prussia. The duke himself engaged in religious correspondence with Schwenckfeld in 1527-28. It was the followers of Schwenckfeld in Prussia who were in the first decade of the Reformation called Anabaptists by the Lutheran clergy. Between Schwenckfeld and the Lutheran bishop Paulus Speratus a colloquium took place in the presence of the duke and Heydeck on Dec. 29 and 30, 1531. In 1532, upon inquiry by the duke, Luther demanded the expulsion of all the Sacramentist (Reformed) and Anabaptist elements out of the duchy. In the early years of Albrecht's rule, some of the most important men, even some of his councilors, were Anabaptists or akin to them. In 1536 Christian Entfelder (q.v.), a native of Carinthia, who was probably a preacher in the Moravian Anabaptist brotherhood 1526-27, became a ducal councilor, and in the next ten years was very influential at the court in Königsberg. Of him Speratus wrote to Poliander in 1539: "Entfelder is exceedingly cunning; he writes nothing on the sacraments but as a Sacramentist and as an Anabaptist"; and to a friend in Wittenberg in 1542: "I nominate Entfelder, formerly the antistes in Moravia."

In July 1541 the Dutch Humanist William Gnapheus became a ducal councilor, though it was known of him that he was "not ill informed and learned in the Scripture," but otherwise "somewhat attached to the Anabaptist or other fanatical sects." He held occasional theological lectures in the recently established University of Königsberg. On Feb. 22, 1542, Gerhard Westerburg of Cologne, known as an Anabaptist in Frankfurt, became a ducal councilor. Polyphem, the court librarian, and Pyrsus, the Dutch physician, held views similar to those of the above and were closely associated with them. To what extent they openly espoused their views is an open question. But their influence on the court was so great that the Lutheran bishop did not venture to oppose them publicly.

It is easily understood that under such circumstances Mennonite refugees would seek asylum in Prussia, especially in view of the close trade connections between the two countries. To Polish Prussia they could not yet go, since the Polish king had in 1526 had a large number of Danzig citizens executed because they were too ardently Protestant, and also since the incoming ships were carefully examined for heretics.

In the Prussian duchy, however, the first Dutch settlers came in 1527, locating in its western tip, in the Oberland that had been devastated by the Reuter war (1519-25). They were assigned to the desolate villages of Bardeyn (q.v.), Thierbach, Schmauch, Liebenau, Plehmen, and Robitten, with an area of about 9,000 acres. The first settlers were not Anabaptists, but by 15 years later these lands were almost exclusively occupied by Mennonites. The land-complex on which these Mennonites settled became the nucleus of the entire Mennonite settlement in East Germany. Refugees continued to come from the Netherlands to Bardeyn (q.v.) and the neighboring villages, while others of the settlers left; there was a constant fluctuation.

The theological position of the Dutch in the duchy reflected the first decades of the Reformation in the Netherlands. Until the early 1530's the immigrants were almost all Sacramentists (forerunners of the Anabaptists and also of the Zwinglians), who differed radically from Luther in their interpretation of the communion. After the middle 1530's following the appearance of Melchior Hofmann in the Netherlands, the Protestants in the Prussian lowlands were more and more of the Anabaptist persuasion.

The violence of the Münster episode (1534-35) and the attack by radical Anabaptists on the city hall in Amsterdam (1535) fanned the persecution mania of the Dutch and German authorities to the uttermost. But not only the revolutionary Anabaptists, but also the great mass of quiet Anabaptists who had nothing to do with violence, were persecuted with fire and sword. In this period therefore faraway Prussia, whose ruler was himself an imperial outlaw, in whose land the imperial laws against the Anabaptists were no longer valid, seemed a final place of refuge to the harassed souls.

In early 1535 a company of some 200 Moravian Anabaptist refugees came to Marienwerder by way of Thorn and Graudenz. A disputation with them revealed their "error," and they were banished. Nevertheless a part of them remained, protected by the mighty Baron of Heydeck.

After 1534 nearly every boat brought persecuted Anabaptists from the Netherlands to the shores of Prussia, especially to the Polish part. In the early summer of 1536 the estate Robitten near Bardeyn was given out to Johann Solius, an Anabaptist and a follower of Melchior Hofmann, but at the end of the year he left the estate and went to Danzig. There was a flow of Anabaptists into Danzig and to the rest of West Prussia (q.v.), although it cannot be determined which were the revolutionary type and which were peaceful Anabaptists.

(2) Peaceful Anabaptists in the Duchy. Soon after

Menno Simons came upon the scene, the entire Anabaptist movement (including that part in Prussia) took quieter channels. The Dutch refugees now sought not only a temporary place of refuge in the Oberland, but were obviously settling there permanently. Therefore a second area of about 4,500 acres about six miles north of Prussian Holland was given them in 1539, giving their total settlement about 30 square miles. In 1538-39 a number of families were negotiating in Königsberg concerning these lands. It is significant that Christian Entfelder conducted the negotiations for the government. The spokesman of the Dutch was Herman Sachs, who was known to have been an Anabaptist before he left the Netherlands. The village of Schönberg with 1,800 acres of land was to be occupied first by them; later Judendorf and Greulsberg were to follow. In religious matters they were to obey their local diocese. They were released from compulsory state labor. All mention of military service was omitted from this treaty in contrast to those made with the Sacramentist Dutch immigrants of 1527-29. Very likely the Anabaptist settlers wished to have these passages eliminated, especially in order to distinguish them from the Münsterite group.

The Dutch settlers were punctual in meeting their financial obligations, but in church relationships they soon aroused the ill will of Bishop Speratus. A letter of complaint written by the local parson in 1542 made it clear that the Dutch did not give weight to either the sacrament of the altar or that of baptism, that they did not go to the Lutheran churches in general, and acted contrary to the Prussian church regulations. Until then they had had a preacher, the letter went on: on Sunday they met with his widow, who read to them from the Bible, though they were forbidden to have a preacher of their own and "to preach secretly." All these facts show that these people were quiet Anabaptists.

Suddenly these conditions came to an end; a church inspection was made by the duke with his bishops and councilors in early 1543. It was ascertained that the Dutch immigrants did not adhere to the Prussian church discipline in matters of communion and baptism. They were thereupon ordered to place persons with "pure doctrine" on their farms and leave by Pentecost. Most of them were loyal to their faith. A small minority promised to obey the Prussian church constitution in order to be able to remain. But Bishop Speratus kept a watchful eye on these, for the same heresy again became evident, so that the bishop had to threaten them with expulsion in 1550.

This first Anabaptist settlement in East Prussia was given a mortal blow by the order of expulsion of 1543, though some isolated new settlements were still made. In 1557 Tonnies Florissen owned the village of Schönberg as mayor. He was the only one paying taxes until 1561, although he had his property together with the other Mennonites in the Danzig Werder. Schönberg was temporarily held as a land reserve until the areas in the Tiegenhof district (see West Prussia) were opened to the Mennonites for settlement in 1562. Now the 30 square miles in the Oberland were no longer needed; they had already been given up in large part with their woods and hills, having been little suited to the Dutch mode of agriculture.

The Dutch colonists who settled on the city estates of Königsberg, especially in Rossgarten after the middle of the 1520's, fared exactly like those in the Oberland. Although they had a strong support in their fellow countrymen at court, the majority of the Dutch had to leave Königsberg for religious reasons. For in Königsberg-Rossgarten there was also a church inspection, which revealed the same deviations from Lutheran doctrine with respect to communion and baptism.

The Oberland Anabaptists we find again among the settlers who were placed on the flooded lands of the Danzig lowlands in 1547. The Anabaptists of Königsberg may also to a large extent have gone to Danzig or Elbing; this would explain the sudden increase in the number of Anabaptists in these cities in the next few years.

The Anabaptists who moved from the duchy to the Danzig Werder and to Polish Prussia in 1543 belonged for the most part to the group later called Mennonites; for there is no mention of any other wing after this time in Prussia. Menno Simons himself visited the Anabaptists here in 1549.

In spite of the various decrees of expulsion, the Mennonites were able to maintain themselves in Königsberg (q.v.) even after 1543. In 1579 they presented to the ruler a statement of their chief doctrines and a petition for permission to settle freely in the duchy. The reply was negative, because they "first of all regarded the sacrament of infant baptism quite offensively and mockingly." By May they were to leave the country. Church and school inspections continued to show that "all kinds of rabble and sects, especially the Anabaptists, had settled in the duchy." This is also shown by the continued issuing of decrees of expulsion. In 1669 they received some recognition; the Mennonites were permitted to come to the country on business, but not to settle permanently in either town or rural areas; when their business was finished they had to return to their home towns. Nevertheless some Mennonites acquired property at this time, although no congregation was formed.

(3) The Mennonite Congregations of East Prussia as Daughter Colonies of West Prussia. Pietism and Rationalism broke wide gaps into the dogmatism of the Lutheran Church in the 17th and 18th centuries. The tolerance extended to the Reformed and Catholics for a century was now also applied to the Mennonites. When Frederick I of Prussia in 1710 tried with all the means at his disposal to settle Swiss Mennonite refugees—without success, to be sure—in the towns of East Prussia in Lithuania which had been depopulated by the plague, a new era began for Mennonite history in East Prussia.

The efforts of the West Prussian Mennonites at settlement in East Prussia in the 18th century concentrate on two points. The first Mennonite craftsmen and merchants to settle in Königsberg with the permission of the authorities came in 1716. One of their specialties was the distillation of a certain whiskey "in the Danzig manner." They brought trades to Königsberg which had existed there only in a primitive state or not at all. In 1722 a small but prosperous congregation was organized, with members from Danzig and Elbing, and a few of Dutch birth. In 1735 the young congregation numbered 22 families, and later under Frederick the Great 35 families. Though they were small in number in 1769, they built a church, and two almshouses with facilities for six families.

The second region in which West Prussian Mennonites settled after 1713 is the delta mouth of the Memel and its left tributary, the Gilge. Here they found a colonization site that suited their way of farming better than the woods and hills of Preussisch-Holland. Most of them came from the Graudenz and Culm lowlands along the Vistula, and formed a congregation of the Frisian branch. Some of the names of the colonists have been handed down from 1722, names at that time found almost exclusively in the Frisian congregations in West Prussia: Albrecht, Barthel, Becker, Eckert, Frantzen, Funck, Harms, Heinrichsen, Jansen, Kettler, Lorentz, Penner, Quapp, Quiring, Rhode, Schröder, Siebert, Sperling, Schmidt, and Weitgraf.

The colonizing contracts of this group show a tendency similar to that of their compatriots who had been shut out from the Oberland 200 years before. They were guaranteed freedom of religion and of trade, were permitted to elect their own mayor, divide the land among themselves without anyone else, and the division was to be "as binding as if they had been done in court." They accepted a piece of land, and paid a large price for it in order to arrange everything according to their own wishes. They wanted to build up their religious, political, and economic life according to their own ideas, at a time when almost everything was determined by an absolute ruler.

The Memel lowland with its excellent meadows gave the Mennonites almost the same living conditions as did West Prussia. Their knowledge of cattle raising and of butter and cheese manufacture assured them a decided advantage over the native peasants. In 1723 they were supplying the market in Königsberg nearly 400 tons of "Mennonite" cheese, which was known all over East Germany as Tilsit cheese. But in the next year they were expelled from the Memel lowlands; this attempt at colonization was ended. Frederick William would not tolerate in his country any who would not be soldiers. Only the Mennonite merchants in Königsberg who were indispensable because of their contributions to the taxes, were permitted to stay.

When Frederick the Great came to the throne in 1740 with his principle of toleration, he issued a declaration that guaranteed tolerance to the Mennonites as to all other subjects; the way was now opened to them to make new settlements along the Memel. The Lithuanian congregation (q.v.) then came into being, which had in 1772 a membership of over 200 souls, and in 1890 with its 743 souls within the government district of Gumbinnen (q.v.) reached its highest point. In 1891 it acquired the rights of incorporation. In its final period before its dissolution in 1945, it is worth noting that in the 1920's this congregation, called Memelniederung (q.v.), engaged a theologically trained pastor, but in 1931 returned to the lay ministry. A peculiarity of this congregation was the use of the liturgy of the Lutheran Church. In 1940 the congregation still had a membership of 450 souls. Both this congregation and the smaller Königsberg congregation were completely wiped out by the Russian conquest in 1944-45. Numerous survivors however reached West Germany and are now scattered throughout the country. H.P.

East Reserve, Man. "Reserve" was the name given to a contiguous tract of land set aside by the Canadian government for a certain number of years for exclusive occupation by a homogeneous group of settlers, to be divided according to their own plans. Two different reserves were provided for the immigrant Mennonites from Russia. One, the East Reserve, was identical with the land grant of seven (later raised to eight) townships (each six miles square) offered to the Mennonite delegates from Russia in 1873, and coextensive with the present Municipality of Hanover, which lies just east of the Red River, its northern boundary being about 20 miles southeast of Winnipeg, its southernmost boundary about 20 miles north of the United States border. Its total acreage is 185,000 or 290 sq. mi. The West Reserve was established three years later, and made about two and one-half times as large as the East Reserve. Its boundaries were changed several times but corresponded roughly with those of the present Municipality of Rhineland and portions of adjoining municipalities, lying just west of the Red River, including 17 townships (612 sq. mi.). The names are still locally used to indicate the two major Mennonite settlements in Manitoba, although the old grants cover only the nucleus of the two areas of present-day Mennonite concentration in Manitoba. They represent the two largest compact Mennonite settlements in Canada (or the United States), and manifest many unique characteristics.

The East Reserve had never been meant to accommodate all intended Mennonite immigrants from Russia, at that time still estimated as 40,000 in number. Doubts as to the desirability of the area offered to them by the government had already arisen in the minds of the delegates of the land search committee of 1873, so that they, before returning to Russia to report, had requested the privilege of selecting, at a later date, some other portion of the country under the same conditions under which the original grant was made. When the first rather dry year (1874) was followed by several unusually wet seasons, it became quite clear that the East Reserve not only had a shallow stony soil texture in many parts, but suffered also from excessive moisture. As late as 1941 only 45 per cent (75,000 acres) of the land was improved, in contrast to the Rhineland Municipality of the West Reserve where 96 per cent (220,000 acres) was improved.

While all other early settlers came from woodlands and consequently sought the wooded hills further west, Mennonites had been adjusted in Russia to life in the open steppes and preferred the open prairies. They knew how to strike living water from level ground, how to build comfortable huts, and how to heat them, too, without a stick of wood; they also knew how to plant shelter belts for protection against the icy winds of the northern plains. Moreover, the open-field system of farming which they practiced, unknown among other settlers, did not require any wood for fences at a time when barbed wire had not yet been made available to provide cheap enclosures for the scattered farmsteads of the West. Thus the West Reserve, laid out between Emerson and Mountain City, at a depth of 18 miles north of the United States boundary, was really the first permanent agricultural settlement ever established in the open prairies of Western Canada without direct access to a major body or current of water. It also turned out to be some of the best farm land in the whole province of Manitoba. When this area was finally set aside "for the exclusive use of Mennonites from Russia" by Order-in-Council of April 25, 1876, the two Reserves together included 25 townships of over 500,000 acres, that is, about 6 per cent of the total area of Manitoba up to 1881.

The colonists who settled the East Reserve were composed of two groups: (1) the smaller Kleine Gemeinde group (some 35 families out of an original 100 who had left Russia, 30 families being diverted to Jansen, Neb., en route, and 30 families refusing to settle on the wet land of the East Reserve and locating instead near Morris, just west of the Red River in what was called the Scratching River Colony), a schism of the Molotschna settlement in 1812, which had left the Molotschna in 1865-66 to settle in the Borozenko settlement and in part in Fürstenland, near the more conservative Mennonite Church groups which had settled in these areas from the Chortitza settlement (often called the Old Colony); and (2) the much larger (507 families) Bergthal group, which had left the Chortitza settlement in 1836-52 to found the Bergthal settlement (and which was accordingly Old Colony). The Bergthal settlement had consisted of 540 families living in five villages of the Bergthal volost, all but 34 families (who stayed in the Old Country) of which joined in the mass migration to North America. Of the total number of migrants, 453 families moved to Manitoba and settled in the East Reserve in 1874-79, while 53 families went to Mountain Lake, Minn. The Bergthal group in the East Reserve was joined by 45 families from the Chortitza settlement in Russia, and 9 families from Puchtin. From this group a gradual drift of a considerable number of families to the West Reserve set in early, which by 1887 composed almost half (220 families) of the total Bergthal group (246 families remaining in the East Reserve). The West Reserve was settled first by the "Fürstenland" group, from the Fürstenland settlement in Russia which had been established in 1869 by settlers from the Chortitza settlement and was almost as large as the Bergthal settlement, and also "Old Colony." This group emigrated en masse to Manitoba and occupied much of the West Reserve in 1875-79, forming a compact settlement. The rest of the West Reserve settlement was composed of the Bergthal transfer mentioned above.

The Kleine Gemeinde group in the East Reserve settled in five villages in the northern part of the East Reserve, viz., Blumenhof, Blumenort, Grünfeld-Kleefeld, Steinbach, and Rosenfeld. The 24 villages permanently established in the East Reserve by the Bergthal group were Osterwick, Hochfeld, Reinfeld, Chortitza, Schönthal, Kronsthal, Bergthal, Rosenthal, Ebenfeld, Schönfeld, Rosengart, Blumstein, Schönsee, Burwalde, Kronsgart, Hochstadt, Grünthal, Gnadenfeld, Friedrichsthal, Hochstadt, Reichenbach, Barkfeld, Neubarkfeld, and Tannau, in addition to part villages and those which were soon abandoned such as Pastwa.

The founding of colonies such as the East Reserve was nothing new to the Mennonites. To their minds, a Reserve in Manitoba was in no way different from a daughter-colony in Russia or elsewhere in the world. Accordingly, they simply followed a pattern which they considered to be the reflection of their own sacred traditions, although in reality it was largely a result of the master plan provided by the Russian Colonial Law. This pattern included (1) village habitat, (2) open-field system, (3) separation between church and civil government, (4) autonomy both on a village and regional level, corresponding to village commune and district volost in Russia, and (5) a series of subsidiary institutes such as school, Waisenamt (q.v.), and fire insurance.

The settlement pattern of the Mennonite village in the East Reserve, as it had been in Russia, was that of the northeast German colonial Gewanndorf characterized by a combination of line village with open-field economy. Each holding included a Hauskörgl (message, toft) along the village street and one strip in each of the "Gewanne" (open fields) into which the total area belonging to the village was divided. The toft provided space for house and farm buildings, barnyard, flower and vegetable garden, an orchard, and a small piece of plowland to be used for bulkier crops for home consumption, such as potatoes or cabbage. The fields were larger areas of plowland selected in such a way that the value of all land in each field, as determined by distance, soil quality, moisture, etc., was uniform, providing an equitable share in the available arable land of each villager. The size and number of fields varied greatly according to local conditions. The remaining village territory was set aside for utilization as woodland, hayland, and pasture. As the name open-field system indicates, there were no enclosures because all livestock belonging to individual villagers was pastured in common under the care of a herdsman, and in this way prevented from wandering about and damaging the crops. Moreover, after harvest the arable fields themselves were used for stubble pasture. Each homesteader was entitled to send out a definite number of animals with the village herd and to take a fixed amount of hay and wood from the common lands. Additional rights in these common lands and services were sometimes granted to either villagers or outsiders; in this case the rent or other payments collected were added to the income of the commune. This village system was ultimately abandoned in Manitoba, being finally discontinued in the East Reserve in 1909.

The open-field system is closely associated with the practice of crop rotation. A four-crop rotation with summer fallow (called Schwarzbrache) had been introduced by Johann Cornies among the Mennonites in Russia, and was brought by them to Canada where fallowing was particularly important in order to preserve moisture in the soil. As a rule, Flurzwang is an obvious concomitant of the open-field system, whereby all the owners of individual strips in a given field are compelled to plant the same crop or fallow at the same time. Since headlands and roads were usually kept at a minimum to facilitate weed control and save valuable plowland, all farmers had to agree upon a rigid rhythm in their operations so as to give each one access to his property in season. This frequently required the close co-operation of several farmers or even of the whole village, particularly during harvest when time was at a premium.

The village organization briefly described above may be called the solidaristic type of settlement. For it presupposes and fosters strong social coherence, intensive interaction on a face-to-face level, readiness to co-operate and offer mutual aid, and a common value system which leaves few alternatives in one's everyday conduct, and which is enforced by strict social controls based on both inner and external sanctions. In fact, it would appear that it cannot be made to work adequately unless these sanctions have a distinctly religious connotation. For whenever hedonistic and other secular values become dominant, undermining the inner consistency of the total system of constituent group norms perceived in a religious context, the solidaristic type of rural community organization soon tends to collapse, yielding to characteristically individualistic forms of social and economic behavior.

Such was the settlement pattern which the Mennonites intended to reproduce faithfully in Canada's West. Yet, allowance had to be made for the essentially individualistic property system embodied in the Dominion Lands Act. According to it, legal title to land could not be vested in whole village communes as had been the case in Prussia or in Russia, but had to be acquired by each homesteader individually. Moreover, the unit of land measurements was a regular square, nowhere following the natural topography of the country. Planning after the traditional pattern was further restricted through the withdrawal of four sections in every township, sections 8 and 26 being reserved for sale by the Hudson's Bay Company, while sections 11 and 29 were set aside for sale by the Provincial Government for the support of schools.

Accordingly, in selecting the sites of future villages, the Mennonite pioneers had to do some careful surveying and figuring so as to fit the precise number of prospective villagers to the available surrounding area, measured in terms of quarter-sections to be taken up by each of them. They also had to consider the quality of the land, access to water and wood, the location of the village site in relation to its area of land, and its adequacy for building purposes. Once this problem in geometry was solved, however, the individual claims for homesteads were entered haphazardly, for legal ownership in any particular quarter-section had no real significance when the land was finally divided and laid out in common fields with individual strips in each of them, in common pastures, and so on.

While this method of land division, which was actually contrary to the intentions of the Canadian land laws, was made possible by the special concessions granted to the Mennonites by the Dominion Government, it rested on an entirely voluntary basis. Whoever claimed, or would claim in the future, full possession of the particular quarter-section legally entered under his name, could in no way be prevented from doing so. Unlike in Russia, the law of the country did not support the open-field system, so that its institution and maintenance depended entirely on the strength of inner sanctions and social controls among the group itself. Although in the beginning the wishes of most group members favored the establishment of compact villages, there were even then a few who preferred to settle individually on their own pieces of land.

A second adjustment was indicated by the topography of the country. Since this was different in the two Reserves, certain definite variations in the overall settlement pattern resulted. According to the earliest survey maps the East Reserve looked like this: In the northwestern corner there was rolling prairie land interspersed with marshy patches, willow brush, and undergrowth. To the east, part of a big swamp, most of which lay outside the Reserve, made a dent into otherwise open land. Next to it there was more shrub and bush. In the center of the Reserve only the environs of the present town of Steinbach were marked "clear prairie" or at least "prairie with bluffs of poplar and tamarack." From there a high gravel ridge ran southwest to the present site of Grünfeld, and a small ridge just north of it. Most of the center was broken land marked on the maps as poplar, willow, tamarack, slough, burnt stumps, granite stones, gravel, and lots of weeds as a whole; though drainage seems to have been better here than in townships to the south where numerous sloughs are shown on the maps.

In the beginning, village sites were obviously chosen in natural clearings or on high land. The two gravel ridges alone gave rise to six or seven villages. Several sites chosen in a dry season had to be abandoned afterwards when the water level rose again. The villages founded in wooded land were inevitably strung along the banks of a river or creek; in these cases the village street followed the characteristic slant of the country from southeast to northwest. In open country, however, the rows of houses were parallel to section lines, usually running east and west as a protection against the north winds.

Although the location of some villages was changed in the course of time, while many others have disappeared altogether, an inspection of mounds marking basements and foundations, together with accounts gathered from old-timers, have made it possible to reconstruct the exact location of most of them. In 1877, when population density in the East Reserve was higher than at any other time before 1900, 38 villages were in existence. Five of them, on better soil and larger than the average, were occupied by the Kleine Gemeinde people, while all the others belonged to the Bergthal group. Not all the places mentioned, however, were fully organized village communes. Some were either small hamlets (Schanzenburg, Pastwa, Strassberg, Heuboden, Tannau, Eigengrund, Eigenhof, Ebenfeld, Vollwerk, Lichtenau, and Landskron), or incomplete villages planned to accommodate large numbers of later immigrants who never arrived. Most of the settlements laid out in the early years in township 7-4 East, and east and south of the gravel ridge, either on wet or on poor soil, were soon abandoned when better land west of the Red River became available, causing a partial exodus from the East Reserve (Pastwa, Strassberg, Neuendorf, Felsenton, Hamberg, Schönberg, Schönhorst, and Neuhorst, somewhat later also Burwalde). On the other hand, a few new hamlets and villages were founded in later years in areas left unoccupied during the first period of settlement (Blumengart, Silberfeld, and Neubarkfeld, a daughter colony of Barkfeld).

The further history of the East Reserve will be told in the article Manitoba. It will suffice to report only a few points here. The Kleine Gemeinde group suffered a serious schism in 1881, when the elder and over a third of the members withdrew to join the Church of God in Christ (Holdeman) Mennonites. By 1885 also almost half of the Bergthal families had transferred to the West Reserve, and a full separation between the two groups occurred in that year. The East Reserve Bergthal Church then changed its name to Chortitz Mennonite Church to demonstrate its full disapproval of the other group. Thus since 1885 there have been three basic groups in the East Reserve: Chortitz, Kleine Gemeinde, and Holdeman group. In 1944 these groups had respectively the following population—3,223, 1,365, 957, while three newly established congregations of the General Conference Mennonites had 1,101. There were also two smaller Mennonite Brethren churches established in 1927-29, and one Evangelical Mennonite Brethren church established about 1900. In 1954 the baptized membership of these groups in the East Reserve (and closely adjacent territory) was as follows: Chortitz 1,480; Kleine Gemeinde 1,248; Holdeman 1,012; General Conference 900(?); Mennonite Brethren 427; E.M.B. 312, a total of 5,379.

Emigration from the East Reserve had established or contributed to the following new settlements: Holdeman group to Swalwell, Alberta; Kleine Gemeinde to Chihuahua State in Mexico; Chortitz to the Paraguayan Chaco (815 persons and 13 families). Practically none of the Chortitz group went to Mexico. E.K.F., H.S.B.

East Swamp Mennonite Church (GCM) of the Eastern District Conference is located in Milford Twp., Bucks Co., Pa. In 1771 the Swamp congregation built a schoolhouse about a mile east of its meetinghouse. It is not known whether this school was also destroyed by fire and a second log house was built which served the double purpose of school and meetinghouse. In 1850 the present brick meetinghouse was erected; in late years it has been greatly enlarged and altered. From the earliest days East Swamp and West Swamp were one congregation. In 1847 under the leadership of their minister John Oberholtzer, both meetinghouses and all but a few members joined the new conference. In 1877, because of increased growth, East Swamp became a separate congregation, and in 1921 it chose its own minister.

Known ministers and their terms of service are: Michael Musselman 1773 (?)-90, Jacob Nold 1794-1817, Samuel Musselman 1808-47, Christian Bliem 1814-31, Christian Zetty 1817-43, Jacob Hiestand 1832-42, John H. Oberholtzer 1842-88, William N. Shelly 1847-58, Levi O. Shimmel 1858-69, Andrew B. Shelly 1864-1904, Harvey Gottshall 1901-13, Harvey Shelly and Victor Boyer supplied during 1914, Harvey G. Allebach 1915-21, Victor Boyer, Joseph Hagenbush, Reed Landes, Grover Soldner, and Freeman Swartz supplied 1921-25, Howard G. Nyce 1925-29, William Rivelle supplied 1929-30, William S. Gottshall 1930-39, Harold Burkholder 1938-45, Abraham H. Schultz 1945- .

The Sunday school was organized in 1866 or earlier, and in 1911 a Christian Endeavor was organized. The membership in 1864 was 79, in 1902 it was 119, and in 1953 it was 196. The common names today are Landis, Auckland, Bleam, Barndt, Shelly, Schaeffer, and Hallman. J.H.F.

East Union Conservative Amish Mennonite Church is located approximately seven miles east of Wooster, Ohio, a short distance north of U.S. Highway 30.

It was first listed in the Mennonite Yearbook in 1948 under "Pleasant View and East Union" and was listed as a separate congregation for the first time in the 1950 yearbook. In 1953 the congregation had 87 members, who were served by the ministers Paul Kandel and Mose Swartzendruber.

East Union Mennonite Church (MC), located three miles north of Kalona, Johnson Co., Iowa, was organized in 1884 under the leadership of Christian Warey, having come out of the large Old Order Amish settlement in this locality. It first met for worship at the Prairie Dale schoolhouse, 1½ miles west of the present location, and was known as the Union Church. Christian Warey was ordained bishop the following year, with Jacob B. Yoder as deacon. Others who have served as deacon, minister, or bishop are A. J. Yoder, Jacob J. Schwartzendruber, Jacob S. Yoder, Fred Gingerich, S. C. Yoder, A. C. Brenneman, Harold Brenneman, and Edward Shetler.

The East Union congregation was a member of the Western A.M. Conference until the merger of 1921 and since then has been a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference. The present church was built in 1922, and is the largest Mennonite church of its branch west of the Mississippi. The ministers in 1955 were D. J. Fisher, bishop; A. Lloyd Swartzendruber, assistant bishop; J. John J. Miller, minister; and Henry H. Miller, deacon; the membership was 565.

East White Oak Mennonite Church, unaffiliated, located in McLean Co., Ill., 7½ miles southeast of Carlock, was organized in 1892 with Peter Schantz as pastor, and a church was built in the same year. Emanuel Troyer was ordained as assistant pastor in 1899, and later succeeded Schantz as bishop or elder of the church, which he served until 1928. R. J. Zehr was then called to serve as pastor. The church was a member of the Central Conference of Mennonites from its beginning until 1934, at which time it severed its relation with the conference and has since operated as an independent organization. In 1934 the membership was 260.

East Zorra Amish Mennonite Church, located near Tavistock in East Zorra Twp., Oxford Co., Ont., is a member of the Ontario A.M. Conference. The East Zorra congregation was organized about 1837 as an offshoot from the Wilmot congregation and was joined by other families from Pennsylvania and Europe. Services were held in private homes until 1883, when the 16th Line meetinghouse was built. Preaching was conducted every Sunday since 1883. In 1903 a Sunday school was organized and this was alternated with the preaching services. Since 1933 both Sunday school and preaching services have been held every Sunday. The church has had young people's meeting since 1920. All services were in the German language until 1932. Singing schools were held frequently. In 1925 the church was enlarged to accommodate nearly 800 persons. In 1935 an Evangelical church four miles southeast was bought and remodeled to seat 200 persons. It is now known as the Cassel church. In 1942 a building in Tavistock was also rented to provide for the overflow. This building was used until July 1950, when a new church was built on the west outskirts of Tavistock, which is known as the Tavistock church. It seats around 350. In 1951 the East Zorra church was removed and a new and large building with basement and gallery was built, seating about 900. In December 1932 the first four-week winter Bible school was held here. It met every year until 1941, when it was closed through the war years, reopening in 1947 in Tavistock, and two years later was again held at the East Zorra church, where it has been held ever since. Since 1940 summer Bible school has been held at East Zorra, and since 1950 in Tavistock. The membership of 230 in 1890 had increased to 910 by 1953. (For a list of ministers who have served these congregations see L. J. Burkholder's history.) The following were the ministers in 1954: bishops Daniel Jutzi, Henry Jantzi; ministers Daniel Wagler, Menno Kipfer, Joel Swartzentruber, and David Swartzentruber; deacons Andrew Zehr and Daniel Zehr.

L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites in Ontario (Toronto, 1935).

Eastern Amish Mennonite Conference, one of three (the others Indiana-Michigan A.M., and Western A.M.) conferences (MC) organized among the more progressive Amish Mennonite congregations after the Amish Mennonite General Conferences (Diener-Versammlungen) of 1862-78 had been discontinued. The Eastern A.M. Conference, covering the territory east of Indiana, actually Ohio and Pennsylvania, was organized in 1893 and held its last session in May 1927. The formal merger with the Ohio Mennonite Conference to form the Ohio Mennonite and Eastern A.M. Joint Conference took place on Dec. 9, 1927. In 1927 it had 19 organized congregations (several had more than one meetinghouse) with a baptized membership of 5,187. Ten of these were in Ohio (Fulton County at three places, Oak Grove and South Union at West Liberty, Walnut Creek and Martin's Creek in Holmes County, Oak Grove and Orrville in Wayne County, Beech in Stark County, Plain View in Portage County, East Orwell in Ashtabula County) and nine in Pennsylvania (Conestoga and Millwood-Maple Grove in Lancaster County; Allensville and Belleville in Mifflin County with near-by Mattawana; Maple Grove in the west at New Wilmington; Westover, Md.; and the small congregations at Oyster Point, Va., and Long Green, Md.) The conference customarily met annually the last week in May. It contained an unusual number of large and strong congregations with many able leaders both in the conference and in general church work. Among these were John S. Mast (1861-1951) of Morgantown, Pa.; S. E. Allgyer (1859-1953) and A. I. Yoder (1866-1932) of West Liberty, Ohio; E. B. Stoltzfus (1860-1942) of Aurora, Ohio; E. L. Frey (1856-1942) of Wauseon, Ohio; J. S. Gerig (1866-) and C. Z. Yoder (1845-1939) of Smithville, Ohio; O. N. Johns (1889-) of Louisville, Ohio; I. W. Royer (1873-) of Orrville, Ohio, and Aaron Mast (1880-) of Belleville, Pa. H.S.B.

Eastern District Conference of the General Conference Mennonite Church. During the second quarter of the 19th century great changes entered into American religious life. A resurgence of revivalism and evangelical fervor broke through widespread deadness in many denominations. Throughout the country, home and foreign mission boards, tract and temperance societies, church colleges and seminaries, religious literature and periodicals, and Sunday schools were founded.

The Mennonites of the Franconia Conference (MC) in southeastern Pennsylvania, in spite of their attempted isolation, also felt the impact of this new religious environment, with its new visions of opportunity and responsibility. Locally the Pennsylvania Public School Law of 1834, with its emphasis on the English language and American cultural patterns, had a profound, though quiet, influence upon traditionally minded German Mennonites, especially those of the younger generation.

In the 1840's some of the younger ministers of the Franconia Conference, including John H. Oberholtzer of Swamp, and Abraham Hunsicker of Skippack, manifested a more progressive spirit in church matters. Oberholtzer, a gifted schoolteacher and skilled locksmith, became a fervent preacher and student of the Scriptures. He organized children's meetings, printed a catechism, preached in other denominations, and refused to wear the regulation minister's coat. Because of this latter act, he and several like-minded ministers were excluded from the conference meeting in 1844. In seeking to be reinstated soon after, Oberholtzer became deeply impressed with the lack of proper procedure in conference. With no secretary, no minutes, no business nor voting procedure, irregularities were bound to occur in the applications of the old, unwritten church rules.

In the spring of 1847 Oberholtzer, encouraged by Abraham Hunsicker, drafted a conference constitution, which was unofficially accepted by a like-minded group of 16 ministers and deacons. On the following day at the spring conference Oberholtzer appeared, dressed in a regulation coat, to present his constitution, but was denied the opportunity to read it. The constitution was later printed and distributed among the ministers. At the fall conference the sponsors again appeared, asking for a committee to study the constitution. In the end, however, the conference adopted a vigorous resolution excommunicating all signers of the constitution unless they renounced it; if they did so they again would be received in love. That such controversy could occur between sincere brethren is indeed lamentable, especially since the issues involved concerned not the major doctrines of the church but rather new methods of promoting and preserving the old Gospel.

On Oct. 28, 1847, three weeks after the decision of the conference, the signers of the new constitution met at the Skippack meetinghouse to consider their future course. After due consideration of the conference resolution favoring the "old evangelical order," they decided that such would be conscientiously impossible. Thereupon, they adopted the new constitution, and the name, "The East Pennsylvania Conference of the Mennonite Church." This Skippack meeting marks the official founding of the present Eastern District Conference.

Those who attended this historic meeting were John Hunsicker, William Landis, John H. Oberholtzer, Abraham Hunsicker, Christian Clemmer, and Joseph Schantz, as ministers, and William Gottschall, John Detweiler, Henry B. Shelly, Jacob Benner, and Samuel Kaufman, as deacons. These men represented the entire congregations of West Swamp, East Swamp, Flatland, Skippack, Schwenksville, Upper Milford, Germantown, and Bertolet's; and elements of the congregations of Worcester, Providence, Rockhill, Saucon, Springfield, Boyertown, and Hereford. The Deep Run congregation was not represented at this meeting because the division there was purely a laymen's movement. Some of the signers were absent from this meeting. All in all, the new conference started with 8 ministers, 11 deacons, and 16 congregations, totaling about 500 members, or one fourth of the Franconia Conference. Of the 70 ministers and deacons in the Franconia Conference at that time, 16 withdrew including John Hunsicker, the senior bishop of the conference, one of the five bishops functioning at that time.

John H. Oberholtzer's constitution adopted by the new conference reveals that the aims of this group were not radical, but substantially followed traditional Mennonite doctrine and polity. The method and approach, however, were new. The early activities of the East Pennsylvania Conference verified this progressively traditional policy. The traditional forms of worship and vigorous discipline were continued alongside of such innovations as children's meetings and Sunday schools in the 50's, a conference Sunday-school union in 1876, a religious periodical, the Religiöser Botschafter, in 1852, the inward calling of ministers, ministerial support, pulpit fellowship with other denominations, and limited open communion.

A survey of the beginnings of religious groups in church history frequently reveals that the greater the birth pangs, the greater will be the growing pains. The East Pennsylvania Conference was no exception; its growing pains were severe. In 1851, the Hunsickers (John and Abraham) were excommunicated for advocating tolerance toward secret societies and more liberal interpretation of open communion than conference was willing to accept. In the middle 50's, the emotional religion and revivalism of the Methodist style began to penetrate the northern congregations in the form of prayer meetings. Matters came to a climax in 1858 when William N. Shelly, William Gehman, and five other ministers withdrew and formed the Evangelical Mennonite Conference (q.v.), one of the groups which later formed the Mennonite Brethren in Christ. The third and last controversy centered at Skippack over footwashing. This congregation, demanding the literal interpretation of this rite, and refusing to agree with the conference's spiritual interpretation, seceded in 1859 to become an independent congregation (called popularly the Johnson Mennonite Church, because the leader and most of the ministers after him had that name). The first two of these controversies reveal that conference was unwilling to accept either a weakened liberalism or a radical revivalism, though in so rejecting them it lost both the educated Hunsickers and men of evangelistic fervor. The last controversy, on the other hand, reveals the liberal spirit of conference as opposed to the more literal spirit of the minority, though again the fellowship of a strong congregation was lost to the young and struggling conference.

Following the organization of the East Pennsylvania Conference, John H. Oberholtzer vigorously championed a greater unification of Mennonites all over America. The East Pennsylvania Conference was also much interested in this movement, and in 1860 delegated Oberholtzer and Enos Loux to go to a church unification meeting at West Point, Iowa. At that historic meeting with Oberholtzer in charge, the General Conference was organized to include the East Pennsylvania congregations and the Iowa congregations. In a short time the congregations of like-minded brethren in Canada, Ohio, and Illinois joined this unification movement.

Publication activities continued through the years. Minutes, catechisms, reports, Sunday-school literature, and other papers were printed by conference at Milford Square. The Religiöser Botschafter became Das Christliche Volksblatt in 1856 and the Friedensbote in 1867, which in 1882 was merged with a western paper to become the G.C.M. German periodical, Der Christliche Bundesbote, now Der Bote. In 1885, N. B. Grubb and Allen M. Fretz, with the approval of conference, founded The Mennonite, which became the General Conference English periodical. In 1895, conference published the first Mennonite Yearbook and Almanac, which later became the official conference yearbook. The Conference has always had an active home mission program. Congregations organized by the Conference were Wadsworth, Ohio, in 1852; and in Pennsylvania Bowmansville in 1852, First Philadelphia in 1865, Souderton in 1893, Pottstown in 1895, Quakertown in 1899, Allentown in 1903, Perkasie in 1905, Lansdale in 1929, and Lancaster in 1946. During the last 50 years a group of congregations and missions have been added in central Pennsylvania (Fairfield, Richfield, Roaring Spring, etc.) and Stirling Avenue at Kitchener, Ont.

In the 1890's, Christian Endeavor societies were organized in many of the congregations, and were soon after followed by the organization of a conference Young People's Union. In 1928 a young people's retreat was organized, which since 1941 has been held at Men-O-Lan Retreat Grounds near Finland, Pa., owned and operated by the conference. In 1896 a home for the aged was begun at Frederick, Pa. A brotherhood organization for laymen was organized in 1918. An orphanage society and a women's organization have been active for many years. In many of these ventures the Eastern District Conference pioneered among American Mennonites.

According to the constitution, the Conference is made up of congregations which "taking the Sacred Scripture of the Old and New Testament as the only and infallible rule of faith and life, hold fast to the doctrine of salvation by grace through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and in their teaching and practice adhere to the Mennonite principles of administering baptism only on confession of faith, avoiding the use of all oaths, a life of meekness, peace, and Biblical inoffensiveness, and the practice of a Scriptural church discipline to the end of separating from the communion of believers the unrepentant and incorrigible transgressors against the laws of God."

Most of the controversial activities and methods early promoted by the Eastern District Conference are now accepted by the great body of Mennonites. The Eastern District Conference still differs from more conservative Mennonites in such things as the absence of detailed church rules, the absence of a prescribed religious garb, the use of a trained and supported ministry, a wider denominational fellowship, and open communion.

The 100th anniversary of the Eastern District Conference was observed in the historic Lower Skippack meetinghouse, with appropriate meetings on Oct. 26-28, 1947. The first issue of a conference periodical, The Messenger, was published at that time.

In 1956 the conference had 4,558 members in 28 congregations, with 25 active ministers and 52 deacons. J.H.F.

Eastern District Conference Brotherhood (GCM), probably the first laymen's organization among American Mennonites, was organized Aug. 11, 1918, at the Zion Mennonite meetinghouse, Souderton, Pa. This movement was first suggested in an address delivered by Maxwell H. Kratz at a Sunday-school convention in Perkasie in 1917. The purpose of this Brotherhood was "getting our men better acquainted with each other, keeping them more keenly interested in the various phases of the work of our church, fostering a stronger loyalty to its principles, and to have them stand together in Christian service."

The Brotherhood has done much pioneering work in fostering service and stewardship among the conference men. In 1919-23 the Brotherhood raised $41,663 for World War I relief, especially among the distressed Mennonites in Crefeld (Germany) and Russia, to be sent with clothing, etc., through the Mennonite Central Committee organized in 1920. Maxwell Kratz was a prime mover in both organizations. In 1924 and a few years after, over $1,000 was raised by the Brotherhood for the purchase of Mennonite historical items from the Pennypacker collection, for the Schwenkfelder Historical Library in Pennsburg, Pa. During the late twenties and early thirties several thousand dollars was given for the relief of Russian Mennonite refugees in Canada and South America. In 1921 pioneering work was started on pensions and salary standards for ministers in the conference.

The Brotherhood has done much for the fellowship and spiritual life of the men in the conference. Among the institutions it has fostered are rallies and deputation groups; an annual Labor Day Bible conference, held at Camp Men-O-Lan since 1946 with outstanding results; and an annual choral festival of 300 voices since 1951. The education of young ministers among South American Mennonites has been a late project.

The Brotherhood is made up of members from most of the conference congregations. However, local Brotherhood "chapters" hold monthly meetings at Lansdale, Denver, East Swamp (Bethany, Flatland, Springfield, West Swamp), and Kitchener. Early leaders in the Brotherhood were Maxwell H. Kratz, F. K. Moyer, and Seward M. Rosenberger.

Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC) was organized in 1914 (incorporated 1916) to serve the missionary interests of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. The organized interest in missions as such in the Lancaster district had its beginning about 1893. In the Paradise district of Lancaster Conference the first meeting to promote mission work was held on Sept. 15, 1893, by a group who called themselves Home Mission Advocates. In spite of opposition, they met regularly afterwards. The third regular meeting, held at Paradise on Nov. 14, 1895, was a very stirring occasion, at which strong opinions were expressed for and against the movement. It was learned here that official church leaders would not object to Sunday-school work. This then became the open door for the movement, and the group changed its name to Sunday School Mission, and for the next 22 years held regular quarterly meetings. Sunday schools were opened at several rural points in the county, beginning at Welsh Mountain. Work in Lancaster city soon followed, and by 1899 a city mission work was opened in Philadelphia.

The Sunday School Mission group became the pioneers of the mission activities now sponsored by Lancaster Conference. John H. Mellinger (1858-1952), at whose home the first meeting had been held, was chairman all through the 22 years of the Sunday School Mission, became the first chairman of the new board and continued until 1934, when he asked to be relieved after 41 years of leadership. To a large extent he molded the mission trends of the conference. J. A. Ressler, who later became one of the first two missionaries to India for the Mennonite Church (MC), was also a member of that group.

On June 8, 1914, a meeting was called by the secretary of the Lancaster Conference to organize a mission board, which was named Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. Since then the Board's work has become extensive and varied. It operated the Welsh Mountain Samaritan Home for the Aged. It has shared generously in past years in the war relief programs in Europe and in the migrations of European refugees to Paraguay, Canada, and the United States. It sponsors 67 home missions, including such cities as New York, N.Y.; Reading and Philadelphia, Pa.; Washington, D.C.; Brewton, Ala., and Tampa, Fla., and including 9 Negro missions and 3 centers for Jewish evangelism. In 1934 it opened foreign work in Tanganyika Territory, Africa. By 1953 there were 39 missionaries on furlough and on this field, and native membership was about 950 with about 600 additional catechumens. In 1948 approval of the Ethiopian government was received to open work in that country, and the first missionaries were soon on the field, with a total of 35 workers by 1953. In 1950 work was begun in Honduras, with five workers in 1953. A work was started in Luxembourg in 1951, with four workers in 1953. In 1953 work was opened in Italian Somaliland with four workers. The Board also sponsors work in Israel (started 1953) jointly with the Mission Board at Elkhart. A total of 87 foreign workers was serving under the Board in 1953. A system of voluntary short-term services was set up in 1948 to provide opportunities for the young people of the church. In 1953 the total income of the Board for all purposes was $390,000.

This Board co-operates with the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities at Elkhart, Ind., in the program sponsored by that Board in its various home and foreign missions. The Eastern Board officers in 1954 were as follows: Henry F. Garber, president; H. Raymond Charles, vice-president; Orie O. Miller, secretary; Paul Graybill, assistant secretary; and Ira Buckwalter, treasurer. The Board supports the work of the Mennonite Central Committee and has had a representative on it from the beginning in 1920.

Beginning with April 15, 1924, the Board has published its own organ, the Missionary Messenger, since May 15, 1925, a monthly, usually 16 pages, which is a rich source of material on the history and work of the Board. Beginning with 1952 it has published a comprehensive annual report; previously for many years the annual financial report was published. A mimeographed Newsletter has been issued regularly beginning with 1952. H.F.G.

Eastern Mennonite College. In the second decade of the 20th century, a number of Virginia Mennonite (MC) leaders believed there should be a church school in the East. It was observed that a great many Mennonite young people who attended the local high schools were being lost to the church. It was to prevent this loss and to establish a school that would promote the cause of the Mennonite Church, that steps were taken to organize a church school in the East. It was difficult to find a permanent location for the school. Warwick County and Alexandria, Va., were considered as possible locations in 1914 and 1915, but these were rejected because they were off center from the total Mennonite population in the East. The Assembly Park, a 16-acre forest area, 1½ miles northwest of Harrisonburg, with a large, three-story frame building which had been previously used as an industrial school, was chosen as the location, since it was located near the border between the Middle and the Northern districts of the Virginia Conference. This property was purchased in 1916, and used until the winter of 1920, when the college was moved to its permanent location on the hill west of the Assembly Park. The first building on the new site was a large (50 x 120 ft.) three-story tile stucco building providing classrooms, dormitories, dining hall and kitchen, and administration offices. In 1926 a south annex was constructed providing additional dormitories on the third and fourth floors, a new chapel on the first floor, and a science laboratory and dining room in the basement. With the exception of the gymnasium, no further major building enterprise was undertaken for more than a decade. In 1938 Vesper Heights Observatory was constructed as a class project. Its development has attracted wide attention.

In 1940 building operations were begun again on a large scale. The new north annex provided for science laboratories in the basement, a library on the entire first floor, and an infirmary on the second and third floors. The old frame building in the Assembly Park was razed and some of the material used in the construction of an industrial arts building. The largest unit of construction in the early 1940's was the auditorium with a seating capacity of 1,500. An assembly room in the basement provided accommodations for 500.

During World War II and several years following, building operations were practically at a standstill except for emergency building. In 1949 the board of trustees decided to undertake building again on a larger scale. Work was begun on the largest single building unit in the history of the school—the women's dormitory, which accommodates 250 persons and includes a larger kitchen and dining room as well as additional classrooms; it was completed in 1953.

The building program has not been the most important phase of life at Eastern Mennonite College. Curriculums have been added and expanded; accreditment has been sought and attained. Work of college grade was offered first in 1920. In the following years, two and three years of college work were offered. In 1930 the College was accredited by the state as a standard junior college. Two years later the College received state approval for a two-year teacher's training course leading to a normal professional certificate. A Bible course of college grade has been offered from almost the first. The course has been expanded along with the general college work, so that in 1937, a four-year Bible course leading to the Th.B. degree was offered. A four-year liberal arts college program was initiated in 1945. The Virginia State Board of Education in 1947 gave Eastern Mennonite College the rating of a standard four-year college with permission to grant the A.B., B.S., B.S. in Education, B.R.E., and Th.B. (6-yr.) degrees.

The college now (1955) offers the following curriculums: Bachelor of Arts, Bachelor of Science, Premedical Course, Bachelor of Science in Home Economics, Bachelor of Arts in Secondary Education, Bachelor of Science in Secondary Education, Bachelor of Science in Elementary Education, and Bachelor of Science in Nursing; in the Bible School, the Christian Workers' Course, Junior College Bible Course, Bachelor of Religious Education, and Bachelor of Theology.

These increased offerings and accreditment by the State Board has meant much from the standpoint of enrollment. In the 1930's the enrollment was around 50 students; by 1952 it had increased to 260, almost exclusively members of the Mennonite Church (MC). The College also operates a strong high-school division with about 200 students. In 1955-56 the total enrollment was 623, with 381 in the college, and 242 in the high school.

By 1955-56 the College was staffed by 41 teaching faculty members. Six of this number have the doctor's degree, or its equivalent, and two are candidates.

A large variety of extracurricular activities is provided. The Christian service activities are under the direction of a Director of Christian Service and the Young People's Christian Association. This provides an outlet of expression for the religious emphasis in all departments of training. The college is characterized by a strong religious atmosphere and a conservative viewpoint. It aims to train youth for service in the church and has for its motto "Thy Word Is Truth."

The school is owned and operated by the Virginia Mennonite Conference through a board of 17 trustees elected for a three-year term by the conference. In addition there is a Religious Welfare Committee of four elected by the conference. (ML I, 498 f.)†

Eastern Mennonite College Bulletin, first issued in May 1922 as the Eastern Mennonite School Bulletin, is the official organ of Eastern Mennonite College, now published monthly by the board of trustees to inform friends of the college about the work of the school. It includes annual reports of the administrative officers and special numbers dealing with current developments and needs. The annual catalog constitutes one number. H.A.B.

Eastern Mennonite College Journal was first published in January 1923 as the Eastern School Journal. In January 1924 the name was changed to The Eastern Mennonite School Journal. It was edited by members of the faculty until 1929, when student editors took over the work. Historically an important number of the paper was the enlarged pictorial commencement number. In the spring of 1949 it was decided to make the commencement number a separate publication. The name of the paper was changed to The Eastern Mennonite College Journal in April 1948. In June 1956 it was discontinued. It was published monthly during the school year, 30 pages in size. H.A.B.

Eastern Mennonite College High School (called Academy until 1927) from the beginning has been a very important division of instruction at Eastern Mennonite College. The first year of high school was given during the first regular school year 1917-18, with a full high-school course offered the second year. There were seven graduates in 1919 and five in 1920, which was the smallest class in the history of the school. The enrollment continued to grow until there was a graduating class of more than 80, although it has declined somewhat in recent years, due to the organization of church high schools in other places in the East such as Lancaster Mennonite School. The high school, while a part of the total institution, is under its own director.

The curriculum has been enriched by the addition of a wide range of electives including art, bookkeeping, typewriting, German, oral expression, chemistry, home economics, youth guidance, and physics, as well as additional courses in history and mathematics. Seventeen units, including two units of Bible work, have been required for graduation from the first.

An effort is being made to retain the values of the high-school course in spite of an increased enrollment and emphasis in the college department of the school. Separate meetings in various types of activities have been provided for the two groups. The Young People's Christian Association has been reorganized to give high-school students more responsibility in the form of leadership and committee work. The high-school enrollment in 1954-55 was 224. H.A.B.

Eastern Mennonite Convalescent Home, an institution established by the Franconia Mennonite Conference (MC) in 1942. A board of seven brethren from the churches in the Franconia Conference District were appointed by the bishops to serve as trustees. A charter for the institution was granted Dec. 14, 1942. The buildings are beautifully located on Highway 309 near Hatfield, Pa., with accommodations for 16 patients. In the rear of the main buildings is a separate building, the first floor of which is used for a laundry and garage and the second floor for the workers' rooms when they are not on duty.

Although established for the care of members of the Mennonite Church, a majority of the guests have been non-Mennonites. Sunday school is held every Sunday morning and a worship service every two weeks. A midweek song service is held every two weeks. Devotions are conducted every morning. The nurses read the Scripture once every week to those who are unable to read. M. K. Kerr and his wife serve at the present time (1953) as steward and matron. J.W.K.

Eastern Mennonite Home, Souderton, Pa., a home for the aged in the Franconia Conference (MC) though not officially under conference control. On Oct. 7, 1915, the building of a home at Souderton was approved by the conference. Among the promoters were Andrew S. Mack, William M. Moyer, Henry Krupp, John S. Nice, Garret S. Nice, Joseph Bechtel, and W. R. Moyer. The home was opened for service on May 17, 1917. In 1921 an annex was built. The total cost of buildings and furnishings amounted to $100,000. The main building is 37 x 144 ft., an annex 36 x 96 ft., and one 36 x 36 ft., with 88 single beds and 13 double beds. The institution is supported by contributions and is free of debt. The officers in 1954 were Henry Delp, president; Oliver Nyce, vice-president; Norman Moyer, secretary; and John S. Nice, treasurer. The capacity of the Home is 84 inmates.† J.C.C.

Easton (Pa.) Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, 28 members in 1911, had 53 members in 1953, with D. E. Thomann as pastor.

Ebbe Pieterszoon, a Mennonite elder at Harlingen in the Dutch province of Friesland, whose lack of ability and lust for power were the chief cause of the division between the Frisians and the Flemish (1566-68). At the conference at Harlingen in 1555, where Menno was compelled by Dirk Philips and Leenaert Bouwens to side with the proponents of the strict ban, he was present as a preacher. Soon afterward he was ordained elder against Menno's wishes (see Menno's letters, Complete Works II, 232, where the typographical error "Lebe" stands). In 1561 or 1562 Leenaert Bouwens was deposed by a conference at Emden. Ebbe also helped to bring this about, although he soon repented it. The consequence was that baptism stopped in Friesland. Bouwens lived close to Harlingen, but did not wish to baptize, and Ebbe was incompetent or perhaps too fearful of persecution to undertake the traveling. When Ebbe disregarded the requests for help brought by Laurens Verniers and Jeroen Tinnegieter, representatives of the Flemish who had settled in Friesland, the Flemish decided to ordain Tinnegieter as preacher. Since this was done without asking Ebbe's advice, he felt that his authority as an elder had been violated. He brought this complaint before the preachers, and in the discussion of this quarrel the division grew deeper and deeper until it led to the great division (see Flemish Mennonites), causing many thousands of Mennonites to join the Reformed Church in disgust. K.V.

The account of this dissension is told by de Hoop Scheffer, DB 1893; new facts have been presented in the Zondagsbode, Aug. 16 and 23, 1914; see also Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 398, 400-18; ML I, 500.

Ebbink, Hinrich, identical with Hendrik van Vreden (q.v.).

Ebenezer Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church, in Henderson, York Co., Neb., had a membership of 93 in 1954. It was organized as a congregation on Nov. 5, 1882, with Elder Isaac Peters (q.v.) as its first leader. Its first services were held in a schoolhouse. A little later a church was built one mile south of the present village of Henderson. In 1915 the church was moved to Henderson and remodeled. A parsonage was built in 1934. The Sunday school was organized in 1883, the Christian Endeavor on Feb. 16, 1908, and a church choir in 1915. This congregation was one of the two (the other was Mountain Lake, Minn.) founding congregations of the E.M.B. group. Johann P. Epp was one of the leading ministers, following Isaac Peters. He served as minister 1883-1917, four years of this term as elder. In 1953 F. G. Thomas was pastor.† H.C.Q.

Ebenezer Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, Doland, S.D., was organized in 1919 by seven families under the leadership of Jacob J. Hofer. The first services were held in the Irving church, located ten miles south and five miles west of Doland. In 1923 a church building near Bloomfield was moved to the present Ebenezer location, which is eight miles south and four miles west of Doland. This building was remodeled in 1949 to obtain a seating capacity of 250.

A few years after the church was organized, Mathias Kleinsasser came into the community and assisted Jacob J. Hofer, each giving a 15-minute sermon. Since Hofer's death in 1929, the church has been served by Jake P. Glanzer, David J. S. Mendel, and Paul H. Glanzer, who came to Doland in September 1946. In 1955 the membership was 105.

Ebenezer Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, now known as the Bethlehem (q.v.) M.B.C. Church.

Ebenezer Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located four miles east of Buhler, Reno Co., Kan., had its beginning in 1878, when a number of families from Russia settled in the community, with Franz Ediger and Peter Wall as leaders. In 1879 Elder Abraham Schellenberg organized this group as a church; he served as elder until 1906. Their first building, erected in 1880, was of earthen brick, 30 x 50 ft., and was replaced by a frame church in 1900. Other ministers who have served this congregation are Elder Henry Adrian, Franz Ediger, Peter Wall, and Gerhard Franz. In 1921 this congregation united as a body with the Mennonite Brethren Church of Buhler, after having been the mother church of other congregations in Reno, McPherson, and Harvey counties in Kansas.

Ebenezer Mennonite Church (GCM), located two miles east of Bluffton, Ohio, is a member of the Middle District Conference. This congregation forms one of the two centers of the original Swiss community between Bluffton and Pandora. A meetinghouse was built near the site of the present building in 1846, enlarged in 1883, and again in 1928. After Pandora in 1904, and Bluffton in 1918 had organized separate congregations, Ebenezer and St. Johns remained united as one congregation under the ministry of William Gotschall, the last of the ministers to serve the united Swiss community. In 1923 this union was dissolved, and Elmer Neuenschwander became the first minister of the separate congregation. The 1953 membership was 507, with Howard T. Landes as pastor. C.H.S.

Ebenezer Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Western District Conference, located three miles east and one-half mile north of Gotebo, Okla., was organized in 1903. The first church building, seating approximately 130, is still in use. The 1953 membership was 67. G.M.P.

Ebenezer Mennonite Church (GCM) was organized near Fitzmaurice, Sask., on Aug. 4, 1946, under the leadership of Martin D. Thiessen and A. P. Loewen. The congregation is a member of the Conference of Mennonites in Canada. In 1953 there were 27 members, with Martin D. Thiessen as minister.

Ebenezer Mennonite Church (MC), located four miles northeast of South Boston, Halifax Co., Va., is a member of the Virginia Mennonite Conference. The church was organized in 1904 under the leadership of Henry H. Good, the first pastor, with 20 charter members. The 1953 membership was 37, all rural people. They worshiped in a union church until 1931, when a brick church with a seating capacity of 150 was built; it was dedicated in 1932. Otis B. Snead is the present minister in charge (1954). A.S.Br.

Ebenezer United Missionary Church, a rural congregation of the Ontario Conference, located seven miles east of Stayner. The original church was destroyed by fire in 1947. The present church, built under the leadership of W. E. Prosser, was dedicated Aug. 29, 1948. The church had 35 members in 1954.

Ebenfeld, a Mennonite settlement in the province of Ekaterinoslav, South Russia, which in 1926 had three villages with 5,700 acres of land and a population of 187.

Der praktische Landwirt (1926) No. 5, p. 2; ML I, 70.

Ebenfeld Mennonite Brethren Church, southeast of Hillsboro, Marion Co., Kan., had its beginning in 1875, several M.B. families from Russia having settled in this community in 1874. Another party of 75 families settled here in 1876. The meetings were at first held in the East Gnadenau schoolhouse and in the earliest M.B. Conference yearbooks this congregation was called Gnadenau. It is the first organized M.B. congregation in North America.

The church grew rapidly and in 1888 had a membership of 253. Since then it has retained about this number and in 1953 had 250 members. At times the congregation declined through the moving away of many young families to new settlements, particularly to Oklahoma. It again increased remarkably through large revivals. The church has had three noted revivals: 1892, when 50 members were added; in 1907, 67; and in 1937, 59 members. The Steinreich M.B. Church, 10 miles to the east, was until Oct. 29, 1946, an affiliated branch of the Ebenfeld Church.

In 1883 the congregation built its first church, which was replaced by a larger church in 1904. This building was destroyed by fire in December 1924, but was at once replaced by the present church.

The ministerial or pastoral leadership has been as follows: Peter Eckert 1875-82, Abraham Cornelsen, Sr., 1882-84, Elder Johann Foth 1884-1915, J. K. Hiebert 1915-33, G. W. Lohrenz 1933-45, J. G. Baerg 1945-50, J. J. Gerbrandt 1950-52, and Allen Fast 1952- . The following ordained ministers have also served the church for a greater length of time: Wm. Hergert, D. D. Claassen, Theodor Freuchting, Cornelius Hiebert, Abraham Cornelsen, Jr., Cornelius Nickel, Johann Harder, H. W. Lohrenz, P. C. Hiebert, Christian Seibel, J. W. Lohrenz, and P. P. Hiebert.

The church has always been known for its missionary zeal and for many years conducted an annual spring mission festival. The following missionaries have come from this congregation: A. J. Becker and Katharina Penner to the Comanche Indians in Oklahoma; Katharina Lohrenz, Anna Hanneman, and J. H. Lohrenz to India; and Clara Lohrenz Buschman to Africa. J.G.Ba.

Ebenfeld Mennonite Church (GCM), Montezuma, Kan., a member of the Western District Conference, was organized Aug. 8, 1920, by H. J. Dyck. Abe A. Schmidt, one of the charter members, was elected pastor and served the church intermittently for about 15 years. The membership in 1955 was 21, with Joseph W. Goossen as minister. H.Sp.

Ebenfeld Mennonite Church (GCM), located near Herschel, Sask., was organized in April 1925, by Mennonite immigrant families who had come to this area from southern Russia in 1923 and 1925 and by other families who soon joined them. The congregation had 34 charter members under the leadership of Elder Jacob B. Wiens and Gerhard Wiens. In 1926 the congregation joined the Canadian conference and in 1927 built a church 2½ miles north of Herschel on Highway 31. Besides this church, the congregation of 268 members (1953) has three other churches—at Fiske, Glidden, and Superb. Following the death of J. B. Wiens in 1939, J. J. Thiessen served the church until 1943, when C. J. Warkentin was elected and ordained elder. He is assisted by five associate ministers who serve without remuneration.

The Glidden-Kindersly group (Russian immigrants of 1927-29) joined the Ebenfeld congregation in 1953. (Der Bote, Aug. 26, 1953, p. 5.) C.J.W.

Ebenflur ("Prairie") Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, in Hamilton Co., Kan., was founded in 1907 with about 40 members and Peter Heidebrecht as minister. On account of unfavorable climatic and economic conditions this rural settlement project failed, and most of the members gradually moved away, including finally the preacher and deacon. The small neighboring Mennonite Brethren congregation suffered the same fate. (ML I, 500 f.) H.R.V.

Ebersole (Ebersol, Eversole, Eversull, Aebersold, Ebersohl), a Swiss family name found frequently in the Mennonite Church (MC) of North America, especially in Lancaster Co., Pa., and in Illinois. Among the Ebersohl immigrants of the 18th century were Abraham (1727); Johannes, Peter, and Jost (1739); Carl (1753); and Jacob (1763). The Lancaster Conference (MC) has had several deacons by the name of Ebersole, seven or more ministers, and bishops Peter Ebersole (1791-1870) and John G. Ebersole (1849-1934). Lancaster Conference currently has a minister and a deacon named Ebersole, and Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference has Bishop Allen Ebersole. Among the first ministers in the Partridge, Ill., congregation (now Metamora) was Andrew Ebersole. Frank S. Ebersole (GCM) (1875-), former business manager of Goshen College (to 1912), served as mayor of Goshen, Ind., 1943-48. J.C.W.

Eby (Ebi, Ebie, Uebi, Aby, Aebi, Eaby, Ebee), name of a large and influential Swiss family in Mennonite history. Some historians of the family claim that their ancestral family belonged to the Italian Waldenses and fled north to the Swiss canton of Zürich in the 16th century. In any case it is in Zürich that the name appears first in Mennonite history, Jacob Eby being ordained bishop there in 1683. His son Theodorus Eby (1663-1730) migrated to the Palatinate in 1704 and to Lancaster Co., Pa., in 1715, where he settled at Mill Creek. His grandson Christian (d. 1807) became a deacon in the Hammer Creek congregation, and two great-grandsons were prominent bishops in Lancaster County and in Ontario—Peter Eby (q.v., 1765-1843) and his younger brother Benjamin Eby (q.v., 1785-1863) respectively. (Theodorus Eby also had a nephew Peter Eby who came to America in 1720. Theodorus had another nephew in Bern, Switzerland, a cousin of the 1720 immigrant, named Andrew Eby. Andrew's son Nicholas emigrated to America in 1753 and settled in Wisconsin; he was a Lutheran. Andrew Eby had another son Christian who settled in Alsace where he reared a family.) The descendants of Theodorus Eby are located mostly in eastern Pennsylvania, especially Lancaster County, and in Ontario. The Lancaster Mennonite Conference (MC) had five ordained men named Eby in 1953. Special mention should be made of Bishop Isaac Eby (1834-1910) of the Lancaster Conference, and of Preacher Solomon Eby (q.v., 1834-1931) of Ontario who was one of the leaders whose followers merged with other groups to form the Mennonite Brethren in Christ (now U.M.C.). Another immigrant to Pennsylvania was Matthias Eby (d. 1893), who in 1853, shortly after arriving in Pennsylvania from Germany, located at Freeport, Ill. In 1856 he was ordained as a minister, later as a bishop, in which office he served until 1878 when he retired because of age. Swiss Mennonite history records the banishment from Trachselwald of a Preacher Durss Aebi, 1670. J.C.W.

Ezra Eby, A . . . History of the Eby Family (Berlin, Ont., 1889); Jacob Eby, A Brief Record of the Ebys (Lancaster, 1923).

Eby, Benjamin (1785-1853), pioneer Mennonite (MC) bishop in Ontario, the eleventh child of Christian Eby and his wife Catharine Bricker, was born in the old homestead on Hammer Creek, Warwick Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., May 2, 1785. On Feb. 25, 1807, he married Mary Brubacher. That spring he and his wife emigrated to Waterloo Co., Ont., arriving at what was later Berlin (now Kitchener) on June 21. On Nov. 27, 1809, he was ordained a minister of the Mennonite Church (MC) and on Oct. 11, 1812, was ordained as bishop. In 1813 his dream of a meetinghouse was realized with the erection of a log structure of modest dimensions, the first building erected solely for religious worship in Waterloo County. The congregation had not fewer than 150 members. Possibly as early as 1815 Benjamin Eby built a frame annex to the log church, with a movable partition between it and the main building. This annex served as a schoolhouse of which he himself was for many years the teacher. At the same time he carried on his farming. His farm was lot 2 of the Beasley Tract, comprising a large part of the East Ward of the modern city of Kitchener. To Benjamin Eby were born eleven children. In August 1834, his wife died of cholera. Some time after her death he married the widow of Abraham Erb, the founder of Waterloo. On June 28, 1853, Eby died.

To sketch the life of Benjamin Eby is to consider the man, his work, his interests, and his influence. As a farmer he seems to have been successful. At least he was generous with his money, as the record of the very few of his financial transactions which have come down to us would indicate. In 1816, when the church purchased an acre of land to add to its holdings, he donated an additional three quarters of an acre. All this is now part of the property of First Mennonite Church of Kitchener. Between 1825 and 1830 two men, John Hoffman and Samuel Bowers, wanted to establish a furniture factory. Appealing in vain to various sources for land, they came finally to Bishop Eby, who readily made land available to them. This too was a gift. The third transaction was in connection with the founding, in 1835, of the first newspaper in inner Canada, the Canada Museum, by Henry W. Peterson. Benjamin Eby not only encouraged this enterprise by word but purchased two shares of stock at $40.00 each, a larger risk than anyone else, apart from Mr. Peterson, was willing or able to take. Again, in 1836, he donated $16.00 toward the building of a cemetery wall, the next highest gift being $4.00. Relatively small as those sums are today they were important in those pioneer days. Judged in relation to his times and his contemporaries all these transactions establish Benjamin Eby as a substantial farmer in his community. Of him as a preacher only a few comments have come down. H. W. Peterson, publisher and Lutheran lay preacher, says in his diary: "Stayed all night at Benjamin Eby's, went with him and his family to the meeting or church. He prayed and preached well. He is a good man." An anonymous writer in the Berlin Daily Telegraph for May 19, 1906, says: "His sermons were full of good sense, very intelligible, lying parallel with the understanding of attentive hearers." A tradition has it that there were invariably tears in his eyes when he entered the pulpit on a Sabbath morning. For many years, from 1818-19 to the early 1840's, he was also the community schoolmaster. In this period he wrote two spelling or reading books, Neues Buchstabir- und Lesebuch (1839) and Fibel (1843). He also wrote a work on Mennonite faith and history entitled: Kurzgefasste Kirchen-geschichte und Glaubenslehre der Taufgesinnten Christen oder Mennoniten (1841). He was most likely the compiler of the Gemeinschaftliche Liedersammlung (Berlin, 1836), which was long used in Ontario. Thus he was farmer, teacher, preacher, and author. As might be expected, his interests went beyond his own community. He corresponded with European Mennonites and published some of the letters received in Briefe an die Mennonisten Gemeine in Ober Canada (1840) and Zweyter Brief aus Dänemark (1841).

The physical man must be noted briefly. There was a tradition that he was frail. Aus 'em Bennie gebts ka Bauer, er muss Schulmester werre. (Bennie will never make a farmer, he must become a schoolteacher.) Yet he made two journeys to Canada on horseback through the wilderness, hewed for himself a home, prospered substantially, and was unusually active in church and community affairs. One of his coats, seen by the present writer, would indicate him to have been a man about five feet, six inches tall, and weighing possibly 150 lbs.

Up to 1833 the Waterloo County settlement was known as "Ben Eby's" or "Ebytown," thus establishing Eby as the leading citizen of his community. With the arrival of increasing numbers of German non-Mennonites, the name was changed in 1833 to Berlin. That he had both a keen sense of civic and denominational responsibility the record of his influence and activities bears eloquent testimony. In his account of Benjamin Eby's funeral, written for the July 7, 1855, issue of the Guelph Advertiser, H. S. Peterson calls him "an Israelite in whom there was no guile, and that he was sincerely pious, humble, exemplary, practical, and non-sectarian, and eminently successful in his day and generation." The anonymous friend in the Daily Telegraph (Berlin, Ont., May 19, 1906) says: "He was a person of unblemished character. Naturally of a sweet and gentle disposition, friendly and obliging, always ready to serve his friends in any way that he could by his interest and authority. This he did freely and generously, not proud or haughty, but serious in giving good counsel, and greatly esteemed for his integrity by all ranks and denominations. All very much desired his company and wholesome conversations."

Eby's Kurzgefasste Kirchengeschichte of 1841 had many reprints: Lancaster 1853; Elkhart 1868, 1879, 1901; Kitchener 1919. His Neues Buchstabir- und Lesebuch of 1839 was also often reprinted: Berlin, Ont., 1842, 1847; Elkhart 1869, 1871, 1882, 1896, 1909. J.B.C.

Eby, Christian (1734-1807), grandson of pioneer Theodorus Eby, son of Christian (1698-1756), settled on his father's Hammer Creek homestead in Lancaster Co., Pa., and in 1760 married Catharine Bricker, daughter of Peter Bricker and aunt of Samuel Bricker of Ontario. They reared a family of ten children, including Peter (q.v.), the venerable bishop of Pequea; Benjamin (q.v.), bishop, schoolteacher, and molder of the Ontario colony; and Hans, the philanthropist who saved Ontario for the Mennonites. He was a large man of athletic type, wore a long beard, and possessed unusual health and vigor until his death. He was a very successful miller and extensive farmer. His home was known for its hospitality. Destitute Revolutionary War soldiers at his home and at the Brickerville church found in him a Good Samaritan. His home was one of the eight used for church services in the district before the building of the first Hammer Creek meetinghouse (MC) in 1819. He is the first known deacon in the district. He was buried on the hill overlooking his home. I.D.L.

Eby, Heinrich, a printing establishment, at Berlin (now Kitchener), Waterloo Co., Ont. On March 4, 1835, a proposal to establish a printing press in Berlin was drawn and opened to signature by those willing to contribute to the subsidizing of the enterprise. Thursday, Aug. 27, 1835, the first fruits of the enterprise appeared in the form of the first number of a weekly newspaper entitled Canada Museum und Allgemeine Zeitung. The printer's name is given as Heinrich Wilhelm Peterson. The list of subscribers to the enterprise includes a large number of Mennonites, prominent among them being Benjamin Eby and Heinrich Eby, the latter of whom soon (1840) issued publications over his own name as printer. Apparently Eby took over the Peterson press at that time. Benjamin Eby was the bishop, 1812-54, and spiritual and cultural leader of the large Mennonite settlement in this region. Heinrich Eby (1820-55), one of his sons, published in addition to other literature the following Mennonite books at Berlin: Briefe an die Mennonisten Gemeine in Ober Canada (1840); Kurzgefasste Kirchengeschichte und Glaubenslehre der Taufgesinnten-Christen oder Mennoniten (1841); Die Gemeinschaftliche Liedersammlung (1841, 1849); Zweyter Brief aus Dänemark an die Mennonisten Gemeine in Canada (1841); ABC- Buchstabir- und Lesebuch (1842, 1847); Geistliches Sendschreiben des Christlichen Lehrers und Predigers Heinrich Nissly (1842); Fibel zu den ersten Lese-Uebungen (1843); Kleiner Katechismus (1845); Glaube und Lehre von der Taufe der Mennoniten in Deutschland (1845); Die Ernsthafte Christenpflicht (1845). In 1852 a Mennonite book appeared at Berlin under the imprint of Peter Eby, Heinrich Eby's younger brother, but in 1857 the hymnbook Gemeinschaftliche Liedersammlung appeared at Kitchener under the imprint of Boedecker und Stuebing. Peter Eby apparently took over the Heinrich Eby press until he moved to New York State in 1856. This is the short history (1840-56) of the only Mennonite printing establishment ever operated in Ontario. It appears that Peter Eby left the Mennonite Church, if indeed he ever belonged to it. H.S.B.

Eby, Isaac, who with Jacob N. Brubacher shared the leadership of the Lancaster Conference (MC) at the turn of the 20th century, was born Jan. 26, 1834, in Salisbury Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., the son of Peter Eby and grandson of Bishop Peter Eby. He died June 19, 1910. He was survived by eleven children, eight born to his first wife, Mary Mellinger, and three to his second wife, Lizzie K. Lehman.

Isaac Eby joined the Mennonite Church (MC) during his twenty-sixth year, and on Nov. 9, 1876, he was ordained by lot to the ministry. Two years later he was ordained bishop in the Pequea district where his grandfather had been a leader in the early 19th century. Isaac Eby was one of the first leaders of the Lancaster Conference to preach in the English language.

Bishop Eby was an eloquent speaker, forthright in his preaching and devoted to the spiritual welfare of the church. He was a pioneer in the Sunday-school movement in the Lancaster Conference. His greatest contribution to the church was the impetus which he gave to the newly developed interest in mission work. His influence extended beyond the confines of his own conference in that he worked sympathetically and co-operatively with other contemporary leaders in the church, such as John F. Funk and John S. Coffman, both of Indiana. S.S.W.

Eby, Peter (1765-1843), b. Oct. 14, 1765, north of Lititz, along the Hammer Creek in Lancaster Co., Pa., was the son of Christian and Catharine Bricker Eby, and the third child in a family of twelve. The father was the first known deacon in the Hammer Creek (MC) district. The fourth child was Hans, whose influence helped decide the fate of the Waterloo, Ont., colony. The eleventh child was Bishop Benjamin of Ontario. Of Peter's boyhood and youth we have no record.

Peter's great-grandfather Theodorus, son of Bishop Jakob Eby, was born in Switzerland in 1663. In 1704 he emigrated to the Palatinate, and in 1715 to America, settling in Earl Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa. In 1735 his son Christian and wife, Elizabeth Meyer, settled on a 236-acre tract on Hammer Creek. In 1754 they built the large house in which their son Christian, Peter's father, reared his family. In this house regular meetings were held. It is still occupied and in good condition (1948). The barn Peter's father built is also still in use. In 1750 Peter's grandfather built a mill which the family operated until 1790, when Peter's father built a new one further downstream, which mill was rebuilt in 1850 and is operating in good condition to date. Peter's father freely furnished supplies for wounded soldiers quartered at Zion Church of near-by Brickerville.

Such a heritage and environment was the school of the youth who became "the great bishop of Pequea," who, according to Ellis and Evans, "was a positive man of clear native mind, a natural orator, and though making no pretense to a thorough scholastic training, commanded, both in temporal and spiritual matters, the deference of his brethren." Of him J. F. Funk wrote, "The doctrines of Peter Eby were sound Mennonite doctrines. He was a most remarkable man." Harris says his preaching was extemporaneous, eloquent, and very effective, appealing to reason, not emotion; and also that in the councils of the church his decisions were impartial and just.

In July 1788 Peter married Margaretha, daughter of John Hess, of Hess's congregation, Warwick Township, and in 1791 they moved to the Mt. Patton farm in Salisbury Township, near Gap, their home for the rest of their lives. They had nine children and to date their descendants number well over 2,000, many of whom have been valuable assets to the church and society.

No record exists of the date of Peter's baptism, nor the exact date of his ordination as minister or bishop. Present sources of information indicate his ordination as minister about 1800, and as bishop of the Pequea district (MC) about 1804, in which office he served until his death. Under Peter's bishopric the church grew from a few scattered families to strong congregations. In 1806 Paradise meetinghouse was built, Hershey's school and meetinghouse in 1814 and a new meetinghouse in 1837, and in 1841 Old Road. Peter also shepherded the church through the War of 1812, and the troubled times of the organization of the Reformed Mennonite Church by John Herr. He was a member of the Lancaster bishop board and in 1831 became moderator of the Lancaster Conference.

Peter's labors, however, were not confined to Pequea. Tradition says he journeyed to Canada to ordain Benjamin Eby minister in 1809, and bishop in 1812. He ministered to the congregations of Susquehanna Valley, Southwestern Pennsylvania, Maryland, and on some occasions, Virginia. He also made social visits to the Franconia Conference area. In 1840 Christian Herr, Peter's personal choice, was ordained bishop as his assistant and successor, a unique event in the Lancaster Conference, and a tribute to the stature of Peter in the eyes of his brethren.

Peter Eby died April 6, 1843, in his seventy-eighth year, and was buried in the old cemetery at Hershey's Church. He left no writings or books, but his ministry made an impression that still lives a century later. M.C.E.

Eby, Solomon (1834-1931), a founder of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (now U.M.C.), the son of Benjamin and Elizabeth (Cressman) Eby. He was born May 15, 1834, in Waterloo Co., Ont., was raised on the farm, and attended public school. On June 17, 1855, he married Catharine Shantz, to whom were born 12 children. He moved to Port Elgin, Ont.

In 1858 he was ordained to the ministry in the Mennonite Church, and served in that capacity for 14 years. According to his testimony, he was not converted until eleven years after his ordination (1869, Port Elgin, Ont.). Following his conversion he became a zealous advocate for a definite religious experience. Eventually he was expelled from the Mennonite Church, and in 1874 he and Daniel Brenneman of Indiana organized the Reformed Mennonites, a group that later became a part of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church (now the United Missionary Church).

For various terms totaling 18 years Eby was presiding elder in the Ontario Conference, and for 14 years he served as pastor, holding pastorates at Breslau, Elmwood, New Dundee, Markham, and Kitchener circuits. He was a member of the first six general conferences, and was chairman of the first one (Zionsville, Pa., 1885). Eby retired from active work in 1906. A few years later he became interested in the Pentecostal movement, and in 1912 he transferred his membership to that organization. He died in 1931.† E.R.S.

Echo, Das, originally Lehigh Echo, was started in 1897 as a four-page German weekly Mennonite newspaper, edited, published, and printed by Jacob J. Wiebe, Lehigh, Kan. It carried news, information, and publicity of interest to the Mennonites of the prairie states. The last issue of this weekly found in the Bethel College Historical Library is dated Jan. 1, 1909. It is likely that Das Echo was discontinued soon afterwards. C.K.

Echo-Verlag (Echo Publishers) was founded in Winnipeg, Man., on July 3, 1944, by former students of the Chortitza Zentralschule (opened in 1842) who emigrated from Russia to Canada after 1923, to commemorate the centenary of that school. The object of the organization was to collect and publish historical material dealing with the history of the Mennonites with special consideration of their settlements in Russia. Its publications appear with the subtitle "Historische Schriftenreihe," Echo-Verlag. The Verlag is a purely Mennonite, nonprofit undertaking, without denominational or other obligations. All work in connection with it is honorary. The Verlag owns no printing press and no other property. At its head is the president who was elected at the organization meeting. He is assisted by a council of five members, including the secretary, all appointed by him. The secretary is also the business manager, and in his hands rests the responsibility for all the work undertaken.

Since its organization Dietrich H. Epp of Rosthern, Sask., has been president, and Arnold Dyck of Steinbach, secretary, the latter serving as executive officer. The following books have been published, all in German: C. P. Toews, Die Tereker Ansiedlung (The Terek Settlement), 1945; David H. Epp, Johann Cornies, 1946, reprint of 1909 edition; A. Loewen and A. Friesen, Die Flucht über den Amur (Flight Across the Amur), 1946; G. Lohrenz, Sagradowka, 1947; F. Bartsch, Unser Auszug nach Mittelasien (Our Emigration to Central Asia; a new edition with a closing chapter by Alexander Rempel), 1948, reprint of 1907 edition; Am Trakt, 1948, a condensed translation from the Russian with a supplement by J. J. Dyck; H. Görz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung, 1950-51; David H. Echsel (Excel, Exern), Wilhelm, a cobbler of St. Gall (or Wallis?), Switzerland, was baptized by Fridli-Ab-Iberg and was one of the first Anabaptists at Zürich. He was one of the group that were arrested, but escaped from prison on April 5, 1526. At a hearing on April 19 (Egli, Actensammlung, 308, No. 691) he explained exactly how the flight had been accomplished. Under the torture of the rack he confessed that he had never baptized or preached and therefore requested that he be permitted to return home. On pain of death by drowning if he returned, he was expelled from the canton. He then became an active member of the congregation at Strasbourg. Subjected to a trial there, he said that he had been baptized in Zürich because the Bible teaches first faith, then baptism, and that when the Anabaptists met, they warned one another of sin and shame. He left Strasbourg to evade a disputation with the clergy, and arrived at Augsburg at Christmas 1527. At the Easter meeting there in 1528 (see Augsburg, also Doucher) he was among those captured and tried. Here he recanted and was expelled (Roth, Ref.-Gesch., 222, 258). Nothing is known of the rest of his life. Neff supposed him to be a native of the Swiss canton of Wallis; but A. Hulshof states that he was from St. Gall. The Zürich documents (von Muralt-Schmid) call him uss Wallis. Neff, vdZ.

Eck, Johann (1486-1543), the disputatious, immoderately violent opponent of Luther. He became a friend of Hubmaier, his student at the University of Freiburg i. Br. When Hubmaier won his master's degree, Eck delivered the Latin laudatory oration. When Eck was transferred to Ingolstadt as professor of theology Hubmaier entered the university there. In Waldshut Hubmaier challenged his old teacher to a disputation; Eck ignored it. Among the numerous polemics written by Eck the following are of interest in the history of the Anabaptists:

(1) Ein Sendbrieve an ein frum Eidgenossenschaft betreffende die Ketzerische disputation Frantz Kolben, des ausgeloffen Münchs und B. Hallers, des verlogenen Predikanten des hochwürdigen sacrament des altars (Ingolstadt, 1528); (2) Articulos 404 ad disputationes Lipsicum, Baden et Bernen attinentes partim vero scriptis pacem ecclesiae perturbantium extractos . . . offert se disputatorum (Ingolstadt, 1530), in which he attacks Hubmaier and his Schlussreden (Calvary, 46). His letter to Duke George of Saxony, Nov. 26, 1527, must also be mentioned (Seidemann, 150).

In the 404 articles Eck proposed for the disputation of Ingolstadt in 1536, he intentionally throws Zwingli, Luther, and the Anabaptists together indiscriminately, and derives the Anabaptists ("who deny the Deity of Christ") from Luther. Neff.

Eckart, Ulrich, a member of the Anabaptist congregation at Augsburg, a grinder, was chained in a dungeon at Augsburg in September 1527 for his faith, and on Oct. 18 expelled with Eitelhans Langenmantel, Endres Widholz, Gall Vischer, Laux Vischer, Peter Schleppach, and Hans Kissling. In addition he had to pay a fine which was contributed to the city alms fund. Nothing is known of his further activity. Hege.

Eckhart, Johannes ("Meister Eckhart"), was one of the greatest of the medieval German mystics. He was born about 1260, perhaps at Cologne, joined the order of the Dominicans, and held many high offices. He died in 1327 during his trial on charges of heresy before the Court of Inquisition at Cologne, which ended in 1329 in the condemnation of 28 propositions contained in his sermons.

The roots of Eckhart's mysticism are found in Neo-Platonism. There is evident in his doctrines a strong dependence on Thomas Aquinas, whom he, however, surpasses in that he strives to transform into knowledge the deep and powerful feeling of his piety without reserve.

His mystical-theological ideas may be summarized as follows:

God is the supreme Being. He is the One and Only, the one true and good existence. As the source of all things He is beyond comprehension—negative or positive. Any statements about God are always inadequate and a robbery of God. Therefore Eckhart could say that in God there is neither good nor better nor best. He who says that God is good is just as wrong as he who says the sun is black. God's existence and essence coincide completely; thought and being are identical with Him.

In this essence of God, the "denatured" nature of God is to be distinguished from His "natured nature," which is the revelation of His triune being in relation to the universe. The concept of Trinity is, however, not to be here understood in a dogmatic sense, since Eckhart completely transforms and interweaves it with a mystical pantheism. The Father eternally begets the Son (the Word) and in Him ideas. In the fact that God recognized Himself in the Logos, He Himself lives in the Son and this love of the Father to the Son "is the Holy Spirit." In the Logos God brings forth all things. "All things are God Himself," and "God is all things."

Every creature is a phenomenon of God and bears in itself "a record of divine nature." This is especially true of reasoning creation, i.e., man, who bears within himself the "divine spark." In him Eckhart recognizes the "reversal point (Umkehrpunkt) of the world process." In his innermost being man yearns to become fully one with God. In order that this may take place, all the striving of the soul must be directed toward turning from all creature, from sin, the world, indeed from himself. To become rich in God man must become poor in the creature. "If anyone wants to come into the origin (Grund) of God, into His greatest, then he must first come into his own origin, into his least." But then man rises to God, and is so-to-speak deified (genuinely Neo-Platonic); the circle closes, for "Being is the Father, unity the Son, and goodness is the Holy Spirit. Now the Holy Spirit takes the soul that is sanctified in the Purest and the Highest, and bears them into His origin, that is the Son, and the Son bears them at once into His origin, that is the Father, into the source, into the inheritance, in which the Son has His being." This "parting" from the manifoldness of the external world is man's highest task. To be sure, he should occupy himself in this world; but above all outward deeds, above the righteousness by works of the sense is the "inner work," purity of mind, "poverty of the soul and its return to the divine source."

Until 1886 only the German writings of Eckhart were known—mostly sermons, tracts, and sayings; since that time Denifle has discovered a long list of Latin writings by Eckhart and has translated excerpts. Eckhart's importance rests, however, on his German works, for it was his striving to impart "the innermost and truest truth" not as the privilege of an exclusive circle, but for all the people. It was especially in "simple piety" but that he felt himself understood, and so, as Windelband says, he "transposed the most delicate formulations of concepts into a German form with linguistic forcefulness of a genius." Thereby Eckhart burst the narrow bonds of medieval scholasticism and through his stress on the new birth he becomes the forerunner of a new understanding of Christianity. Not only Luther and the other reformers profited from it, but also the extra-church circles, especially the Anabaptists.

Eckhart became the representative of a specifically German theology, the head and center of a numerous circle of disciples, and as Ludwig Keller (163) correctly says, the "originator of impulses, from which all the parties that in later centuries grew out of the Waldenses, have been more or less touched."

It is very probable that Hubmaier, Haetzer, and especially Hans Denk, at least indirectly, were strongly influenced by Eckhart and German mysticism in general. This is seen in their doctrine of the freedom of the will, in their slight interest in the dogma of the Trinity, and, especially in the case of Denk, in his teaching on regeneration. There is a conspicuous relationship between Eckhart and Denk in style of writing and the entire complex of ideas. Where Eckhart speaks of "the impoverishment of the creature" and of "poverty of the soul" as a condition for entry into God, Denk uses very similar expressions when he says that we "must therefore become so spiritually poor that we feel we must of ourselves perish." Similarity is again seen in the expressions with which on the one hand Eckhart describes the divine birth in the depths of the soul and on the other hand Denk describes the new birth of the elect of God.

But however related in language, style, and manner of expression, Eckhart and Denk may be, their agreement is of a merely formal nature. Factually there are very deep differences. In Eckhart the concept of God is philosophically abstract and mixed with pantheistic mysticism; in Denk it is real and concrete. In Eckhart Christ appears essentially only as the Logos, and, in so far as he reflects on the Incarnation at all, it is only as an example (Loofs, 629); in Denk Christ is the "Lord and Prince" of salvation. In Eckhart the new birth is an act of deification, almost in a Neo-Platonic ascetic sense; in Denk the new birth is preceded by a moral collapse, a "sitting in the abyss of hell"; it is the needle's eye "through which immense camels must slip and yet cannot do it," until God helps them, and the eye of the needle becomes for them a narrow door to life. In Eckhart moral obligations of a practical nature retreat quietistically; in Denk they are developed into full activity in the service of God for the world. In Eckhart, all is in its essence asceticism, ecstasy, mysticism; in Denk it becomes discipleship of Christ and a listening to the revelation of God in Christ, which finds its resolution in the "inner word," which, to be sure, has a counterpart in Eckhart's "divine spark."

The effects of Eckhart's mysticism are later to be found in Jakob Böhme (1575-1624), G. W. Friedrich Hegel (1770-1831), and Schleiermacher (1768-1834). Also in Gerhard Tersteegen's (1697-1769) hymns there are echoes of Eckhart, without, however, the danger of falling prey to pantheism, which is inherent in Eckhart's system. E.H.

Economic History of the Hutterian Brethren. Although material is abundant, a comprehensive study of this topic has never been made; but it would be of value to consult those studies which are named at the end of this article.

The details of the economic activities of the Hutterian Brethren changed greatly according to the degree of freedom experienced, but the underlying principles and general patterns were fairly uniformly held ever since the beginnings under Jacob Hutter in 1533. The climax of Hutterite life and their most complete carrying out of their communal principles fall in the "Good" and "Golden" periods, 1554-92, mainly during the reign of the more lenient emperor Maximilian II (1564-76, see Hapsburg). We are fortunate to possess a fairly graphic picture of the communal life at that time, called Beschreibung der Gemein Wohlstand (Geschicht-Buch, ed. Wolkan, 331-38; ed. Zieglschmid, 430-40), inserted into their Chronicle at the year 1569. Here the details of their social organization are described. We learn how a Christian community of goods was observed, how obedience and honor were given to the authorities of the world, how missions were established (Aussendung), also how Diener des Wortes (q.v.) and Diener der Notdurft (q.v.) were properly elected, etc. In short, the chronicler assures us, "We supported ourselves with all manner of occupations" (man nähret sich mit allerlei Handwerk), and in addition served also the manorial lords in many ways. No member of the community was allowed to be idle. "It was like a big clockwork where one wheel drives the other, promotes, helps, and makes the whole clock function." Still more graphic is another simile offered by the Chronicles: such a Bruderhof (q.v.) is somewhat like a big beehive where all the busy bees work together to a common end, the one doing this and the other that, not for their own needs but for the good of all. This simile very characteristically hints at the essentially anti-individualistic attitude of the brotherhood. It was understood by all that hard physical labor for the common good (production) was expected of all, while at the same time consumption was restricted according to the principle of frugality as was befitting for a life of discipline and Christian obedience. Large-scale production and restrained consumption necessarily led to economic success or wealth of some sort, which almost inescapably led to jealousy and slander on the part of the surrounding population (see Fischer, Christoph A.). The repute of the wealth of the Brethren (in their best time they numbered about 15,000 baptized members) spread as far as to the Emperor's court in Vienna; everyone knew or claimed to know that they bury "great treasures" to hide them from the authorities. Most likely that was true to a certain extent, but should be understood as an act of prudence (in absence of a banking system) in anticipation of times of hardship and persecution. During the period of the Turkish Wars (1605-6) and again during the early years of the Thirty Years' War (1718-22) almost all their savings were confiscated by the government. Yet one generation later Grimmelshausen (q.v.) reports again of their considerable wealth in equipment, livestock, and all the rest in their new Bruderhofs in Slovakia. (Zieglschmid concluded that this was in Mannheim (q.v.) rather than in Slovakia.) We know from Max Weber's sociological analysis that this situation is typical of all "ascetic Protestantism" or "innerworldly asceticism," such as can also be observed in Puritanism or later Pietism. Grimmelshausen reports that he saw the craftsmen-brethren at work in their shops "as if they had hired themselves out for pay." Since no one could go about without contributing his share to the common weal, doing it with greatest conscience and discipline, the net result was a rational establishment of great efficiency, something otherwise completely unknown in Europe in the 16th and early 17th centuries, where the factory system had not yet been established. It might be helpful to stress here that there was absolutely no motivation for such organization from the profit angle, since the basic economic philosophy of the Brethren was that of stewardship of all earthly possessions (Correll, Chapter 2), requiring a dedicated care for and optimal organization of all work along certain previously laid out rational plans. In this regard Hutterite communism is truly unique in the entire history of Christian sectarianism.

As to the social status of the Hutterian Brethren one cannot call them either peasants or craftsmen, and it would be misleading to derive their basic Christian convictions from their social background. Theirs was neither a peasant's Christianity nor a craftsman's Christianity (see Dedic, Peachy, also Friedmann, MQR 1946, 153 f.). Anyone who joined the brotherhood had to learn a craft or had to accept his particular assignment, often very different from his former background. That belongs to the pattern of "ascetic Protestantism" with its prevailing rational order and subsequent tendency toward saving (asketischer Sparzwang). All money earned was considered as part of the working capital (Betriebskapital), and not as wealth, and its management was entrusted to the bishop (Vorsteher), to the manager (Diener der Notdurft), and sometimes to the buyers (Einkäufer). In many regards the entire economic organization and pattern was not unlike that of the medieval monastery, with the one difference that for the Hutterites married life was not only favored but almost required.

The education of the growing generation of the Bruderhof tended to make these young people fit into this accepted pattern: industriousness, care, uttermost honesty, frugality, solidity of work, and reliability were the main virtues stressed in their economic pursuits, likewise selflessness and concern wherever required. Luxury was out of the question, it was simply not valued, hence no longer desired.

All crafts were strictly regulated, and these regulations, not unlike medieval guild-regulations, were ever and again read before the assembled groups (see Crafts, also Gemeindeordnungen).

The economic activities of the Brethren may best be divided into two distinct areas: (a) those within the Bruderhofs, including such activities as the pottery kilns and the bathhouses, and (b) those performed outside, on the estates of manorial lords or even in some cities (where occasionally Brethren-surgeons were found to be active).

(a) On the Bruderhof we may again distinguish between the farm activities proper, the care for food, shelter, and clothing (in this regard the Hutterites of today continue these practices as of old: see Bertha Clark's study), and the different crafts which brought in some needed cash for farm enlargement and the paying of taxes. As far as the farms were concerned, we meet here again the rationality of a large-scale enterprise. Nothing was wasted; everything was carefully used. For instance, hides came from the slaughterhouse to the tannery, and from there to the harness makers, cobblers, pouch makers, etc. Wool was sent to the women who spun it and then sent it on to the weavers or cloth makers and thence to the tailors. Since cooking was done for the entire Bruderhof (150 to 200 adults plus all the children) utmost economy was possible and practiced. Diener der Notdurft (q.v.), without ever having learned modern techniques of shop organization, soon developed an admirable tradition of efficiency, on the farm level supported also by the Weinzierl, the foreman or work clerk who supervised all agricultural labor.

As to the crafts, it is truly amazing how these Brethren developed skills otherwise nearly unknown in these early centuries of modern times. Besides, their pottery ware (now called Habaner faiences: see Ceramics) reveals a taste for the shapely and aesthetically appealing which made them stand out in this craft and true competitors of the Italian (later also Dutch) fayence or majolica ware. In the main this particular craft was developed primarily for cash sale and not so much for Bruderhof needs. The research of F. Hruby shows how much the nobles appreciated these products. Another cash product of high quality was the knives and cutlery wares of finest steel, again somewhat unique in the 16th century. Both crafts continued to be practiced among the Habaner (q.v., apostate descendants of the Hutterites) in Slovakia until after World War I, although among the Brethren in Transylvania, Russia, and later America this skill died out completely. Hruby tells of additional skills of the Hutterites otherwise little practiced in their days: thus we hear of an artistic clock sold for 170 talers to an Austrian archduke, and another one sold to Cardinal Dietrichstein (q.v.). Famous were also the Hutterite carriages, which were much in demand among the Moravian nobility. Likewise much appreciated were their new-fashioned iron bedframes. In short, the nobles knew only too well why it was advantageous to protect these industrious Brethren and why they ignored as far as possible the repeated persecution orders from the Viennese government or from the counter-reformatory clergy.

A unique activity of the brethren was also their bathhouses and their barber-surgeons and physicians (see Sommer and Friedmann). They worked for a high standard of hygiene and health among the Brethren, and likewise attracted many lords and their families from the surrounding areas. Christoph A. Fischer (q.v.) was most enraged about this fact. "Every Saturday their bathhouses are filled with Christians [Catholics]," he writes, "and not only the ordinary man but also the lords run to them if they need any drug, as if the Anabaptists were the only ones who understand this art." All these facts explain why the Brethren thrived even after 1592 (the end of the "Golden Age" period) when the Counter Reformation (q.v.) set in with full force and wars raged over the country (Turk invasion).

(b) Not less important were the economic activities of the Hutterites outside their Bruderhofs. There were two motives for it: the Brethren needed additional cash (all earnings of individual workers were pooled in a common purse), and even more the Brethren needed the favor of their noble manorial lords, whom they were willing to serve in many capacities, thus demonstrating their indispensability. This latter point was one of the strongest arguments for toleration in Moravia. Manifold were the services of the "hired-out" brethren: they were managers of the farms (Meier), vineyards (Winzer), wineries (Kellner), mills (Müller), sawmills, etc. There was hardly any noble estate in Southern Moravia and adjacent Slovakia which did not have one or several brethren in its service. Due to their excellent preparation and moral qualities, these men quickly gained the utmost confidence of the lords and the respect of those who worked under them. This is incidentally also true after 1622, the fateful year of "complete" expulsion from Moravia. There was practically no one who could take their place, and in spite of increasingly sharp mandates we find Brethren working on manorial estates in Moravia as late as 1630, and occasionally even 1640.

Not less significant was the service of the Brethren in the field of surgery and medical care; time and again we hear of Brethren doctors employed by the one or other lord (Cardinal Dietrichstein, the head of the Counter Reformation in Moravia, always called a Hutterite for such service), or in some resort places such as the mineral springs of Trenchin in Slovakia. We do not know exactly the inside story of these services to the "world" and their economic implications, but the motives of service and gaining favorable public opinion seem to have prevailed also in this field.

Very interesting are Hruby's studies concerning the financial situation of the Brethren, their cash reserves, and the way they were taxed and finally deprived of all their savings (capital). Around 1570 (Golden Age) the Brethren had to pay a 2 per cent tax of all house-assessed valuation for the needs of Moravia (about 10 guilders or florins per house). Besides this they also had to pay a poll tax (Kopfsteuer) and a tax on home-brewed beer. The house tax steadily increased; in 1600 it was already 100 fl. per house and in 1608-10 even as high as 160 fl. The government was always in need of money for military purposes; since the Brethren refused to pay war taxes, the amounts were simply requisitioned in the form of cattle, horses, or casks of wine. (Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 309 [to 1579] and 428 [to 1589.]) In 1602-5, during the Turkish invasion which did also so much harm to the Bruderhofs, the need of the Hapsburgs for more money grew immensely. In 1602 the government requisitioned 7,000 guilders, and in 1604 the emperor asked for a "loan" of 20,000 guilders, which, however, was never attained. The request for money became more and more urgent as the great catastrophe of the Thirty Years' War approached. Cardinal Dietrichstein and imperial messengers exerted unbelievable pressure upon the Brethren to extort all the money possible. In 1621, finally, the authorities prevailed upon the Vorsteher Rudolf Hirzel to divulge the hiding place of their money. A total of 30,000 fl. thus fell into the hands of the Cardinal and Emperor Ferdinand II (Hruby, 91; Geschicht-Buch, ed. Wolkan, 576-88, ed. Zieglschmid, 766-80). The story of this confiscation is one of the most exciting in the long history of the Brethren. The Chronicle admits, however, that there was still some money left (which Hirzel did not know), buried somewhere in the fields. Hruby estimates that prior to 1619 the Brethren might have possessed around 60,000 fl., but he calculates that this sum was by no means exorbitant as it represents the working capital of a community of about 15,000 Brethren, or about 5 fl. per member. Eventually, in 1622, the Brethren had to leave Moravia altogether, leaving behind practically everything, 24 Bruderhofs with their entire inventory of grain, wine, 200 head of cattle, 150 horses, 655 pigs and hogs, all furniture and kitchen utensils, woolen material, linen, tools, and all shop equipment. Ignoring the value of the houses, gardens, fields, and meadows, the Brethren estimated the value thus lost at at least 364,000 talers (Geschicht-Buch, ed. Wolkan, 570-71).

In spite of this very tangible loss and the ever-increasing fury of war (with plundering, etc.), the Brethren were able to start to rebuild their communal life in near-by Slovakia, where about one generation later Grimmelshausen found them prosperous again and well organized (under the last great Vorsteher Ehrenpreis, q.v.). The 18th century, then, saw a decline of both the religious and the communal life of the Brethren and the enforced conversion of most Brethren to Catholicism (see Habaner). (The total decline of the Habaner came after World War I in the new state of Czecho-Slovakia.)

In Transylvania the Bruderhofs were never as flourishing as those in the Moravian and Slovakian area. Then, around 1760, came the great exodus from the Hapsburg empire into Walachia and Russia, and now the Brethren became exclusively farmers. Although they were still sober and industrious, their previous well-being was gone, and thus also their remarkable skills and crafts.

In 1874-78 the Brethren settled in the United States, partly with money borrowed from the Rappites (q.v., New Harmony people). Miss Clark, who reports on the Hutterite colonies in 1924, gives a description as if visiting 16th-century Bruderhofs in Moravia. The only difference is that now the Diener der Notdurft or Haushalter is called "boss." He handles all money, he has the keys to all storage rooms, and he organizes the work plan of the entire community. Under him we find the foremen of the farm, mill, carpentry, forge, bootery, etc. Money is only used in contacts with the "world." Needless to say that since there is no private possession, nothing can be bequeathed to one's children (save, perhaps, some handwritten old books). All savings are used to buy more land or machinery. Every Bruderhof is supposed to be self-supporting, although loans are known between the colonies. Crafts are no longer practiced except for the immediate needs of the colony. Today the Brethren accept farm machinery and thus their economy has become fairly thrifty again. Idleness is practically unknown, but so is also haste and rush. To avoid monotony, all work rotates among the Brethren within a certain time. In spite of their peaceful attitude it yet happens now and then that neighboring groups oppose their extension and their land buying (Saskatchewan); the old suspicion and jealousies, which prevailed so long in Moravia, have not yet completely died out. Edam, a town in the Dutch province of North Holland (pop. about 11,000), famous for its cheese. Anabaptism reached Edam very early. On May 22, 1546, two martyrs from Edam, Andries and Dirk Pieters Smul (q.v.), with Jacob de Gelderman (q.v.) of Harderwijk, who was attending Anabaptist services in Edam, were executed at the stake. A letter written by the martyr Thys Joriaensz (q.v.) of Rarop in 1569 to his friends in Edam has been preserved (Mart. Mir. D 485, E 823). It is also known that Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 21 persons between 1551 and 1578 in Edam.

For a long time there were two Mennonite churches in Edam, a Frisian and a Waterlander. The Frisian group had their church on the Halig; the present Mennonite church is on the same street. The Waterland church stood less than 50 paces away, at the corner of Groote Kerkstraat and Molensteeg. Little is known of the latter group; there were presumably only six members left when they joined the Frisians in December 1742. The united congregation was attached to the Waterlander (Rijper) Sociëteit, the Frisian Sociëteit in North Holland, and the Zonist Sociëteit.

For communion, baptism, and marriage, they were often assisted by ministers from neighboring towns.

Until 1760 the congregation had only lay preachers, usually three. From 1760 to 1803 they were rarely without a preacher. In case of need Jan Nieuwenhuisen, the pastor of Monnikendam, served, receiving two guilders each time. Jakob Rienksz, Jr., who was called as preacher on Dec. 22, 1771, had to submit to an examination on April 8, 1772, given by Cornelis Ris (q.v.) of Hoorn and Jan Slot and Pieter Groot of Middelie. Until 1803 each minister had to promise to preach and instruct the children in the Zonist doctrine. At that time they were no longer able to support a preacher, and were served every two weeks by the ministers of Monnikendam, Middelie, and Axwijk; later on only the Monnikendam minister came, but on Feb. 27, 1859, R. de Vries asked to be excused from this service. Then Ring Noord-Holland and the Algemene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit supplied them with preachers until September 1862, when, after a period of about 60 years, the congregation was again able to support itself.

Since that time the following ministers have served: Aemilius W. Wybrands 1862-70, I. J. le Cosquino de Bussy 1870-72, C. R. van Dokkum 1873-77, C. N. Wybrands 1878-81, P. K. Bijl 1881-86, A. Sipkema 1888-1912, P. A. Vis 1912-18, A. A. Sepp 1918-26, Miss A. Leistra 1927-44, J. Maarse 1947-51, and S. L. Verheus since 1952. Since 1935 the Edam congregation has united with Monnikendam for preaching services. The minister lives in Edam. In 1900 the congregation adopted the Leidsche Bundel (q.v.) as its hymnal, and replaced it in 1946 with the new Doopsgezinde Bundel. The membership, 60 in 1726, dropped to 20 in 1834, but has since then steadily increased: 26 in 1847, 80 in 1900, 111 in 1950. The congregation has an active Sunday school for children and a women's organization. A.A.S., vdZ.

Eden (Kan.) Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, formerly known as the Burns (ME I, 478) church. The congregation sold its meetinghouse in the town of Burns sometime after 1950, and built a new meetinghouse two or three miles south of the town, at which time it changed its name to Eden. In 1955 the membership was 174, with Norman M. Eicher, Dennis Smith, and A. Koehn as ministers.

Eden High School, Virgil, Ont., had its origin in an evening Bible school in the M.B. Church at Virgil in 1938, which developed into a day Bible school in 1943, and was then taken over by the newly organized Virgil Bible Society and located in 1944 on a 10-acre estate bought by the Society for this purpose. In 1945 a high school was added, which required the erection in 1947 of a separate high school building. In 1948 the school, now called Eden Bible and High School, was transferred to the Ontario M.B. Conference. In 1955 Eden had 6 teachers and 186 students, 122 of whom come from M.B. homes, most of the others from G.C.M. homes. Forty of the students come from more distant communities such as Kitchener, Leamington, and Detroit and live in the school dormitory. The first principal of the high school was H. B. Thiessen, who was succeeded in 1950 by the present principal, D. H. Neumann. In 1955 the Bible school department was transferred to the Kitchener M.B. Church, and "Bible School" was dropped from the name. H.S.B.

Eden Mennonite Church (GCM), located west of Moundridge, Kan., was organized in 1895 as the Hoffnungsfeld-Eden Mennonite Church; this was changed in 1924 to the present name. The congregation joined the Western District Conference in 1895 and the General Conference Mennonite Church in 1896. The first church was erected in 1898, replaced in 1924 by the present building, which was remodeled in 1949. Ministers who have served the church are Peter M. Krehbiel, Peter Stucky, C. J. Goering, Phil Wedel, and Walter Gering, the latter serving as elder 1937-50. C. J. Goering served as elder 1901-37. The congregation is of Swiss background, having immigrated to the present location in 1874 from Volhynia (q.v.), Russia, where they were a part of four main communities formed by settlers from France, the Palatinate, and Switzerland. The most common names are Goering, Kaufman, Krehbiel, Schrag, Stucky, Waltner, Wedel, and Zerger. The membership in 1955 was 777. Peter J. Dyck accepted the call as pastor of the church in 1950. W.G.

Eden Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Inola, Rogers Co., Okla., a member of the Western District Conference since 1915, was organized on Nov. 12, 1914, with 27 members under the leader W. J. Ewert. The first meetinghouse, a frame structure, was destroyed by fire in 1918, and was replaced by a new frame building with a seating capacity of 175, dedicated on May 2, 1920. Ministers who have served the congregation are Herman P. Jantzen, Sol. Mouttet, G. B. Regier, and Homer Sperling. The membership in 1955 was 147. G.B.R.

Eden Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Eastern District Conference, is located in Schwenksville, Montgomery Co., Pa. Previous to 1818 Mennonites in the vicinity worshiped every four weeks in a building also used as a school, located on the present Keely Church grounds, which was also used by the Reformed and Lutherans; it is possible that the building was a Lutheran-Reformed union church. In 1818 the Mennonites organized a congregation here, choosing William Gottschall (1784-1875) as their deacon, and built their own meetinghouse of stone just outside Schwenksville. In the summer of 1851 a new brick meetinghouse replaced the old one. In 1894 the third and present church was built across the valley on the edge of the town. Previous to 1894 the congregation was known as "Gottshall's," or less frequently as "Ziegler's" or "Mine Hill."

Before 1818 Skippack and Germantown ministers supplied the pulpit, and from 1818 to 1847 Franconia conference ministers supplied the pulpit. In the Oberholtzer division of 1847 Deacon Gottschall and the entire congregation withdrew and joined the new Eastern District Conference. The first resident minister was Moses H. Gottshall, ordained preacher in 1847, and bishop (elder) in 1850. Ministers and their terms of service are: Moses H. Gottshall 1847-88, Samuel H. Longaker 1868-70, N. B. Grubb 1872-82, William H. Gottshall 1884-1905, J. W. Schantz 1907-17, Reed Landis supplied 1917, William H. Grubb 1917-21, Freeman H. Swartz 1921- .

The Sunday school was organized in 1867. The membership in 1847 was 30; in 1908 it was 209, and in 1953 it was 275. The common names today are Clemens, Wood, Alderfer, Kolb, Markley, Nyce, Moyer, Bergey, Hunsicker, and Gottshall. J.H.F.

Eder, Georg (1523-86), a Catholic jurist and humanist, one of the radical champions of the Counter Reformation (q.v.) in Austria and Bavaria during the second half of the 16th century. He was six times the "rector" of the University of Vienna, and rose high in the Austrian bureaucracy. His radical fight against all Protestant parties of the Reformation, but above all against the Lutherans, began at the time when the rather lenient Emperor Maximilian II (see Hapsburg) came to power (1564). He opposed the idea of conciliation with the Protestants, and worked for their total destruction. Since the emperor did not favor this line, Eder came into repeated conflicts with the government. Henceforth he leaned more heavily toward Duke Albrecht V of Bavaria (q.v.), the actual prime mover of the South German Counter Reformation. His correspondence with the duke (published in 1904) reveals most impressively the spirit of that entire movement, which gained momentum also in Austria after the death of Maximilian in 1576.

Of the many polemical writings of Eder two are of greater significance to us, the Evangelische Inquisition, published 1573 by the Jesuit press of Dillingen, Bavaria (second edition at Ingolstadt in 1580), and the somewhat more restrained Malleus Haereticorum (Hammer of the Heretics). In both books Eder tries to justify himself for writing about such a subject in spite of being a jurist. Yet, he declares, he is writing not as a theologian but as a politician who is concerned with the general condition of the country both civic and religious. Church life has deteriorated, he laments, and all obedience to the authorities has nearly vanished, even in Vienna, the seat of the government, in spite of apparent faithfulness externally.

The Evangelische Inquisition is dedicated to two Hapsburg archdukes and was presented personally to the emperor. Nevertheless the imperial government reprimanded him for his attacks on the Lutherans, tried to confiscate all copies available, and forbade him to write further concerning such religious subjects. Since the emperor died only three years later (1576), this order was of little effect, and the book was soon republished (1580). A second volume was also planned but never published, perhaps due to the death of the author in 1586.

The title of this book runs as follows: Evangelische Inquisition wahrer und falscher Religion, wider das gemeine unchristliche Klaggeschrei, dass schier niemand mehr wissen könnt wie oder was er glauben soll (500 pages). Part I describes "the present condition of the churches and the general unchristian polemic" (Klaggeschrei), including also a Ketzertanz of 48 tables or charts. Part II discusses more of the heretical clamor "concerning the false repute of the new-fangled Gospel." Of all the Protestant groups the Anabaptists receive Eder's most acid attacks. In the "Fourth Table" (pp. 57-160) he enumerates not less than 38 different Anabaptist sects, mainly in Moravia (Erhard later repeats this list, enlarging it to 40 names), rather arbitrarily and without solid factual knowledge. Concerning the origin of Anabaptism, Eder claims that it derives somehow from Luther and his teachings. Most of what Eder writes is hearsay; mingled with a few correct statements is much fancy. In general the book is intended to be a defense of Catholicism against charges by the Lutherans.

Also the Malleus Haereticorum at many places mentions the Anabaptists, whose teachings and institutions are allegedly nothing but repetitions of errors revealed as such long before by the Roman Church. One of his sources here is Luther's well-known Brief an zwei Pfarrherrn of 1528, a tract likewise known to have little factual information. Yet in general this work is less vitriolic than the Evangelische Inquisition.

Both books were of great influence upon Christoph Erhard (q.v.), the parish priest of Nikolsburg, Moravia, who continued the fight against both Lutherans and Anabaptists in his area, with about the same arguments. He, too, makes Luther responsible for the rise of Anabaptism, but is somewhat better informed than Eder. Very little is known about Eder's influence and success in the great fight he undertook. Eder (Oeder), Marx (Markus), an Anabaptist martyr concerning whose life only the story of his martyrdom is known, as it is succinctly given in the chronicles of the Hutterites. He was a wagoner by trade. He was seized at Mörenbach in Bavaria, Germany, on April 24, 1605, together with Hans Polzinger, a tailor, probably on their way to Moravia. On the following morning they were put into prison at Ried, where they remained 15 weeks, while Jesuits from Oettingen vainly tried to convert them. Twice they were asked while on the rack who had sheltered them and where they were going, but they revealed nothing. Then the authorities in Burghausen issued an order to behead and then to burn them. This was done at Ried on Aug. 5, 1605. Eder requested the executioner first to behead his companion, and when this was done, said to all the people, "God be praised. My brother has stood the test!" The government was apparently hopeful to the last moment that one or both would be converted, for the executioner had been instructed not to take the life of either if he recanted. Their martyrdom is sung in the hymn beginning, "Hört, hört, und merkt ihr Gottes Kind, die ihr Liebhaber Gottes sind." LOSERTH.

Edgeley is a "country corners" on No. 7 highway in Vaughan Township about 12 miles north of Toronto, Ont. It is within a quarter of a mile of the oldest Mennonite church now standing in Ontario (1824) usually known as the Schmitt (q.v.) Mennonite Church. A few miles south of Edgeley on the township line between Vaughan and York the Mennonite Brethren in Christ conducted Sunday school and worship in a small country church for a number of years, but the congregation is now extinct. Ediger (Edger, Oedger), a Mennonite family name in West Prussia, appearing in the Frisian congregations of the Vistula Valley. Ten families were counted in 1776, and 40 persons in 1935. Members of this family also migrated to Russia (Molotschna) and subsequently to America. Bearers of this name in Russia were Alexander Ediger (q.v.), Heinrich A. Ediger (q.v.), and Salomon Ediger (q.v.). Jacob B. Ediger was a missionary to the Cheyenne Indians in Oklahoma. Other North American representatives include ministers (GCM) Peter Ediger, Fresno, Cal., and Jacob H. Ediger, Inman, Kan., and Elmer Ediger (GCM), executive secretary of the Board of Christian Service, Newton, Kan. G.R.

Ediger, Alexander, an outstanding Mennonite leader during the revolutionary years in Russia, was born in 1893 in the seaport city of Berdyansk where his father, Heinrich A. Ediger, was a bank manager and owner of a printing establishment. After graduating from the local Gymnasium, Alexander studied history and philology at the University of St. Petersburg for four years. After graduation he returned to South Russia and in 1919 married Kathie Dyck, the daughter of a formerly wealthy landowner. Meanwhile the Bolshevik Revolution had reached the south of Russia and the newly married couple escaped on an icebreaker to the Crimea, where conditions were more peaceful at the time.

For several years Ediger supported his young family by teaching at the Gymnasium in a suburb of Simferopol, the largest city of the Crimea. In 1922 he was chosen minister by his home congregation at Berdyansk, and in 1923 he received a call as teacher and preacher to the village of Liebenau, belonging to the Schönsee congregation in the Molotschna settlement. But as a minister he soon had to give up teaching and from then on devoted all his time and energy to his duties as preacher and elder, to which latter office he was ordained in 1925 by David H. Epp. Ediger was an earnest Christian, a man of remarkable ability, of a very friendly and amiable disposition, and of great devotion to his work. He was also a good public speaker and an outstanding musician. Not only was he a master of the piano, but he also composed music and was the leading choir director in the Molotschna.

From the very beginning Ediger brought new life to the Schönsee congregation, which soon spread to other congregations of the Molotschna. In 1925 he became the chairman of the KfK (Kommission für Kirchliche Angelegenheiten) and as such had to represent the Mennonite Church before the Communist government, an exceedingly difficult task at that time. His duties led him frequently to Kharkov and Moscow, where his reception by the government officials usually was far from friendly.

In 1925 Ediger also became the editor of Unser Blatt (q.v.), the only Mennonite publication under Bolshevik rule. This, too, was a very difficult and dangerous undertaking in those days. From the very beginning of its existence the little magazine was censored very strictly and after three years it had to be discontinued.

When religious persecution broke out, Ediger was one of the first to be arrested. In 1933 he was sent to a prison camp at Murmansk, on the shores of the White Sea in the Far North of Russia. After two and a half years he was released and returned home, only to be arrested again and sent with his wife to Eastern Siberia. Mrs. Ediger was sent back to South Russia in 1938 and has heard nothing of her husband since. The Edigers had two children, a daughter Dagmar, born 1922, and a son Harry, born 1926. Mrs. Ediger escaped from Russia during World War II and is now in Canada (1955), but she had to leave her children in Russia.† H.G.

Ediger, Heinrich Abram, b. Nov. 6, 1858, at Gnadenfeld, Molotschna, Russia, d. June 23, 1943, Karlsruhe, Germany, publisher, editor, banker, and burgomaster of Berdyansk, South Russia, was the son of Abram Ediger, whose father, Salomon Peter Ediger, had come from Prussia to the Molotschna in 1819. Abram Ediger taught at Rosenhof, Melitopol district, 1861-67, then moved to Berdyansk to start a business. The young Heinrich received his training under David Görz. He was graduated from the Gnadenfeld Zentralschule, taught for a number of years, and established a print shop and bookstore in Berdyansk, where he became a leading businessman and for a number of years the burgomaster. He was also coeditor of Der Botschafter (q.v.) and active in the Mennonite brotherhood of Russia. Ediger had three sons with a university training, Theodor, a historian, Harry, a lawyer, Alexander (q.v.), the elder of the Schönsee Mennonite Church. After the Russian Revolution Ediger came to Germany and lived at Karlsruhe until his death. He published an article, "Meine Schulzeit bei Lehrer Heinrich Franz" (Bote, Nos. 20-25, 1930), and a book, Erinnerungen aus meinem Leben (Karlsruhe, 1927). B.H.U.

Ediger, Salomon Salomon, a preacher and teacher of the Mennonite Church in Russia, was born Nov. 14, 1876, in Gnadenfeld, South Russia, the son of Salomon and Susanna Mierau Ediger. He attended school in Gnadenfeld, and later taught in the elementary school there for several years, then studied theology at the Predigerschule in Basel. The director of the school was Wilhelm Arnold, a student of Tobias Beck, and the instructors in theology were Johannes von Huene, the father of the noted Tübingen professor; Hermann Gottsched, an authority on Kierkegaard; Samuel Preiswerk; and a certain Schlitter. A number of talented and stimulating fellow students also contributed to Ediger's development into the personality he was later to become. For many years Ediger taught religion and German in the Zentralschule at Ohrloff, succeeding Kornelius B. Unruh. His wife was a daughter of Heinrich Dirks (q.v.) of Gnadenfeld, a missionary; she died in 1924.

When religious instruction was prohibited in the Zentralschule, Ediger taught German and other subjects, and in order to be able to continue his work in the school, he gave up his ministerial status; but since he was unable to join the atheistic league, he was deprived of his position. To support his family, he accepted a position as instructor in the culture of silk in the collectives. But in 1934 he was arrested and sentenced to five years of exile. He returned to Melitopol in 1939 in broken health, and died on Nov. 16, 1940.

In August 1917 Ediger preached the opening sermon of the Allgemeiner Mennonitischer Kongress, a sermon that the delegates at that meeting will never forget. He was a Christian in whom there was no guile!—In August 1941, when the German army was about to enter the Melitopol district, his children were sent into exile. Their subsequent fate is unknown. Education, Hutterite. Among the various Anabaptist groups of the 16th century, perhaps none had so much opportunity for a systematic Christian upbringing of the youth as the Hutterites, who on their large collective Bruderhofs (q.v.) in Moravia could organize and systematically take care of the entire education from the nursery school to kindergarten and through the grades. Education beyond that was expressly declined as nonconducive to the fear of God—the highest goal of all Anabaptist education. That Hutterite education had a very high standard can still be seen from all their handwritten books, done with excellent penmanship, good spelling, skillful style, and as for contents, with excellent Bible knowledge and often deft arguments—things not so commonly found among people of the 16th and 17th centuries.

The organization and spirit of Hutterite education is known through a number of preserved documents. The earliest perhaps is the Handbüchel wider den Prozess . . . of 1558-9 (see Bedenken), which in its section XII contains an Ordnung und Brauch wie man es in der Gemein mit den Kindern hält (A Regulation Concerning the Upbringing of Children in the Brotherhood). Here we read for instance, "That our children are dear to our heart before God according to truth, and a precious concern, to this God would testify for us on the Day of Judgment." Most likely this document was written by Peter Walpot (q.v.), later bishop of the brotherhood, from whom we also have an Address to the Schoolmasters, Nov. 5, 1568 (MQR 1931, 241-44), and a School Discipline ("Schulordnung") of 1578 (ibid., 1931, 232-40). Also of 1578, we have further the report of a sympathetic observer, Stephan Gerlach, later professor at Tübingen (Bossert, Quellen, 1106-7). There exists also a catechism or Kinderbericht, used in Hutterite schools, of which two versions became known, of 1586 and of 1620 (Arch. f. Ref.-Gesch., 1940, 44-60). It gives the impression that it was written by Peter Riedemann (q.v., d. 1556), the author of the great Rechenschaft, with which it shows much similarity. There is among the Hutterite manuscripts a third brief Kinderbericht which deals extensively with the ordinance of baptism and communion. The use of the Kinderbericht in child training accounts for the fact that the Hutterite prisoners always had a ready answer to the court questioner when on trial and also for the fact that they so often agreed word for word with each other.

Each Bruderhof had two types of schools within its organization: the "Little School," a nursery and "Kindergarten" (age 2-6), in operation three centuries before the modern European Kindergarten was developed, and the "Big School," i.e., the grades (age 6-12). The latter was actually more than a mere school, and may be compared to a children's home where they lived and were taken care of practically throughout the year, in conformity with the Hutterite principle of community living. The two documents by Peter Walpot (above) laid down the principles which should guide the entire upbringing, and which were to be obeyed by the schoolmasters, the schoolmothers, and their assistants (Kindsdirn). "Let each schoolmaster," Walpot declared, "deal with the children by day and night as though they were his own, so that each one may be able to give an account before God . . ." (MQR 1931, 240). The spirit which permeates the school regulation of 1578 is that of a free and cheerful discipline in love and the fear of God, peaceful in spirit. To be dutiful and peaceful is conducive to good discipline. One cannot take too much care of the children, and the adults should always be mindful of setting a good example, since the children watch them and learn from their behavior. Walpot takes great care to instruct the teachers how to handle difficult cases. The use of a rod may sometimes be necessary, but great discretion and discernment should be exercised therein, for often a child can be better trained and corrected by kind words whereas harshness would be altogether in vain. The exercise of discipline of children requires the fear of God on the part of the teachers and high sense of responsibility. Children should be trained to accept punishment willingly, and care should be taken that they do not become self-willed. But above all they should be trained to love the Lord and to be diligent in prayer.

Great care was also taken of cleanliness and healthful living—in an age when those hygienic principles were by no means generally accepted. Even small details are regulated and enjoined, about eating, washing, sleeping, the children's clothing, and then above all the separation of the sick and the special handling of their laundry. The major emphasis, however, is laid on the right spirit and the ever alert responsibility of those in whose care the children are entrusted, so that the honor of God may always be promoted.

Basically these principles have been preserved fairly unchanged among the Hutterites up to the present day, though documents of later times are lacking. Bertha W. Clark, who visited the Brethren in South Dakota in 1923, describes the Hutterite system of education in the Bon-Homme Bruderhof, showing that in spite of certain necessary adaptations to American ways the spirit of the upbringing of the youth is by and large the same as of old. It is true that in the grade schools the legally prescribed curriculums have to be taught (if possible by Hutterite teachers—though the teachers are usually non-Hutterite, since Hutterites do not meet the educational requirements of the state for teaching), but the nursery and kindergarten is still today "really Hutterian." Education, Mennonite. Mennonites originated during the 16th century, more or less simultaneously in Holland, Germany, and Switzerland; since then they have migrated from these countries to France, Russia, Canada, United States, Mexico, Paraguay, Brazil, Uruguay, and Argentina. Living under the differing political, economic, and social orders of 12 national cultures, they have naturally not developed a common educational system that is peculiar to the whole body. Only in Russia, where the Mennonites colonized in a retarded civilization, did they develop an extensive educational system of their own designing. In the United States, where the national life was progressive and democratic, they have found a separate school system less necessary. Hence Mennonite education must be studied separately in each country where Mennonites have established themselves.

1. Holland. The Mennonites in Holland have not lived in closed communities as their brethren have done, more or less, in other countries. Being largely an urban people engaged in business and the professions, they have become an integral part of the national life of the Netherlands, closely identified with their country's economic activities, social order, and educational institutions.

With one exception (Haarlem) there have never been any Mennonite schools of any level in Holland, elementary, secondary, or college. Children from Mennonite homes attend the schools established by various other organized church bodies or by secular agencies. Dutch Mennonites by principle believe that this is better than to have separate Mennonite schools. Only the Haarlem congregation has operated Mennonite parochial schools. There have been two such schools. The first was opened in 1782 at the Groot Heiligland, in order to give a good education to the children of poor members, and closed in September 1952, since there were then only a few children in the inner city. The second was opened on Ripperdastraat on May 1, 1893, for the same purpose, and was still operating in 1954.

In 1811 the Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit (q.v.), the "General Conference" of all the Mennonite churches in Holland, was established, mainly for the purpose of assuming the joint responsibility for the Theological Seminary at Amsterdam, which the church at Amsterdam had operated in 1680-1706 and continuously after 1735. This school represents the only educational activity of the Mennonites in Holland except for the two Haarlem elementary schools.

2. Germany. Like their brethren in Holland, the Mennonites in Germany have not established their own school system. During the period of persecution followed by various imposed economic, religious, and educational restrictions, the Mennonites promoted no institutions which would encourage greater opposition. A careful study of the literature pertaining to Mennonite life in Germany reveals but few references to educational activities. Sometimes in communities where the population was solidly Mennonite or in communities where a sufficient number of Mennonite children were available, the local minister organized a school in the church. The Mennonite Church of Hamburg-Altona had such a school in the 18th century. The congregation at Deutschhof, Palatinate, also had such a school. For longer or shorter periods some elementary schools were operated by Mennonites in Eastern Germany (Brenkenhoffswalde before 1834), Galicia, and Bavaria (Bildhausen, 1838 ff.).

However, one Mennonite secondary school was established. Through the efforts of Michael Löwenberg, a Mennonite minister of the Weierhof congregation in the Palatinate, the Realanstalt am Donnersberg (q.v.), later named the Weierhof Real- und Erziehungs-Anstalt, was formally opened on Dec. 2, 1867. The school, a secondary boarding school, grew immediately in students and financial gifts from numerous Mennonite churches. The original purpose, to add a full Biblical seminary for the training of Mennonite ministers, however, was not realized. All efforts by Löwenberg to secure the conference sanction and acceptance of the school failed. The school became a very successful private boys' high school, but though always operated by a Mennonite board of directors, and always having religious instruction by the Weierhof Mennonite pastor, it never had more than a handful of Mennonite students. It was taken over in the Hitler government for a Nazi training school. In 1945 the French army and in 1952 the American army took over the buildings for the use of occupation forces. In 1952 the trustees of the Weierhof school established a boys' dormitory (Schülerheim) at the nearby (2½ miles) Kirchheimbolanden Gymnasium for Mennonite students attending the Gymnasium.

3. Switzerland. The Mennonites in Switzerland have maintained a small number of German elementary schools in the Jura district during the past 150 years, since the Mennonite communities there are German cultural islands surrounded by French culture. The elementary schools operating at the present time (seven in 1954) comply with all the educational requirements provided by Swiss law. In 1949 the Basel Bible School (Europäische Mennonitische Bibelschule, q.v.) was established in Basel, sponsored by the Swiss, Alsatian, French, and South German Mennonites.

4. France. During the past 250 years of residence in France the Mennonites there have remained in touch with their brethren in Switzerland and South Germany and have shared their religious and cultural heritage with them. They have, however, become fully integrated into French life and have never had any schools of their own; Isaac Rich conducted a private school at Exincourt (q.v.) in 1869-76.

5. Russia. For the first 100 years on the steppes of South Russia, beginning with the Chortitza settlement in 1789, the Mennonites enjoyed almost complete political, religious, and educational autonomy. Left free of governmental regulations and restrictions, they developed an educational system whose underlying philosophy was determined by the ideals of their leaders. (See Education Among the Mennonites of Russia.)

Probably the most original and interesting contribution to Mennonite education was the development of secondary schools called Zentralschulen. These schools were either established by organized educational associations or by wealthy individuals. Although a few Zentralschulen were coeducational, most of the secondary schools were for boys. Both Halbstadt and Chortitza established high schools for girls.

Since the Mennonites in Russia established and supervised their own schools, they were able to offer religious instruction at the elementary and secondary level without maintaining separate Bible schools for that purpose. No liberal arts colleges were ever established. Advanced training was obtained at various universities of Europe.

By 1943 the Russian Mennonites had either been scattered, exiled, or moved to other lands. For 156 years they had lived in the steppes of the Ukraine. Today a splendid Mennonite educational system lies in complete ruin behind the iron curtain.

6. United States. The educational activities of the Mennonites in the United States are varied and an adequate description of them becomes quite complex. They began with the first settlement in Germantown in 1683 and have continued, more or less, to the present time. The student of Mennonite education must recognize the fact that these educational activities are carried on by a number of the different Mennonite branches independently of each other. The Amish, for instance, operate a number of elementary schools, but they are opposed to secondary and collegiate training. The Mennonites (MC) on the other hand maintain some schools at all levels: elementary, secondary, and college. The Church of God in Christ, Mennonite has never established any educational institutions. The Mennonite Brethren Church has one college, one Bible College, but no high schools in the United States; however, it has several high schools and one Bible College in Canada; but it has no elementary schools. The General Conference group has a similar situation in Canada, but has several high schools and three colleges in the United States. The North American pattern is indeed varied, intricate, and to the outsider confusing.

When the Mennonites from the various countries of Europe settled in the vast spaces of the New World, they were anxious to preserve both their religion and their German language. To achieve these two aims they established many elementary schools (q.v.). But, in the course of time, conflicts arose between the public school systems controlled by the various states in which Mennonites had settled and the Mennonite parochial schools, which have never been wholly dissolved.

A strong interest in Christian education manifested by the Mennonites in the United States has motivated the establishment and the operation of many schools. This interest has not only been continuous but is very definitely increasing. If the Mennonites in the United States were more united doctrinally, and if they were more concentrated into compact communities, they could maintain an educational system comparable to that conducted by other churches, such as the Lutherans or Catholics.

Since 1938 there has been a very decided increase in the number of church-controlled elementary schools (q.v.), commonly called Christian day schools, among the Mennonites in the eastern half of the United States. These schools, thus far, are sponsored only by the Mennonite (MC) churches and the Amish.

The ever-increasing stream of America's youth into high schools during the last quarter century has swept the Mennonite boys and girls into the movement. Although in many communities Mennonite parents encourage high-school attendance, there are those who oppose secondary education as administered by the state. This opposition has been responsible for the establishment of 15 (1954) Mennonite high schools (q.v.), and the number is increasing. These schools strive to offer a standard secondary education in a Christian atmosphere. The curriculum, for each, is prescribed in part by the state in which it operates, but the environment is determined by the sponsors of the schools.

There are at present eight Mennonite Liberal Arts colleges (q.v.) in the United States. Two of these offer only a two-year course and therefore are classified as junior colleges. All of them are comparatively young. The oldest, Bethel College (in Kansas), was organized in 1893 and the most recent, Bethel College (in Indiana), was established in 1947. In addition there are three Bible colleges offering three- to four-year programs above high school.

Of the sixteen Mennonite bodies in the United States, only five have been instrumental in bringing the eleven colleges into existence. These five branches constitute about 75 per cent of the total Mennonite population in the United States. Some of the other eleven smaller branches are strongly opposed to higher education, while others co-operate with the larger branches.

The development of colleges among the North American Mennonites has been fraught with many difficulties. The two main opposing factors have been a fear of higher education and the enormous cost of the establishing and operating of a college. Most of the active colleges represent second attempts. Bethel College (Kansas) emerged out of Halstead Seminary, Goshen College was preceded by Elkhart Institute, Bluffton College represents a reorganized Central College. Several other colleges functioned for brief periods and then failed, never to be reorganized. Inexperienced leadership, biased opposition, lack of financial support, and an unwillingness among the various branches to co-operate with each other were some of the main contributing causes of difficulties and failures.

The rise of Bible institutes and theological seminaries among the Mennonites in the United States is of recent origin. These schools have experienced considerable encouragement and support. The establishment of these schools expresses a trend toward a more educated leadership in all phases of Christian work. There are now three graduate seminaries (q.v.) (G.C.M. in Chicago, M.C. at Goshen, M.B. at Fresno), with strong Bible departments granting degrees at four other colleges, and three Bible Colleges which are in effect lower grade seminaries.

7. Canada. Education among the Mennonites in Canada has become increasingly more active during the past several decades. During the school year 1947-48 they operated 22 Bible schools, 11 high schools, and 2 Bible colleges. Of particular significance is the decided trend toward the establishment and operation of Mennonite private high schools.

Undoubtedly the most serious conflict between Mennonites and the state in modern times took place in Manitoba over the school question in connection with the outbreak of World War I, which resulted in wholesale emigration of the opposing groups to Mexico and Paraguay. The attempt to secularize and nationalize schools operated by these conservative churches with the requirement that the schools be conducted in the English language was the chief cause of the conflict. (See Old Colony Mennonites.)

8. Mexico. When the more conservative Mennonites of Canada realized that they could not continue instructing their children as they had done for generations, about 5,000 left their Canadian farms to till the soil on the semiarid plains of Chihuahua, Mexico. With educational freedom assured by the Mexican government, the colonists re-established their own traditional elementary schools which the Canadian government had labeled inadequate.

In 1935, hardly a decade after the establishment of their settlements on Mexican soil, there came from that government the unexpected order to close all Mennonite schools. The Mexican officials who came to carry out the order contended that the Mennonite schools were being conducted in an unlawful manner and that they would have to conform to the school laws of the land. As a result of several petitions to governmental authorities the Mennonites were permitted to resume their school activities.

The Mennonites in Mexico represent an ultraconservative wing of the Mennonite Church. They have migrated twice to escape the nationalization of their schools. Their educational philosophy is rather simple. Every child must learn to read the Bible in the German language. His education is completed with a few sacred hymns and the catechism. Such traditional courses as science, history, literature, geography, and government are not included in the curriculum.

9. South America. The Mennonites in Paraguay, Uruguay, Brazil, and Argentina are newcomers to these South American republics. Except for a small group from Canada, they came from war-torn Europe, poor and homeless. They are beginning a new life in a strange environment. Among their number are well-trained teachers, ministers, and craftsmen. Because of the prevailing poverty and the hard conditions of pioneer life, their schools are still somewhat primitive, though constantly improving. Elementary schools have been opened in all the villages in the Paraguay colonies and several secondary schools have been established in the various colony centers. In Brazil the pre-World War II Mennonite elementary German schools were closed by a government order which required the language of instruction to be Portuguese and the teachers to be native-born Brazilians. In 1954 a Mennonite high school (Zentralschule) was established near Curitiba.

One Mennonite village school was in operation in Uruguay in 1953. No such schools are contemplated by the small number of Mennonite immigrants in Argentina.

General Characteristics of Mennonite Education. Certain experiences in the history of the Mennonites have resulted in traditions and attitudes that explain the peculiar emphases in Mennonite education.

1. German Language. The determination to maintain and perpetuate German as a language of instruction and church worship has resulted in conflicts between Mennonites and the state in certain lands, such as Russia, Canada, Mexico, and Brazil. In 1870, for instance, the Russian government began a program of nationalization of all German schools within the land. When the Mennonites, who had operated their own independent school system for nearly a century, began to feel the effects of state control, they protested. They feared the results of compulsory use of Russian as the language of instruction, but ultimately submitted and discovered that they could still keep the German language as their cultural language. The process of assimilation has practically completed the shift from German to English among most of the Mennonites in the United States. But in Canada, Mexico, Switzerland, Brazil, and Paraguay, the language problem is still a source of difficulty.

2. Due to the divisions in the Mennonite brotherhood, no conjoint or integrated educational program for the entire group has been planned or can well be planned.

3. Mennonitism and Education. An increasing awareness is growing in the minds of the leaders that an educational system at all levels will have to be operated if Mennonitism is to be preserved and perpetuated. In Western Europe, where the Mennonites have not established their own schools, substantial changes have been made in the traditional Mennonite faith, including the abandonment of some major original principles; whereas in Russia and North America, where church schools have been established on a wide though varying scale, the changes have not been so damaging to the original heritage and faith. The past 50 years has seen a great growth in Mennonite educational activities in both the United States and Canada. In the last two decades one can almost speak of an educational renaissance. In order to preserve their youth for the Mennonite faith and prepare workers for the growing program of the church, new schools have been established, programs of the church enlarged, financial investment increased, and standards raised. The Mennonite schools of North America are now playing a very important role in the church; they will undoubtedly be increasingly important. In fact we can no longer conceive of the church without its schools. In 1951-52 a total of 5,704 Mennonite seminary, college, high-school, and Bible school students of all branches were in attendance at Mennonite schools in the United States and Canada. In 1953-54 in the elementary schools of the Mennonite Church (MC) alone (no other statistics available) an additional 3,500 pupils were in attendance. Reckoning those not reported, one can assume 10,000 young Mennonites attending Mennonite schools of all levels in 1953-54. (See Education Among the Mennonites in Russia; Elementary Education.)

Education Among the Mennonites in Russia. One of the rights granted the Mennonites by the Russian government at their immigration was the management of their own school system. From 1789 to 1881 Russian authorities concerned themselves little with the Mennonite schools. The Mennonites had brought with them from West Prussia (q.v.) the conviction that it is the duty of parents to provide for the elementary instruction of their children, and they tried to fulfill this obligation. Even though because of poverty they could not at once build schools, they nevertheless saw to it that their children received instruction. In the very first years, because of lack of space and teachers, it is possible that two villages united here and there to maintain a school; but as a rule each village had its own school from the very beginning. This was the practice of the Russian Mennonites always and everywhere, in the first mother settlements, Chortitza and Molotschna, and later in the many daughter colonies in Caucasia, Central Asia, in northeastern Russia, in Siberia, in Canada, and in recent times in the latest settlements in Mexico, Brazil, and Paraguay.

The educational system of a country or people is to a large extent dependent on its economic situation and material prosperity. Higher culture can develop only where there is energy left over and above the requirements for existence. In the early days in Russia the educational system was primitive. Not until the 1870's, after various internal difficulties had been solved and the Mennonites had become prosperous through better agricultural methods and the introduction of winter wheat, did the schools receive a strong forward impetus; but by World War I they had reached a high state of development.

(1) The Elementary Schools. The first schools were, like the time and circumstances, extremely primitive in teacher preparation, equipment, and methods. The first teachers were farmers who managed the schools in winter in addition to their farms, or craftsmen who carried on their trades besides teaching the children. Too often the schoolroom also served as a shop. It also occurred in the early period that young journeymen learning a trade, non-Mennonites, were engaged as teachers. As late as the 1820's there were still some Lutheran teachers in the Molotschna settlement. But on the whole the Mennonites tried to have only Mennonite teachers. And later, especially during the most intensive program of Russianization (1890-1905), the Mennonites always and sometimes successfully protested the engagement of a non-Mennonite teacher. The problem was simplified by the fact that the villages paid their own teachers.

Instruction consisted of reading, writing, arithmetic, and religion. Much emphasis was placed on memorization (the Ten Commandments, hymns, etc.), on illuminated writing and penmanship; arithmetic was also thoroughly drilled, though quite mechanically.

German was the language of instruction. The Russian language was not generally taught until it became a compulsory subject in 1866 at the demand of the Fürsorge-Komitee (q.v.), though some progressive teachers were giving instruction in Russian as early as the 1830's. In the 1890's Russian became the obligatory language of instruction for all subjects but German and religion, and remained so until the end of organized Mennonite life in Russia, about 1925.

The supervision of the schools was by law the responsibility of the elders and preachers. But in practice leadership in the educational field was always in the hands of outstanding teachers or other laymen in the community. In the early period the schools were usually the concern of the civil government of the Mennonites. Thus a school regulation (Schulverordnung) was issued on Jan. 26, 1808, in the Molotschna, in the third year of the existence of the colony, which was to regulate school conditions in the villages. There was at that time no central organ to direct the educational system.

This was changed in 1843 when the Fürsorge-Komitee placed the management of the Mennonite schools in the hands of the Agricultural Association (q.v.), which was founded in 1831. At its head was Johann Cornies (q.v.). To the association with its extended authorization and to the first two chairmen, Johann Cornies and Philipp Wiebe, the Mennonite schools owe a great deal. The old, narrow schoolrooms were replaced by spacious, bright ones; a new general school regulation was passed to improve the relationship between the teacher and the community. The choice and examination of teachers was carefully supervised by the Association, and the inspection of teachers was more rigorously organized. Teaching was improved by rules concerning methods and the treatment of school children as well as by a unified curriculum. Compulsory attendance was more strictly enforced. General and local teachers' conventions were held.

Later the authority of the Agricultural Association was limited to its special agricultural task. At the instigation of a group of teachers the Molotschna Mennonite School Board (Molotschnaer Mennoniten-Schulrat, q.v.) was organized, and was without hesitancy approved by the Fürsorge-Komitee. This board was for 50 years (1869-1920) the leader and protector of the Mennonite educational system. Under its well-informed leadership the schools made a long stride forward. Especially in the first 25 years of its existence was the school board very effective, due to the untiring efforts of such men as Andreas Voth, Johann Klatt, Peter Heese, Abr. Görz, and Heinrich Unruh.

The Molotschna board worked out a new program for the village and secondary schools (Zentralschulen), which was approved by the national authorities in 1876, and which won state rights for the Mennonite schools, a matter of particular importance for the performance of the alternative service. In Halbstadt and in Chortitza special two-year teacher-training schools (Lehrerseminar) were established. The system of teacher conventions was also reorganized, making them a source of inspiration and training. The other Mennonite settlements also appointed school boards similar to the one in the Molotschna.

In 1881 the situation was radically changed, when the educational system was put under the national department of education. To the Russian school authorities the Mennonite school boards were unwelcome; but they were permitted to function for a number of years, though with decreasing authority. But in the 1890's the program of Russianization was so rigorously carried out, especially by the department of education, that the Mennonite school boards had to struggle for the very existence of these schools and for their own existence as a board, until finally they were no longer able to function at all.

The year 1905 brought a slight though only temporary relaxing of the situation. But the teachers still had the right to form associations, and they did this. These teachers' associations then assumed various functions of the former school boards, such as conventions, organization of general vocational courses, working out of syllabi and curricula, choice of textbooks and equipment, etc.

All the Mennonite schools were church schools. Religion had always been one of the principal subjects of instruction, and until the 1870's the Bible was a reader in the elementary schools. The students were at that time divided into three groups: Fibler (lower grade), Testamentler (middle grade), and Bibler (upper grade). The school deputation (Elder A. Görz, school board member A. Voth, and secondary school teachers H. Franz and H. Lenzmann) which was sent to St. Petersburg in 1876 on the matter of the new national program for the schools made the Mennonite position on this question very clear: "Both the village and secondary schools and also the teachers' seminary must have absolutely the character of church schools, and only if they are confirmed as such do they fulfill their purpose, since in these schools not only our teachers, who must also be the religious instructors of our children, but also our preachers and pastors must be trained. All schools under us must be so definitely founded on the Mennonite confession that the students can acquire a religious training that will qualify them to assume the office of a preacher or elder, for according to our organization and the Holy Scripture, these officials must be chosen from among the people" (A. Görz, 16).

The religious character of the Mennonite schools was then recognized by the Russian authorities, and was preserved even after the schools were placed under the national ministry of education in 1881; for this law contained the reservation that the religious and spiritual training of any group should be under the direction of the clergy of that group, and that the curriculum should provide enough time to preserve the principles and native tongue of the group. One third of the total time, or about thirty hours per week or ten hours of class instruction, were considered adequate. This plan was maintained until the Revolution in 1917. The ten hours were equally divided between religion and German. The five hours thus devoted to religious instruction must be considered generous. In the Zentralschulen a course in church history was added, and in the teacher-training school also Mennonite history, dogmatics, Christian ethics, etc. Instruction in German and religion were not under Russian supervision, but under the Mennonite ministerial body or the Mennonite school board.

Fresh motivation was received from Germany and Switzerland again and again, first through young teachers who came from there, such as Tobias Voth (immigrated in 1821), Heinrich Heese (1827), Heinrich Franz I (1834), Fr. W. Lange (1837), and David Hausknecht; and later, about 1870, by young people who were sent to Germany and Switzerland for advanced education. Some of the first to go abroad to study were Heinrich Franz II, Kornelius Unruh, and P. M. Friesen, and many others followed. At first they went to Barmen and later to Basel. In the 1880's the Russian influence became predominant, and many a teacher made personal contacts with the leading Russian pedagogues, such as Ushinski, Baron Korff, Baranov, and Yevtuzovsky, whose works were also eagerly read. But about 1900, probably in consequence of compulsory Russianization, the German influence again became predominant. In the last 15 years before World War I hardly any major German school reform idea was unknown in the Mennonite schools in Russia, be it Kerschensteiner with his idea of the Arbeitsschule, or E. Linde with his pedagogy of the personality, H. Scharrelmann with his "heartfelt (herzhaft) instruction," or Freud with his investigations in experimental psychology; they were all industriously and thoroughly read and found imitators with more or less skill among the Mennonite teachers.

Relations with the Moravian Brethren (Herrnhuter) also are worthy of note. Tobias Voth, the first teacher of the Orloff Zentralschule (1822-29), carried on a correspondence with them. When Andreas Voth as the president of the Molotschna school board opened the first girls' school (Mädchenschule) in Halbstadt in 1874, he called as the first teacher a young Herrnhut woman, Sophie Schlenker of Königsfelden, of whom P. M. Friesen says that all of his pedagogical ideas came from the Herrnhuters (through her). When Peter Braun, the teacher of the Halbstadt Zentralschule and later president of the normal school (Lehrerseminar), spent the summer of 1912 in Germany, he went to Niesky for a a week in order to become acquainted with the Moravian Brethren school system.

(2) Secondary Schools. One of the problems of the Mennonites of Russia was that of finding teachers for their schools. In the early period all the teachers were self-taught men, and even later not a few were of this type. Some of these were Johann Peters of Neuendorf, Johann Bräul of Rudnerweide, Peter Siemens of Münsterberg, Peter Holzrichter of Rosenort, Johann Bräul of Orloff, and David Dürksen of Margenau. Also the two elders who were teachers, Abr. Görz and Heinrich Unruh, who were also many years later successful members of the school board, were purely self-taught men.

Another way of preparing teachers was by the method of apprentice teachers, which also produced many a competent schoolman. Boys who felt a desire for teaching as a vocation went into an apprenticeship with approved teachers, in winter serving as their assistants and in summer taking courses in educational theory under these teachers. In this way Peter Siemens prepared many a young man for the teachers' examination.

These methods, which were feasible only for a few individuals, could not satisfy the need. The need of a higher school for this purpose soon became apparent. As early as 1820 the Christian School Association (Christlicher Schulverein, q.v.) was formed in Orloff, which opened the Orloff Vereinsschule in 1822 to prepare teachers for the elementary schools, where the native language should be taught besides German. The soul of this association was Johann Cornies. The first teachers in the school were Tobias Voth 1822-29, and Heinrich Heese 1829-42, both of whom had received training in Germany.

In 1835 at the request of the Fürsorge-Komitee a district school was founded to prepare young men for service in the colony offices, which required a knowledge of the Russian language. In 1838 the private school in Steinbach was opened. In Gnadenfeld a Bruderschule was established. In 1842 Chortitza also acquired such a Fortbildungsschule.

All of these secondary schools, which were later commonly known as Zentralschulen, had to contend with all sorts of obstacles for a long time. The necessary understanding and interest were lacking among the settlers in general, and for many years there were very few students in these secondary schools. They were conspicuously not at all touched by the reforms introduced into the village schools by the Agricultural Association. P. M. Friesen says that until 1870 the Mennonite school authorities were unable to comprehend why two teachers should or could be employed at the same school at the same time! And so these schools usually had only one teacher, and instruction in the Russian language was usually rather weak. Nor did they prove to be teacher-training institutions, even though a number of successful teachers came from them.

The Zentralschulen finally achieved their proper organization as "general educational schools" under the administration by the school boards. The program worked out by the school board and approved by the ministry of education was planned for four years (for ages 13 or 14 to 17 or 18), and was adapted to the program of the Russian city schools. There were two classes, each of two years. In 1884 a school was opened in the Molotschna with three classes of one year each instead of the two classes with two years each. This type of school was also introduced by the daughter colonies of the Molotschna. But in 1912, when the city schools were converted into "higher elementary schools," with a four-year program, the Zentralschulen of the Molotschna type also went back to the four-class system. The Zentralschulen of Chortitza and the Chortitza daughter colonies always had the four-year course.

In the beginning the language of instruction was German, but by the middle 1880's Russian was the language of instruction for all courses but German and religion.

After the reform the Zentralschulen soon gained in importance in the public life and sympathy. They acquired a good reputation, and the enrollment increased year by year. Especially the Orloff Zentralschule (q.v.) under Kornelius Unruh 1873-1905, and Johann Bräul 1905-17, and the Chortitza Zentralschule (q.v.) under Abr. Neufeld 1890-1905 enjoyed an excellent reputation.

The four freedoms of 1905—speech, the press, meetings, and associations—stimulated a growing social consciousness in all classes of the Russian people. Among the Mennonites it found expression, first of all, in the building of new schools. In the decade 1905-14 twice as many secondary schools were opened as in the century before, and throughout the settlements as far as Siberia.

After the Zentralschulen were no longer thought of as teacher-training institutions, which they really had never been, special schools had to be created for this purpose. In 1878 a two-year pedagogical course was added to the Zentralschule in Halbstadt, Molotschna, with a practice school. In 1890 such courses were created in the Chortitza school, and increased to three years in 1911. For admission, graduation from a Zentralschule was required.

These two institutions thereafter furnished the teaching staff for most of the Mennonite schools throughout Russia. It is to their credit that the teachers they produced maintained the closest contact with Mennonite society, faith, and life, and at the same time gave thorough teaching in the Russion language and literature. But it was not until 1917 that the Russian school authorities permitted these schools to become independent, full teacher-training schools.

When the pedagogical courses were opened, another lack in the Mennonite school system became apparent. Not all the graduates of the Zentralschule wanted to become farmers or teachers. Of those interested in higher education only a small fraction were able to attend a university in a foreign country; and those who wanted to attend a Russian university first had to attend a Russian Gymnasium (or Realschule). This route was expensive and difficult, because the Zentralschulen were not integrated into the Russian pattern. In addition many parents were very reluctant to send their young sons into a Russian city, where they were exposed to all sorts of danger and might easily be harmed in soul or body. How could this handicap be removed? The simplest and surest way was to open a Realschule in a Mennonite center.

In 1908 a Mennonite Realschule was opened in Halbstadt, which continued the work of the Zentralschulen. But since this school was hard to maintain under the direction of the ministry of education, it was after a year changed into a four-year business college (Kommerzschule) because the ministry of commerce permitted its schools a greater degree of independence. Graduates of the Zentralschulen were admitted to the fourth or fifth class of the business college without examination. In order to provide a corresponding education for girls, the Halbstadt Mädchenschule (q.v.) (girls' school) was gradually developed into a full eight-year girls' Gymnasium.

This was the final status of the Mennonite attempt at education in Russia, a closed school system (elementary school, Zentralschule, teachers' training school or business college or girls' Gymnasium), which admitted to the Russian universities.

During World War I Mennonite schools were not greatly affected. Teachers' associations were abolished, but the schools remained in operation, and the German language was not prohibited.

After the February Revolution of 1917 new hopes inspired the peoples of Russia. The Mennonite school boards were reorganized, the teachers' associations were reconstituted, and it was commonly believed that a time of new growth and joyous work had dawned.

But this was not to be the case. For three years the civil war raged, ending in October 1920 with the Soviet government in control in all of Russia. Thereby a hoarfrost fell on the thriving school system of the settlements, and destroyed it. All schools came under state control, and the Mennonite schools soon lost their Mennonite character and influence. After 1920 there were some schools which used the German language, but no Mennonite schools. There was a brief revival of the old school system during the German occupation of the Ukraine in 1941-43.

(3) Statistics. (a) Elementary Schools. With a total population of about 110,000, the Mennonites of Russia had about 450 elementary schools in 1920 (village and farm schools) with about 16,000 pupils. The elementary schools had a seven-year course, but it happened frequently that a child dropped out after six or even five years of school. But it is not likely that a mentally normal child of Mennonite parents remained illiterate. All the elementary schools were coeducational. Most of them (about 350) had only one teacher. The maximum number of pupils assigned to a single teacher was set at 60, but such instances were rare. Most schools with 50 pupils had 2 teachers. There were a total of 85 two-room schools, 9 three-room, and 5 four-room elementary schools.

Five of the elementary schools were town or city schools: Berdyansk, Melitopol, Ekaterinoslav, Davlekanovo, and Slavgorod; two were charity schools: Berezovka near Davlekanovo, and Halbstadt; and one for orphans at Grossweide. In addition there was a five-room school for the deaf in Tiege with about 50 pupils.

There were about 570 Mennonite teachers in these schools, about 70 being women.

(b) Secondary Schools. As a continuation of the elementary schools, the Zentralschulen were founded. There were ultimately 25 of these. In 1920 the Zentralschulen were almost without exception four-year schools and adapted to the Russian "higher elementary schools" in their curriculum. Of these Zentralschulen 19 were boys' schools, 4 were girls' schools, and 2 were coeducational (two schools were called Handelsschulen—business schools). In addition there were two schools (Ministerialschulen), in Köppental and Alexandertal on the Volga, sponsored by the Department of Education. These latter schools had the same rights as the Zentralschule, but were on a different plane. The total number of pupils in the Zentralschulen was about 2,000, with a teaching staff of about 100 teachers.

The most advanced schools were (1) the two teacher-training schools (Halbstadt and Chortitza), each with a three-year course, which trained the elementary teachers and were considered continuations of the Zentralschulen. In normal times each of these schools had an enrollment of about 60 students. (2) An eight-year business school for boys, located in Halbstadt, whose graduates were admitted to the state university. In normal times its enrollment was about 300. (3) An eight-year girls' Gymnasium, also in Halbstadt, with the complete curriculum of the state gymnasium; its enrollment was about 150.

In all of these schools, with the exception of the school for the deaf (where for technical reasons only German was taught), the German and Russian language and literature were taught in equal amount. The school of commerce had as an additional requirement a choice of either French or English.

(c) The Teaching Staff. About 15 per cent of the elementary teachers had no certificate, being only students at the Zentralschulen or self-taught. These teachers usually worked in the new schools opening year by year in new settlements and large estates. Of the remaining 85 per cent about one half had a regular pedagogical education from Halbstadt or Chortitza. The others were students at Zentralschulen or self-taught to the extent that they were able to earn the state teachers' diploma.

The teaching staff in the Zentralschulen was composed of (a) those who had graduated from Russian teachers' institutes, (b) those who had a secondary-school education and had a corresponding teacher's certificate, (c) those who after a few years of teaching in an elementary school passed an examination for one or more subjects qualifying them to teach in Zentralschulen.

The religious instructors of the Zentralschulen were commonly elementary schoolteachers who had attended some institution or university in a foreign country; for German they had as a rule a teacher's certificate.

The average salary of the elementary teachers, often paid in kind, was perhaps 500 roubles annually with lodging. Zentralschule teachers received an annual salary of perhaps 1,200 roubles, also with rooms. (At that time a rouble was equivalent to 50 cents.)

All the schools, with the exception of the two Ministerialschulen (Samara) which were supported by the district (Zemstvo), were built and maintained by the Mennonite communities, but were under state supervision.

A late attempt to establish a theological school was frustrated by the chaotic conditions after the Revolution. Four Bible schools were established: Friedensfeld (1907-10), and in the period 1923-26 Davlekanovo, Tchongrav, and Orenburg. P.Br.

Educational Committee of the Mennonite Brethren Conference, the controlling agency in the operation of Tabor College since 1933, succeeding the Tabor College Corporation (M.B. and K.M.B.) which had built and operated the school for 25 years but felt itself unable to continue. At a special meeting on Sept. 18, 1933, the Corporation offered the school to the conferences supporting it, proposing an educational committee to be charged with the responsibility of effecting a new organization of Tabor College and continuing the operation of the school in accordance with the spirit and teaching of the conferences. At the M.B. General Conference Oct. 24, 1933, the proposal was accepted and an Educational Committee of nine members, two from each of the Canadian, Pacific, and Central districts and three from the Southern District, elected by the delegates from the district conferences and approved by the General Conference, was organized.

The organization and duties of the Educational Committee were defined in the constitution adopted by the Fortieth Convention of the Conference of the M.B. Church of North America in Reedley, Cal., Nov. 25, 1936, which provided for a membership of five elected so that each of the four district conferences would have representation. The Committee was authorized to approve all courses of study and other activities of the school, to prepare the budget for each ensuing three-year term and recommend ways and means for securing the contributions required by the budget for Conference action, and to appoint and discharge faculty members and other workers. In November 1945, by amendment to the constitution at the conference in Dinuba, Cal., the membership was changed from five to six members with the stipulation that each of the district conferences be represented and that three members be elected at each regular convention of the Conference to serve a term of six years. In July 1951 at the convention of the Mennonite Brethren Conference at Winkler, Man., the membership of the Educational Committee was enlarged to include nine members of the M.B. conference by the addition of three supernumerary members.

In 1945 the Krimmer M.B. Conference was invited to share in the work of the school. In November 1945 this conference voted to accept Tabor College as the official conference school and obligated itself to voluntary offerings, deputation work, and representation on the Educational Committee. Its official participation in the Educational Committee began on Jan. 17, 1946. P.E.S.

Edzard I, Count of East Friesland (1492-1528), acquainted himself with the contents of the Bible and the writings of Luther, which led him to favor the Reformation of the church in 1519. He was in touch with Luther, had his sons educated by Aportanus, who favored Zwingli, and let the Reformation of East Friesland take its course, tolerating not only Lutheran and Zwinglian influences but also Catholic clergy and extreme spiritualists, who paved the way for the coming of Carlstadt and Melchior Hofmann. Although he died before Anabaptism was fully established in East Friesland, and although his sons did not share their father's tolerance, the variety of Protestant refugees who found asylum in East Friesland, and the attitude toward them established by Edzard I, made it possible that soon after his death (1530) Emden in East Friesland became the cradle of Anabaptism in northwest Europe. Edzard II, Count of East Friesland, Germany, 1562-99, a grandson of Edzard I, was a violent opponent of the Mennonites. On Aug. 9, 1568, he issued orders to the city council of Emden to confiscate the property of Mennonites who had fled as well as of those who remained, and to expel them from the city; half of the proceeds was to go to the city and half to the count. There was apparently no haste in complying. On July 14 the magistrate of Emden had received a warning from the count to watch the Mennonites closely. Edzard promised the Emden clergy prompt help in reply to their petition of Jan. 6, 1577, which complained "that the Anabaptists not only increase daily, and not only occupy the best houses . . . and form associations for big business and carry on trade, but are also so bold as to hold public conventicles of their . . . false doctrine in large numbers, preach, and let themselves be seen." Meanwhile the Emden magistrate was to forbid all preaching, public or private, and prevent their gathering. In February 1578 Edzard wrote to Emden that Menso Alting had reported that about 1,000 Mennonites would soon be coming from the Netherlands to settle in Emden; they should not be permitted to do so. And finally on Aug. 13, 1582, he issued an edict forbidding his subjects to sell or rent houses or lands to a Mennonite. But apparently this sharp mandate was not very carefully obeyed. Neff.

Edzardi (Glaneus Jodocus) (1595-1667), pastor of St. Michael's Church in Hamburg, wrote the following books against the Mennonites: (1) Notwehr der Kindertaufe, welche die Wiedertäufer den Kindern wehren, den Mündigen zweifelhaft machen und eine gefährliche Wiedertäuferei einrichten in zwei Teilen, darin unsere Beweistümer vor die Kindertaufe wider sie verteidigt, ihre aber widerlegt werden. Mit einer ausführlichen Vorrede von der wiedertäuferischen Sekt aus ihren eigenen Büchern verfasst (Hamburg, 1636). (2) Geistliches Bade-Tuch, den neuen wiedertäuferischen Tauchern, welche nach des falsch genannten Pontani und desselben Vermehrers Jacob Mehrnings Lehre von der Besprengung oder Begiessung in der einmalig empfangen Taufe nicht vergnüget eine neue Wiedertaufe in den tiefen Strömen oder Fischteichen durch Ein- oder Untertauchen vorhaben, entgegengesetzt. Zwei Predigten am Fest der Hl. Dreieinigkeit und Johannistag dargestellt (Hamburg, 1651).

The contents of the former is indicated by the detailed title; the latter opposes the Dompelaars (q.v.), under the motto of Matt. 23:24, "Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat and swallow a camel," which he applies to Mehrning and nearly all of the Mennonites, "because they quarrel bitterly about unimportant ceremonies, and neglect the most necessary and most comforting articles of faith." This (says he) is especially true of immersion, which creates a dangerous offense, for it disquiets simple souls concerning their baptism by pouring or sprinkling. The latter is of course Scriptural; Christ was baptized in the Jordan by pouring. Although immersion occurred in the warm Orient, nevertheless, then as now, baptism by sprinkling or pouring is equally valid. This he expounds at great length with illustrations from the Bible. Ee, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 33 persons in 1568-82. This rather large number indicates that there was very likely a Mennonite congregation at Ee. Yet nothing is known of the existence of such a congregation. The Mennonites may have joined the near-by Anjum (q.v.) congregation. vdZ.

Eebe Wytses-Volk, a branch of Dutch Mennonites found in the province of Friesland about 1665. It must have been a small group. Of its origin, special principles, and end nothing is known. (DB 1877, 126.) vdZ.

Eeghem (Eeghen), Adriaan van, a member of the large van Eeghen family (q.v.), b. June 14, 1631, at Cortemarck, Flanders, d. May 24, 1709, at Middelburg. As a boy he was a Catholic priest's attendant at Mass. Adriaan went to Haarlem, Holland, to learn weaving, and was baptized into the Flemish Mennonite congregation there on March 17, 1652. In 1653 he settled in Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, and began to preach there on March 21, 1655. He opened a book business, learned Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, became a competent theologian, and wrote the first Mennonite systematic theology, De Christelijke Godgeleerdheid, printed posthumously in 1711. In 1658 he debated with the Quaker Frijkes Emble after the sermon in Vlissingen.

Joost Isenbaart, the elder of Middelburg, on Dec. 3, 1659, accused his colleagues Adriaan van Eeghem and Pieter Baart of unorthodoxy on the Incarnation and the Trinity. When Baart moved to Vlissingen in 1663, three new preachers were chosen, one of them being Thomas van Eeghem, Adriaan's nephew (d. July 28, 1693). Soon afterward the Galenist dissension broke out in Zeeland. Isenbaart now brought suit against his colleagues. Adriaan was summoned before the magistrate. In the presence of Thomas van Eeghem, he declared that he believed in the eternity of Christ, that Adam's sin was not only for himself and Christ's death was not only for Himself. He refused to sign the 12 Utrecht Articles (q.v.). This was followed by a debate with Samuel Apostool (q.v.) of Amsterdam. The government forbade him to preach any longer until he promised not to preach contrary to the 12 questions (Dec. 19, 1655). Isenbaart died in 1673. In 1701 Adriaan was attacked by the Reformed preacher on account of his book, De Wet der Nature.

For his preaching Adriaan received nothing but a rent-free home. He refused a call to Rotterdam. He continued his service into his advanced old age, and preached a sermon one week before his death at the age of nearly 78. He was married three times: to Janneke Willems 1656-78, Martijntje Goudesebois 1680-84, and Petronella Haijs 1702 until his death. He had no children. He wrote several books, which were published at Middelburg by Michiel van Hoekke: Verhandelinge van de stemmelijke gebeden in de vergaderinge der geloovigen (1685), in which he showed himself to be a determined opponent of "silent prayer"; Catechismus ofte onderwyzinge in de Kristelijke Godsdienst (1687), reprinted in 1715; Korte Catechismus (1691); Verhandelinge van de Wet der Nature (1701). This last book had an appendix: an answer to several questions; notes on the first 18 verses of the Gospel of John; may those who are not members of the church come to communion? (He answered it negatively.) This book was reprinted in 1731 by Gerardus de Wind, who had previously edited and published a manuscript left by Adriaan: De Christelijke Godgeleerdheid (1711). It has about 650 pages, and is divided into five books: the Scriptures, God's name, qualities and works, God's covenant with Abraham and his descendants, the new covenant, and the Christian church or the congregation of the new covenant. Gerardus de Wind also wrote a funeral sermon on Adriaan's death.

Eeghen, van (van Eeghen, Eeghem, Eegen, Egen, Egene, Hegen), a Dutch Mennonite family, numerous members of which, usually merchants or bankers, have been important members of the church both by their generosity and their loyalty, often serving it as deacons or even as ministers. Many wealthy members of this family have rendered valuable service to the Dutch nation, and especially the city of Amsterdam, by their charity, their promotion of public welfare, and their cultural and artistic contributions.

The ancestor of this van Eeghen family was Adriaen van Eeghen, of whom nothing is known but the name. His son was Christiaen, b. ca. 1565, d. ca. 1660. They lived and died at Cortemerck (Kortemerk), some miles south of Brugge in Flanders, Belgium. The name van Eeghen is derived from a farm called 't Eeghem near Cortemerck, which they leased. Both Adriaen and Christiaen seem to have been Catholic, as were also Christiaen's children in their youth.

One of Christiaen's sons, Christiaen de Oude, b. ca. 1595 at Cortemerck, left the Catholic Church and emigrated to Aardenburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, about 1632 as a cloth-merchant. Here he joined the Mennonite Church and became a prominent lay member of the congregation; in 1665 he promoted the building of a church (DB 1877, 10-11), and in 1657-62 he negotiated with the city government concerning exemption from military service on payment of a head tax (DB 1879, 32-34). He died at Aardenburg in 1669.

Adriaen van Eeghem, also a son of Christiaen van Eeghen and a brother of Christiaen de Oude, moved from Cortemerck to Aardenburg about 1645, where he joined the Mennonite Church; his son was Adriaan van Eeghem (q.v.), a well-known Mennonite minister of Middelburg.

Christiaen's youngest son, Thomas van Eeghen de Oude, a linen-trader, also left Flanders and resided in Middelburg, capital of the Dutch province of Zeeland, where he became a citizen in 1646, and died in 1657. His son Thomas van Eeghen de Jonge, b. at Cortemerck (year unknown), lived at Aardenburg 1654-62, where he was a deacon of the congregation; from 1662 until his death in 1693 he served as a preacher of the church of Middelburg. He was married to Leuntje van Daele.

Jacob van Eeghen, the son of Christiaen de Oude, b. at Cortemerck 1631, emigrated with his parents to Aardenburg. He became very influential in the Mennonite congregation; he married Tanneken Hebberecht (1635-61), a sister of Gillis Hebberecht (q.v.), the preacher of the church of Aardenburg, of which Jacob van Eeghen was a deacon 1657-59. In 1662 he moved to Amsterdam, where his descendants are now found. Shortly before his settling at Amsterdam, he was married to Maria Bocxhoorn (1637-84), a granddaughter of Leonhard (Leenaerdt) Clock (q.v.). Through this marriage he became one of the well-to-do Mennonite merchants of Haarlem (linen bleachers) and Amsterdam (trade to Baltic ports and Spain). Jacob van Eeghen also was a merchant (especially linen, but also linseed, salt, and wines). His business was very prosperous and he became wealthy, though he had to send large amounts to his son-in-law at Aardenburg, who had suffered from war and other calamities. Jacob van Eeghen is to be considered the forerunner of the later Handelshuis van Eeghen. He died in 1697, while visiting Aardenburg.

Of the Amsterdam branch of the van Eeghen family, founded by the above Jacob van Eeghen whose members all belonged to the moderate Flemish Lamist congregation, these should be mentioned:

Christiaan van Eeghen, grandson of Jacob, b. 1700 at Amsterdam, d. there 1747, a well-to-do merchant and shipowner. He extended his business to the islands of the Caribbean Sea (tobacco, cacao beans, pelts and furs from America). He was married to Cornelia Cornelje (1695-1749). Twice he served the congregation of Amsterdam as deacon. He is said to have been a kind and very generous man. He published (translated from the English) De konst der Vergenoegtheit (Amsterdam, 1728), by an unknown author.

His grandson Christiaan van Eeghen, b. 1757 at Amsterdam, d. there 1798, married to Catharina Fock (1762-1807), who also served the congregation as a deacon, and associated with his brother Pieter van Eeghen in founding the Handelshuis (trading company) P. en C. van Eeghen in 1778, later called Van Eeghen en Co. The brothers were much interested in the American trade after this country had declared itself independent in 1776. They not only shipped all kinds of goods in large quantities to and from the States, but also the van Eeghen banking house, Huis of Negocie, procured loans for the new country, first in 1782. They also, together with other Dutch bankers, bought a large area of land in the state of New York, south and west of Lake Ontario. Projects were made to build a city here, to be called Nieuw-Amsterdam, but the city arose much later and was then called Buffalo. Christiaan van Eeghen became the director of the company founded to administer the land, soon called Holland Land Company. In this time P. and C. van Eeghen collected a large collection of books, pamphlets, maps, and caricatures concerning America, most of them now being in the Library of the University of Amsterdam. Soon after, during the war between England and France, business was very difficult and subject to great dangers and losses, and the assets and also the revenues decreased rapidly after 1796. Nevertheless Christiaan van Eeghen, who was a pious man, found time for his congregation, his family (five children), his hobbies (history and art), and his home country. He was a moderate Patriot (q.v.). In 1795 he became a member of the Financial Committee of the city of Amsterdam. After a short illness he died on May 9, 1798, only 40 years old.

Jacob van Eeghen (grandson of the foregoing), b. at Amsterdam 1818, d. there 1834, left behind a number of sensitive poems, some of which were published in 1835, entitled Keuze uit nagelaten gedichtjens . . . (N.N.B.Wb. I, 790).

Christiaan Pieter van Eeghen, b. 1816 at Amsterdam, d. there 1889, was a partner of the Handelshuis van Eeghen 1839-89. Business was very slow in the post-Napoleonic era; in nearly all branches of trade there was a recession which was not restored until 1839. The Nederlandsche Handelmaatschappij (Dutch Trading Company), founded in 1824 by the king and supported by the government, did much harm to private companies like the Handelshuis van Eeghen. So young Christiaan Pieter had a hard time of it, but proved to be a good businessman. For this reason he was later appointed a member of the board of directors of the Dutch National Bank (1859) and in 1864 president of this board. He is known for his philanthropy and the promotion of public health by stimulating the building of better homes for workmen in his home city, and also for the founding of the Vondelpark, still a large recreation center of Amsterdam. He contributed liberally to many needy causes and many Christian institutions. He was also interested in the fine arts. On his instigation and with his financial aid the van der Hoop-Museum (now Rijksmuseum) was thoroughly improved and many old pictures restored. He founded the Koninklijk Oudheidkundig Genootschap (Royal Dutch Antiquarian Association). He is of special interest for church history and Mennonite history for his inclination to Christian revivalism (Réveil, q.v.). Most of the outstanding revivalists in the Netherlands, like Heldring, Beets, and van der Goot, a Mennonite minister of Amsterdam, were his personal friends, whom he received in his stately house. He was very active too in missions, being a member of the board of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Society from the beginning (1847). He also served the church as a deacon (1845-51). He was extremely averse to religious modernism, and watched the growing liberalism in his home church with grief and uneasiness. In 1842 he was married to Catharina Huidekooper, daughter of the (Mennonite) mayor of Amsterdam. "Christiaan Pieter van Eeghen was one of the greatest of all in his family" (Rogge, 342; N.N.B.Wb. I, 789).

Hendrik van Eeghen, b. at Amsterdam 1831, d. there 1893, a partner in the Handelshuis van Eeghen and president of the Dutch National Bank 1884-93, served the congregation of Amsterdam as deacon 1857-61 and was treasurer of the A.D.S. from 1869 until his death in 1893.

Pieter van Eeghen (son of the foregoing Christiaan Pieter, and like his father a partner in the same Handelshuis van Eeghen 1872-1907), b. Amsterdam 1844, d. 1907 at Cortemerck near Nijmegen, was a member of the city council of Amsterdam 1878-99 and of the provincial government of North Holland 1877-1907. Like his father he was a patron of the arts. He was the founder of the Stedelijk Museum (city art gallery of Amsterdam), and for more than 25 years was president of the Oudheidkundig Genootschap, established by his father. But in addition to contributing his affection, his time and his money, he was also active in writing. He published Jan Luyken en zijn bloedverwanten (Amsterdam, 1889), and, together with J. Ph. van der Kellen, Het leven en het werk van Jan en Casper Luyken (2 vv., Amsterdam, 1905), a magnificent book containing the biography and description of the etchings and drawings of Jan Luyken (q.v.), illustrator of the Martyrs' Mirror, and his son Caspar. He published Jan Minnaerts, a very interesting study of the relief of the poor among the Mennonites (in DB 1907).

In 1872 Pieter van Eeghen married Maria de Clercq, of an old Mennonite family. He had great love for the church. Three times he served the congregation of Amsterdam as a deacon. From 1881 to 1907 he was member of the executive board of the A.D.S., serving as treasurer 1892-1907 (N.N.B. Wb. I, 790-91; DB 1907, 195-204, with portrait).

Commerce, also served the congregation of Amsterdam as deacon (1878-84).

Christiaan Pieter van Eeghen, Jr., a son of Christiaan Pieter (see above), b. 1853 at Amsterdam, d. 1917 at Oosterbeek, studied theology at the university of Utrecht and the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary, served as pastor in the congregations of Medemblik 1882-83 and Aardenburg 1883-92. Then he resigned and moved to Amsterdam. Here in 1892-1912 he served as pastor of a group of Mennonites who were meeting separately and had founded a Sunday school, because they did not agree with the general (liberal) trend of the congregation. In 1912 the group returned to the church, considering the preaching in the church to be sufficiently orthodox (DB 1912, 224). C. P. van Eeghen, Jr., published a historical study on his ancestor: Adriaen van Eeghem, Doopsgezind leeraar te Middelburg (Amsterdam, 1886); and a collection of sermons, including his Afscheidsrede at Aardenburg (Amsterdam, 1892). He was one of the editors (with J. W. van Stuyvenberg, J. Loosjes, and others) of De kleine Medewerker, later called Doopsgezind Maandblad voor uit- en inwendige zending. For a number of years he was on the board of the Dutch Mission Society. In 1886 he was married to E. W. A. van Helden (1861-1915). They had no children.

Christiaan Pieter van Eeghen, the son of Pieter, b. Feb. 10, 1880, at Amsterdam, married in 1906 to Henriette Heldring, studied law at the university of Amsterdam, was a partner in the Handelshuis van Eeghen 1908-24, director of the Dutch-Indian Trading Bank (later called National Trading Bank) from 1924, a member of the Amsterdam Chamber of Commerce 1921-52, and its president 1945-52.

He served the congregation of Amsterdam as a deacon 1907-11, 1917-21, 1927-31; was a member of the board of the A.D.S. 1920-51, member of the executive committee 1932-51, member of the board of directors of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary 1927-32, and its president 1932-51.

Peter Hendriks, later also called Pieter van E(e)gen (also de Eegen, or van E(e)ger), d. 1770 at Nijmegen, Dutch province of Gelderland, a (unsalaried) preacher of the Nijmegen congregation 1717-70 (Naamlijst, and Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 2154), did not belong to this van Eeghen family. vdZ.

Eeke (Eecke, Eken), Cornelis van, a Dutch poet who was living at Amsterdam about 1700, published Vale Mundo, ofte Noodinge tot de Broederschap Christi (Amsterdam, 1684); a new rhymed version of the Psalms, entitled De koninklyke Harpliederen, op nieuws in rym . . . uitgebreid (Amsterdam, 1698); Krommenie verbrand Ao 1702 den 22 July en uyt zijn assche herboud, en de vergaderplaats der Doopsgezinde de eerste maal geopend Ao 1703 den 17 May op Hemelvaartsdag (Amsterdam, 1703), and Lyk-digten ter gedagtenis van Dr Galenus Abrahamsz (Amsterdam, n.d.—1709). Van Eeke, a mediocre poet, was a Collegiant, and a member of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation, a warm admirer of the Mennonite preacher Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.). vdZ.

Eekens (Ekens), Dominicus, b. 1682 at Dokkum, Dutch province of Friesland, d. July 11, 1732, at Amsterdam, a Dutch Mennonite minister, was trained 1699-1705 for the ministry by the Amsterdam preacher Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), and served the congregation of Amsterdam in 1710-13 as preacher and from 1713 until his death as an elder. He is said to have been a very modest man, whose sincere messages were of great blessing to the congregation. He did not leave behind any publications. He was married to Margaretha de Flines, of an old Flemish family. His colleague B. van Leuvenig delivered his funeral sermon, Lykrede op Dominicus Eekens, published at Amsterdam in 1732. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 686.) vdZ.

Eelke (Fouckensz, Foekes), an Anabaptist martyr, a preacher though he was not yet baptized, was captured with a fellow believer named Fye (q.v.) at Boorn (Oldeboorn in the Dutch province of Friesland) and beheaded at Leeuwarden in 1549 three weeks before Easter. A hymn was written on their death which begins, "Nae u belooft, O goede Heer, wilt troost van bouen senden" (According to Thy promise, gracious Lord, Thou wilt send comfort from above), and published in Het Offer des Heeren. (Offer, 430-36; Mart. Mir. D 84, E 484; Wolkan, Lieder, 68; ML I, 507.) Neff, vdZ.

Eenighe gheestelijcke liedekens, gemaeckt aen verscheyden personen, a Dutch hymnbook, containing 46 songs written by Jan Jacobsz (q.v.). They were collected by Harmen Harmensz and edited by Pieter Willemsz, who wrote an introduction and also a conclusion and the end of the book, bearing the date 1613. The front page states that the book was published in 1612 by Nicolaas Biestkens at Amsterdam. The poetical quality of the songs is mediocre, though they were much liked by the congregations of the Janjacobs group, most of them using these hymns until the middle of the 18th century. vdZ.

Eenighe nieuwe gheestelijcke liedekens, gemaeckt door verscheyden personen, a Dutch hymnbook published in Amsterdam in 1612 (though the last page of the book bears the date 1613). It is a sequel to Eenighe gheestelijcke Liedekens by Jan Jacobsz (q.v.). It was edited by Pieter Willemsz, and contains 36 songs, most written by Pieter Willemsz himself. Like the songbook of Jan Jacobsz it is poetically of poor quality. It was used by the Janjacobs group. vdZ.

Eenigheid (Unity), the old Dutch expression for the Lord's Supper, and Eenigheid houden (to celebrate the Lord's Supper), both to indicate the unity with the Lord Christ and to express the union of the members of the church as members of the body of Christ (I Cor. 12:12). vdZ.

Eenkes, Rippert, like his father Eenke was a preacher of the Waterlander Mennonite congregation of Workum, Dutch province of Friesland. About 1600 he became an elder (Leeraar tot den vollen dienst). He had considerable influence in Friesland and also preached in Haarlem, in the province of Groningen, in Emden, and even in Danzig. He often had trouble with his coelders; in 1618-20 he was suspended from his office. Hans de Ries (q.v.), the leading elder of the Dutch Waterlanders, attended and was apparently the moderator of the meeting held at Workum on Aug. 14, 1618, in which Rippert was suspended. An account of these quarrels is found in DB 1903; the Amsterdam Archives contain a large number of letters about this conflict. About 1605-6 Rippert was involved in a conflict with Joannes Biltius, Reformed pastor of Workum. Biltius (q.v.) debated with Rippert in the Mennonite meetinghouse in 1605. Thereupon Rippert had to hand in a written account of his principles to the magistracy of Workum; this account was handed in by Rippert in November 1606, not to the magistrate of Workum, but to the States of Friesland at Leeuwarden. Biltius answered with a very detailed refutation. It is not clear whether Rippert wrote an answer to this writing or not. The theme of this conflict was the question of the Scripturalness of infant baptism. The conflict seems not to have led to bad consequences for Rippert, since he was still serving after 1620. It is unknown how long he carried on his activities. He was still living in 1627, for in that year he published, as a contribution toward the settlement of the conflict which had arisen among the Waterlanders in Amsterdam concerning Nittert Obbesz (q.v.), a booklet entitled Derthien Artijckelen, ghestelt door Rippert Eenkes ende sijne mede-hulpers . . . Nittert Obbes voor-gheleyt . . . (n.p., 1627). vdZ.

Egbert (de Hoedemaecker), an Anabaptist martyr, a hatter. He was taken prisoner at a meeting near Doornik (q.v.) in Belgium, first brought to Doornik and then to Bergen (Mons), where he was tried. He was executed by burning at the stake at Obignies near Doornik in 1558 (exact date unknown) with five other brethren. All remained steadfast. (Mart. Mir. D 203, E 584; ML I, 502.) vdZ.

Egelhaaf, Gottlob (1848-1934), rector of the Karlsgymnasium in Stuttgart. In his Deutsche Geschichte im 16. Jahrhundert bis zum Augsburger Religionsfrieden (2 vv., Stuttgart, 1889, 1892) he discusses the Anabaptists, but presents nothing new, dwelling principally on events in Zwickau and Münster, and on Wullenweber. The work is based on Cornelius (q.v.), Egli (q.v.), and Keller (q.v.), as far as they were available at the time.

Egen, Bastian, an Anabaptist martyr, of Ulbach, Württemberg, Germany, was executed at Esslingen (q.v.) in 1530.

Egge, Oom, an elder of the Waterlanders in the Dutch province of North Holland, of whom nothing is known but a conflict with Elder Gillis van Aken in 1555. (DB 1876, 23-24; Kühler, Geschiedenis I, 314.) vdZ.

Egges, Lubbert, b. 1706 or 1707, d. April 11, 1770, who in 1739 became preacher of the congregation at Uithuizen and in 1755 was chosen elder of the Groningen Old Flemish conference. In this capacity he faithfully visited the churches, as his careful notes show. His daughter Eltje dedicated an interesting epitaph to him (DB 1879, 69 f.). His "Aanteekeningen van eene rondreize" was published in DJ 1840, 33-52. (ML I, 508.) K.V.

Eggiwyl, a village in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, in the 17th century the seat of an Anabaptist congregation of 40 members. They were to be put into the prison in Bern and from there sent out of Switzerland. The village community refused to permit this, and had to send 12 of their most well-to-do men as hostages to Bern, to be kept there at the expense of the village until the order from Bern was obeyed. On Oct. 16, 1671, the Reformed pastor of the village was able to report that the Anabaptists had left of their own accord. They probably settled in Alsace or in the Palatinate, Germany. Eglauch, Caspar, elder and chronicler of the Hutterian Brethren in Slovakia, was born 1609 in Württemberg, and died 1693 at Lewär (Velké Levary), Slovakia. By trade he was a shoemaker. Apparently he joined the brotherhood at an early age. In 1647 he was chosen Diener der Wortes (preacher), and was confirmed one year later. As an old man of 79, he became Vorsteher or bishop of the entire brotherhood in 1688, serving in this capacity for five years. His time was a most trying period for the Brethren: repeated Turkish attacks deprived the Brethren of their homes, and the rising Counter Reformation (q.v.) in Slovakia tried to convert them to Catholicism and to compel them to have their children baptized. Some complied, but most of the Brethren remained true to their convictions, willing rather to emigrate than to obey such orders (Beck, 555). The institution of community of goods (q.v.) likewise became strained and in places was given up altogether (1685-95). In these difficult times Eglauch governed the brotherhood with power, industry, intelligence, and great earnestness, as stated in the Väterlied (Lieder, 877). He insisted upon the preservation of the community of goods as far as he was able to. As a chronicler of the brotherhood, we know Eglauch from the one manuscript codex which he wrote, a "Chronicle" covering the period 1647-82, now in the University Library of Budapest (Beck, cod. XXIII). Eglauch's successor as elder was Tobias Bersch (q.v.). HEGE.

Egle, Christian R. (1858-1926), for many years pastor and elder of the Salem Defenseless Mennonite Church near Gridley, Livingston Co., Ill., was the son of Amish Mennonite parents, Christian and Maria (Rediger) Egle. Born in Württemberg, Germany, he came to America in 1874 to avoid military service. Although he had been baptized at the age of 15 in the Amish Mennonite church at Zweibrücken, Palatinate, Germany, he experienced a religious awakening in 1878 while attending the revival meetings conducted by Henry Egly (q.v.), founder of the Defenseless Mennonite Church. In June 1879 he was rebaptized and joined the Defenseless congregation at Gridley, Ill. In June 1883 he was elected by ballot to the ministry of his congregation and ten years later was ordained elder. After the death of Joseph Rediger, the elder of Salem, Egle was chosen as the Salem elder, a position he held until his death. In December 1891 he was married to Bena Augermeier. Egle was editor of the Heils-Bote (q.v.) throughout its entire history (1898-1917). For several years he also printed the publication. M.G.

Egli (Egly, Egle), a Mennonite family name, prominent in America and appearing in the Martyrs' Mirror. Rudolf Egli of Switzerland was imprisoned for his faith in 1635. Jacob Egli died a martyr's death in a Zürich prison in 1639. In 1660 Rudolph Egli signed the Dordrecht Confession of Faith as a minister representing Kühnenheim in Alsace. The Palatine Mennonite census list of 1717 has an Abraham Egli in Branchweilerhof and the 1743 list a Jakob Egly in the Duttweiler congregation.

Among the Amish members of the family emigrating to America in the 19th century were Henry Egly (q.v.), founder of the Defenseless Mennonite Church, and Christian R. Egle (q.v.), leader in the Defenseless Mennonite Conference. The Egli family has been prominent in Illinois Mennonite circles but has also been represented in Indiana, Iowa, and Ontario. Merlyn Egle is a minister of the Evangelical Mennonite Church, living in Chicago. M.G.

Egli (Egly), Adelheyt (Adelheid), the wife of Felix Landis (q.v.), was imprisoned at Oetenbach, canton of Zürich, Switzerland, in 1642 and repeatedly harshly treated. After four years in prison, she escaped, but found her house stripped by the authorities, who had confiscated the 5,000 guilders, and put her children out among strangers. (Mart. Mir. D 821, E 1120.) vdZ.

Egli, Emil (1848-1908), a Swiss church historian. He studied theology, was ordained in 1870, and served in several villages of the canton of Zürich. In his student days he was deeply interested in historical studies. In 1873 appeared his important work, Die Schlacht bei Cappell 1531; in 1879, Die Züricher Wiedertäufer zur Reformationszeit, a brief product of his Aktensammlung zur Geschichte der Züricher Reformation in den Jahren 1519-1532, which he published (1879) with the support of Zürich and offers an uncommonly rich source on the early history of the Anabaptist movement. In 1887 followed a smaller volume, Die St. Galler Täufer.

H. S. Burrage calls Egli the first research student to find a new point of view for judging the Anabaptists. His penetrating study of the documents and his understanding of the social movements of the Reformation period and of the specifically Swiss nature of this movement caused him to deviate from the traditional condemnation of the Anabaptists. He recognized it as a popular movement and understood its connection with individual more or less visionary leaders and was able to do justice to their intentions. Even the mass psychotic epidemics of the St. Gall Anabaptists he treated objectively. The interpretation of history in the light of related and connected events, and the personal attitude of the Anabaptists to their religious concepts were his norm.

Egli occupied himself principally with the Reformation in Switzerland. In 1879 he began his work at the university of Zürich as lecturer in church history, and in 1892 he was made a full professor. In addition to a series of shorter works he published Heinrich Bullingers Diarium des Jahres 1504-1574 in the second volume of the Quellen zur schweizerischen Reformationsgeschichte, which he founded. After 1897 he published a semiannual periodical, Zwingliana, and after 1899 two volumes of Analecta Reformatorica (documents and treatises on the history of Zwingli and his times; also biographies of Bibliander, Ceporin, Johannes Bullinger). In 1902 he provided for a new edition of the Kessler's Sabbata (a publication of the historical association of St. Gall). With G. Finsler (Basel) he began the publication of the new edition of Zwingli's works (Zwingli's Werke, Leipzig, 1905 ff., in Corpus Reformatorum).

Egli was a conscientious scholar, who understood the correct approach to the Reformation period and thereby acquired a many-faceted historical sense. (ML I, 508 f.) C.B.

Egli, Jakob, an Anabaptist of Grüningen in the Swiss canton of Zürich, who was seized in 1639 and held in chains for 70 weeks in the convent dungeon at Oethenbach, which caused his death. His farm was rented for an annual fee of 500 guilders, which were put into the state treasury. (Mart. Mir. D 814, E 1113; ML I, 509.) NEFF.

Egli, Rudolf, was imprisoned with Uhli Schmied and Hans Müller in the Rathaus of Zürich in 1635, escaped, and was recaptured in 1637; his house was destroyed. His wife, Martha Lindingerin, was brutally compelled to betray where the alms fund of the congregation was hidden, which was in Rudolf Egli's care, and which amounted to 2,000 talers. (Mart. Mir. D 814, E 1109 f.; ML I, 509.) NEFF.

Egly, Henry (1824-90), founder of the Defenseless Mennonite Church (now Evangelical Mennonites), was born in Baden, Germany, the son of Abraham and Magdalena (Reber) Egly. In 1839 he with his father settled in Butler Co., Ohio, where he was baptized at the age of 17 and became a member of the Amish Mennonite Church.

In 1849 Egly was married to Katherine, daughter of Joseph Goldsmith (q.v.), bishop of the Amish Church in Lee County, Iowa. After two years of residence in Butler County, the Eglys moved to Adams Co., Ind., where they lived the rest of their lives. They were the parents of 6 sons and 2 daughters. Egly was ordained a deacon of his church in 1850 and a preacher in 1854. Previous to the time of the 1854 ordination, while he was suffering from a prolonged illness, he experienced a spiritual rededication and was restored to health. Thereafter he stressed the importance of an experimental knowledge of conversion and regeneration and the necessity of care in receiving members into the church. Following his ordination to the office of bishop of his congregation in January 1858, he continued his emphasis upon the necessity of a vital religious experience and won approximately one half of his church to an acceptance of his emphasis. After he had been asked to resign his pastorate by a number of his members, he organized his followers into a separate congregation in 1866. The movement spread to other Amish communities and in later years Egly spent much time in organizing and visiting these congregations.

Egly was a dynamic speaker and a radiant personality. His constant emphasis was placed upon the necessity of Bible study and the possibility of obtaining assurance of salvation. His death occurred on June 23, 1890, and he was buried in the cemetery near his church at Geneva, Ind. (See Evangelical Mennonite Church.) M.G.

Ehrenberg, Richard (1857-1921), national economist, and professor of political sciences at the University of Rostock, made a valuable study of the commercial history of Hamburg-Altona. In it he gives the first extensive account of the development of the Mennonite settlement there. J. G. Büsch (1728-1800), also an economist, had previously stressed the cultural importance of the Dutch Mennonites in Hamburg-Altona, especially pointing out their contributions to shipping (Versuch einer Geschichte der Hamburgischen Handlung, 1797). Ehrenberg and other research scholars inspired by him continued this study. The economic development of prominent Mennonite families in Altona, and their immediate influence on the unusually early attainment of liberty of economic pursuits, is put into the framework of German economic history. The result of his investigations is summarized under the title, Altona unter Schauenburgischer Herrschaft (Altona, 1891-93), published and most of it written by Ehrenberg with the support of the Royal Kommerzkollegium, of which he was secretary 1888-97. Especially No. 4, Gewerbefreiheit und Zunftzwang in Ottensen und Altona, 1543-1640, is of interest in this connection, in which "Anfänge einer Grossindustrie" (founded by Mennonites) gives much information. In No. VI, pp. 90-97, P. Piper discusses "Die Reformierten und die Mennoniten Altonas," based on B. C. Roosen's Geschichte der Mennonitengemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona (1886). Other pertinent works by Ehrenberg are "Hamburgs Handel und Schifffahrt vor 200 Jahren" (1892), in Hamburg vor 200 Jahren, and Altonas topographische Entwicklung (Altona, 1894). A complete survey of Ehrenberg's works is contained in the Archiv für exakte Wirtschaftsforschung (Thünenarchiv) (which he founded and published until his death), Vol. IV, No. 4, pp. 462 ff. (Jena, 1922). (ML I, 530.) E.H.C.

Ehrenfeld, near Blyszczyvody, Galicia (then Austrian, now Polish), was a Mennonite settlement established in 1864 through the efforts of the real estate dealer (Güterhändler) Peter Müller and his brother Elder Johann Müller, who bought 3,080 acres of land in Blyszczyvody, four miles east of Zolkiev. The Alte Hof estate was taken over by Johann Müller, while the following settled close together forming the village of Ehrenfeld: Heinrich Müller (b. 1842), Johann Linscheid (b. 1806), Jakob Brubacher (b. 1814), Heinrich Brubacher (b. 1846), Peter Ewy (b. 1841), Jakob Rupp (b. 1833), Jakob Schmidt (b. 1841), Johann Schmidt (b. 1843), Johann Ewy (b. 1828), Daniel Müller (b. 1834), Heinrich Müller (b. 1845), Jakob Hubin (b. 1841), Michael Ewy (b. 1839), and Jakob Müller (b. 1834). Of these 15 Mennonite families of Ehrenfeld 12 went to America in 1882 and after, forming a part of the Galician Mennonite groups in Minnesota and Kansas. In 1934 only one Mennonite family was living in Ehrenfeld. (Peter Bachmann, Mennoniten in Kleinpolen, 250-55.) C.K.

Ehrenfried, Joseph, was born in Mainz, Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, Dec. 25, 1783, of Catholic parents. Coming to America in 1802, he taught in western Lancaster Co., Pa. Soon thereafter he was translator and bookkeeper in Albright's Printery in Lancaster. On Aug. 9, 1808, he and William Hamilton published the first issue of the Volksfreund. In 1817 they sold the paper to John Baer's. For 20 years Ehrenfried remained with the latter firm as editor, translator, and compositor. In this period he published at Lancaster several Mennonite books in German: (1) the Enchiridion of Dirk Philips (1811), the first American edition; (2) the German Martyrs' Mirror (1814) in a beautifully printed and bound (full polished calf) edition, which according to J. F. Funk caused Ehrenfried's bankruptcy; (3) the Ausbund (1815). He made two trips to his homeland around 1837, returning to Harrisburg, Pa., to publish Vaterlands Wächter. He published the Friedensbote and Lecha County Anzeiger 1812-21 in Allentown. Either alone or in partnership he published at least ten other books in German between 1810 and 1820. From 1845 to 1860 he was Register of Wills in Lancaster. In religion he was a Swedenborgian. He died in Lancaster, March 6, 1862. I.D.L.

Ehrenpreis, Andreas (1589-1662), Hutterite bishop (Vorsteher); the last outstanding leader of the brotherhood, during a period of decline aggressively active in a restoration of the old spirit. Born on a Bruderhof in Moravia, he was a miller by profession. In 1621, still in Moravia, he was elected Diener am Wort (preacher), and was confirmed in this office two years later in Sobotiste, Slovakia, where the brethren had immigrated after their tragic expulsion from Moravia. For the rest of his life Ehrenpreis remained at this place. In 1639 he was elected bishop, and it was in this capacity that he developed his richest activities during the remaining 23 years of his life. Four days before his death he gave a farewell address to the elders (Chronik, 868-70) which shows all the nobility of his character and the deep faith which motivated him throughout his life.

His was a life of dedication to his brotherhood and its unspoiled testimony. Things were not at all easy: the Thirty Years' War was raging (until 1648), economic misery was rampant, and an epidemic took a heavy toll in 1645. Even worse was the inner spiritual decay. The great period of the beginning had long since passed, moral slackening was observable everywhere, and the exacting standards of a life in community of goods as the Hutterites understood it were no longer obeyed. Poverty and insecurity prompted many a member to think of laying aside some money, or to take refuge to arms if there be need for "self-defense." One hears also about clandestine luxuries here and there; in short the old plain ways of committed people had tangibly deteriorated, and no one seemed to know how to stop this trend. Ehrenpreis now set to work to do just this, reviving the old rules and regulations, and writing epistles and tracts to guide and train his people, in this reminding one sometimes of Jakob Hutter and his work. The earliest document of Ehrenpreis's activity seems to be an address to the brethren in 1633, contained in the Klein-Geschichtsbuch (ed. 1947, 168-72, Engl. translation MQR XXV, 1951, 116-27 with commentaries). Though no name is given, there can be little doubt that it was Ehrenpreis who had summoned the brotherhood to follow again the principle of nonresistance, which in a recent event had been so badly scuttled.

On Oct. 4, 1639, Ehrenpreis was unanimously elected bishop, and from now on he intensified his attacks against the internal evils, and led his flock with such spiritual vigor that the brotherhood could survive for more than another century. Two kinds of activities may be distinguished in his work: (a) his insistence upon a stricter discipline of life as laid down in old and new Gemeindeordnungen (regulations, ordinances), and (b) a spiritual and moral revival as can be found for instance in his challenging Sendbrief of 1652 and his many other epistles.

(a) Of his renowned Gemeindeordnungen we know two completely different sets: the first one is contained in a Hutterite codex of 1640 (now in Esztergom, Hungary; a transcript in the Goshen College Library). A few excerpts were printed by Beck in the Geschichts-Bücher, 478-79, and 485-87. The other, of 1651, was for the first time made known in the appendix of the Klein-Geschichtsbuch (1947, 519-32). The former collected all earlier regulations (41 all told), beginning with a Schuster-Ordnung of 1561, and then added Ehrenpreis's own injunctions and ordinances, not even forgetting one for the preachers. From this work we gain an excellent insight into the organized life of the Hutterite community. These regulations not only helped the brethren to make their community run smoothly and efficiently, but they were also a continued reminder toward stricter discipline, the very core of a nonconformist life. In a regulation for the barber-surgeons (dated 1654) much is said in order to make this profession as outstanding as was to be expected from people who had such a reputation in matters of medical care (Beck, ibid., 485 ff.). With great concern Ehrenpreis noticed certain laxities in the administration of buying and selling, and he warned his brethren that no one must own or put aside money or do anything in the execution of his duties contrary to Christian principles. Community of goods should be strictly observed and kept unspoiled as in the earliest days. Not even books should be considered private property, and nothing could be bequeathed to one's kin. Very detailed are the regulations for the Haushälter (stewards of the Bruderhof) and their assistants, the Weinzierl (see Diener der Notdurft), since so much depended upon their devoted performance. In the 1651 regulations the brethren and sisters are reminded of the old principle of a plain life of labor, worship, and communion. Elaborate dresses and food are proscribed. And yet, in spite of all its inherent austerity this document is permeated by a Christian spirit of great humility and kindness. A footnote in the Klein-Geschichtsbuch says that this regulation was reread to the Brethren eight times during the next decade to keep its points alive in their minds.

(b) Ehrenpreis's spiritual leadership may best be learned from his great Sendbrief an alle diejenigen so sich rühmen . . . dass sie ein abgesondertes Volk von der Welt sein wollen, . . . Brüderliche Gemeinschaft, das höchste Gebot der Liebe betreffend (1652), one of the few Hutterite writings which were printed in their time. In 1920 the Hutterites in America had it reprinted (at Scottdale) as a small book of about 190 pages. It contains (1-154)

Ehrenpreis's tract, and then (155-90) the Brüderliche Vereinigung of 1556 (q.v.), appended by Ehrenpreis as information for his brethren concerning the principles upon which the brotherhood was founded. The Sendbrief makes a very strong case for community of goods, quoting among others also the beautiful parable of the grain and the grape which have to give up their individuality to make bread and wine (used at the Lord's Table). In like manner men have to give up their individuality in order to become real brothers (again at the Lord's Table). This Sendbrief is certainly no theological tract, and yet it is one of the strongest and finest products of the Hutterite spirit concerning "brotherly communion, the highest commandment of love."

Then there are his epistles. Some of them, like the three of 1650-54 to (later Unitarian) Daniel Zwicker, show an astounding theological alertness, confirming Loserth's statement "that his training was quite adequate to discuss theological questions with university graduates." But the epistles which he wrote as a shepherd of his church breathe a still more genuine Anabaptist spirit. They are letters of concern, they admonish his brethren to watch their life and conduct, to bring up their children in the right spirit, and to be on the alert in all dealings with the "world." All this is said in great modesty and without any paternalism. But it has authority in it. Two of these letters, sent to the Brethren in Transylvania, were incorporated into the Chronik (831-37, 847-56). Then there is an epistle dealing with an unpleasant affair in Slovakia where a small group of Brethren tried to introduce an element of fanaticism (1645); this epistle is called Antwort und Widerlegung der irrigen . . . Meinung Benjamin Kengels und seines Anhanges (Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 631, note 1, where a brief summary is given).

There are two more tracts from Ehrenpreis's hand: (1) Kurze Widerlegung des grossen Streites von Christo, dem Sohn Gottes, wie er von Christoph Osterrod in seinem . . . Büchel samt seinem Anhang als polnische Brüder oder Arianer schimpflich und nachteilig verkleinert wird (Sobotiste, 1654; see MQR XXII, 1948, 161). It is a polemical pamphlet against the Unitarians (against Dr. Zwicker who most likely gave the book of 1591 to Ehrenpreis), and a strong plea for the idea of Trinity. (The only extant copy is to be found with the Brethren in Canada.)

(2) Die Fünf Artikeln des grössten Streites zwischen uns und der Welt (several codices in Esztergom). This is Ehrenpreis's own version or edition of the "great article book" (q.v.) of 1547, originally written most likely by Peter Walpot. Though the title is identical with the one in the Chronik (269 ff.), the text is different, a kind of paraphrase of the original, made by Ehrenpreis for his people to teach them the fundamentals of their specific Anabaptist position. The book might be compared with the Brüderliche Vereinigung of 1556 (appended to the Sendbrief) although it is much more elaborate than the latter. At the bottom, however, the idea was always the same: renewal of the old spirit of Anabaptism and training of the Brethren in the things which were central, so that they could endure trials and temptations and remain a living witness to the idea of genuine discipleship.

A brief list of Ehrenpreis's writings follows: Gemeinde-Ordnungen 1640; Gemeinde-Ordnung 1651 (Zieglschmid, Chronik, 519-32); his speech of 1633 concerning nonresistance (MQR, 1951); Ein Sendbrief . . . brüderliche Gemeinschaft, das höchste Gebot der Liebe betreffend, 1652 (reprint Scottdale, 1920); Die fünf Artikeln des grössten Streites zwischen uns und der Welt (a revision of the tract of 1547); Kurze Widerlegung des grossen Streites von Christo, 1654 (against the Unitarians, copy in Canada); Antwort und Widerlegung der irrigen Meinung des Benjamin Kengels . . . , 1645; three epistles to Dr. Daniel Zwicker, 1650-54, on theological matters; two epistles to the Brethren in Alwinz, Transylvania, of 1642 and 1649 (Zieglschmid, 831 ff., 847 ff.); his farewell address of 1662 (ibid., 868 ff.); several hymns (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder 1914, 13, 55, 639, 851, 854, 857, and two more not yet printed). Eibenschitz (German for Evancice or Wancice), a town situated on the Iglau, in the Brno district of Moravia, population 5,000, mostly Czech. In the 1420's the Hussite doctrine won numerous adherents and prospered here. During the Reformation the Protestants shared the town church with the Utraquists, the former using the smaller part, the latter the larger. In the outskirts of the city some Swiss Protestants had a church and a school; the Swiss Brethren (q.v.) had their meetinghouse in a lane in a suburb. There were also some Schwenckfeldians in the town. The Hutterian Brethren, however, held their services in the neighboring village of Alexovitz (known also as Olekovitz and Alecotz). When the Brethren of Alexovitz are mentioned in the chronicles, those living in Evancice are also meant.

In Evancice and probably also Alexovitz the Hutterites settled about 1527 and 1528 (Beck, 68); the baronial Lipa family received them kindly. In Alexovitz they had a Bruderhof (Beck, 393) with deacons (352) and preachers (352). The Swiss Brethren had their center in a suburb of Evancice (152). Although the people of Evancice were absolved of blame in the revolt against Ferdinand II, the non-Catholic inhabitants were so severely oppressed that the Hutterites of Alexovitz preferred to move to Alwinc (q.v.) in Transylvania (396); those who did not leave voluntarily were expelled in 1622, and joined the colonies in Transylvania. There they had ordained Konrad Hirzl as preacher on Aug. 6, 1621; in the following year he voluntarily resigned.

Through the withdrawal of these capable people and, of course, also through the devastation of the Thirty Years' War Evancice fell into a decline from which it never fully recovered. LOSERTH.

Eichacher (or Eicher), Konrad, one of the first Anabaptists to die as a martyr in Bern, Switzerland, was a native of Steffisberg. He was seized in 1529 because of his faith; but after his trial, begun on Oct. 18, he was released, for he said that he had erred. On Dec. 30 he was arrested again and after a long cross-examination was drowned on Feb. 21, 1530. The execution apparently attracted much attention, for the Ratsmanual of Dec. 31, 1534, contains a statement that the council regretted Eichacher's execution. Nevertheless in the next six years 20 additional executions, 158 imprisonments, and 109 expulsions were imposed on the Anabaptists in Bern. The records of Eichacher's trial were published by Adolf Fluri (Berner Heim, 1896, Nos. 37-38), authenticating the execution, which had already been related in the Martyrs' Mirror. HEGE.

Eichen, Christoph von der (Christoph Rudolf of Oberdorla), an Anabaptist of Thuringia, was won to the Anabaptist movement by the Anabaptist apostle Alexander at Easter 1533. In May of that year he was arrested with six other Anabaptists (Ludwig Spon, Martin Dippart, Hans Rinkleben, Heinrich Hutter, Hans Breuning, and Lorenz Möller) at Mühlhausen. They were imprisoned 21 weeks at Treffurt and Mühlhausen. Elector John and Duke George of Saxony, who had jurisdiction over the imperial city of Mühlhausen alternately with Landgrave Philip of Hesse after the revolution (1525), demanded that they be punished with death in accord with the imperial mandates. But Philip (q.v.) refused his consent. He sent Balthasar Raidt, the pastor of Hersfeld, to talk to them, and Raidt succeeded in making them recant. They were released in November 1533, and were required to give an oath that if they backslid they would sell their possessions within two weeks and permanently leave the district.

Soon they were again working for the Anabaptist cause, though they had not yet been baptized. Christoph von der Eichen refused to let the priest give his dying father supreme unction, and is said to have spoken disparagingly of it. He was therefore returned to prison. Duke George insisted that he be punished by death for depreciating the sacrament. But he was released with the other prisoners in 1535.

On June 15 and 26, 1545, Christoph was re-examined. He had not yet been baptized, but confessed that he definitely held Anabaptist views. Thereupon the council ordered him to leave the city with his family and never to return on penalty of death.

On Dec. 11, 1562, John issued the command to arrest Christoph von der Eichen as the head of the Thuringian Anabaptists as soon as he was seen on electoral territory. But he managed to elude them for two years. On Sept. 12, 15, and 19, 1564, he was subjected to a trial with eleven other Anabaptists. Because he declared positively that he held Anabaptist views he was to be expelled, but refused to accept the sentence. The magistracy at Leipzig, asked for an opinion, recommended that Anabaptists be given further instruction by the clergy, and if they persisted in their error they should be punished with death by fire, in accord with the imperial decrees. They were therefore questioned again on Nov. 28, 1564, and Jan. 17, 1565. After another short period in prison they promised to do better and were released.

After their release they began anew to propagate Anabaptist doctrine. In the middle of July 1565 Eichen was again seized and imprisoned at Mühlhausen. In a few weeks he was released upon a promise to leave Mühlhausen forever. But he remained in Oberdorla and continued to hold meetings. When Franciscus Strauss, the Superintendent of Langensalza, was about to carry out the sentence of expulsion, Eichen wrote him a sharp letter and posted it on the Rathaus door on June 5, 1571. A councilor on his way to church saw the act, tore down the letter, and had the perpetrator arrested. But now the patience of the authorities was exhausted. Very likely Eichen suffered a martyr's death in July 1571. NEFF.

Eichenfeld (Dubovka) was a village of the Yazykovo Mennonite settlement (q.v.), Chortitza, Russia, founded in 1869. In 1913 the village had a population of 307 and about 5,000 acres of land. During the Russian Revolution and the Civil War the village was completely destroyed. In October 1919, 79 men and 3 women were murdered in a single night. The rest of the population fled. C.K.

Eicher (Eichert, Eichler, Eycher), a Bernese Mennonite family name which appears in the Martyrs' Mirror. In 1529 Konrad Eicher of Steffisberg was executed for his Anabaptist faith at Bern, Switzerland. In the latter part of the 17th century the Eicher family was represented in the Thun area of the canton of Bern. Eicher was among the family names represented in the Bernese migration to Alsace in 1671-1711, and occurs in the Montbéliard, France, list of 1759. Among the Palatine Mennonites of 1685 was Ulrich Eicher of Osthoven bei Wachenheim. A 1706 list of Mennonite families living in Mannheim, Germany, included the name Eycher, while a 1738 census names Christian Eicher of Mossbach. The 1759 Palatinate Mennonite census list names Jacob Eichler of Erbesbüdesheim. The 1936 Adressbuch of Mennonite families in South Germany lists 12 Eichers in 3 congregations.

In 1754 Johannes Eicher and Christian Eicher were among 27 Mennonites landing in America. In the 18th century the Eichers were represented among the Amish Mennonites of Ontario. In 1848 five Eicher brothers, Martin, Christian, Daniel, Benjamin (q.v.), and John, the sons of Johann and Margaret (Conrad) Eicher of Pulversheim, Alsace, migrated to Wayne Co., Ohio, and then later settled in Henry and Washington counties, Iowa, in the early 1850's. Benjamin was the founder of the Eicher Emmanuel Mennonite Church (q.v.) of Washington Co., Iowa. Their descendants live principally in Iowa and Nebraska. Among them is William R. Eicher, bishop of the West Fairview Mennonite Church (MC), Beaver Crossing, Neb. M.G.

M. Gingerich, The Mennonites in Iowa (Iowa City, 1939).

Eicher, Benjamin, a Mennonite (GCM) bishop of the congregation near Noble, Washington Co., Iowa, was born in Alsace, March 10, 1832. In 1849 he came to America and located in Wayne Co., Ohio. Four years later he moved to Washington Co., Iowa, where he lived the remainder of his life. He was married to Lydia Sommer in 1855. One of his children was Congressman and Judge E. C. Eicher (q.v.). In 1862 Eicher was ordained minister of the newly organized Amish congregation in Washington County. On Oct. 28, 1866, he was ordained bishop by Bishop Joseph Stuckey of Illinois. Although Eicher had served as a secretary of the Amish conference (Diener-Versammlung) in 1866, by the time of the conference in Iowa in 1874 it was clear that he and his church were no longer in harmony with the Amish conference and so after that meeting his congregation followed an independent course. Finally in 1892 the Eicher congregation, known since 1937 as the Eicher Emmanuel Mennonite Church, became a member of the Middle District Mennonite Conference (GCM) and in the following year a member of the General Conference Mennonite Church. Eicher at once was elected a member of the Foreign Mission Board, although his death on Dec. 7, 1893, cut short his period of service on that board.

Living on a farm, Eicher engaged in farming and threshing. He also taught school for about 15 years. At one time he was urged to become county superintendent of schools but he refused to become a candidate for the position. In 1890 his name was before the Democratic Convention as a candidate for Congress, "but by his express direction to his friends it was withdrawn, otherwise he would have been nominated and elected." ("Biography of Benjamin Eicher," Mennonite Year Book and Almanac for 1896.)

Eicher was a man of striking personality whose mind was keen and penetrating. He was a student all his life and kept pace with the progress of scientific and religious thought. Although he had pronounced convictions, he was charitable toward those who disagreed with him. His biographer declared, "There was behind all his acts and utterances, great or small, an intense earnestness, a force of conviction, a moral courage, and an inflexible will—and all gave distinct character to the man . . ." (Mennonite Year Book and Almanac for 1896). M.G.

Eicher, Edward Clayton, was born at Noble, Iowa, Dec. 16, 1878, and died in Washington, D.C., Nov. 30, 1944. A son of Bishop Benjamin Eicher, founder of the Eicher Emmanuel Mennonite Church of Noble, Iowa, he was raised in the Mennonite faith and died a member of the congregation (GCM). He was married to Hazel Mount of Washington, Iowa, in 1908. Graduating from the University of Chicago in 1904, he continued his study of law in that institution. He was admitted to the Iowa Bar in 1906. From 1907 to 1909 he was cashier and assistant registrar of the University of Chicago. During the years 1919-33 he was a member of the law firm of Livingston and Eicher, Washington, Iowa. Elected to Congress in 1932, he was twice re-elected to that position. In December 1938 he resigned his position in Congress to become a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission. Appointed chairman of the Commission in April 1941, he served in that capacity for almost a year. In 1942 he was appointed Chief Justice of the District Court for the District of Columbia. At the time of his death he was presiding at the 119-day mass sedition trial of 30 defendants charged with conspiring with Nazi Germany to undermine the loyalty of members of the armed forces of the United States. His fair conduct of the trial won the praise of newspaper reporters. A Democrat and a liberal in politics, he supported the reform measures of President Franklin D. Roosevelt. Eicher Emmanuel Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Washington Co., Iowa, was organized in 1862. Previous to its organization the congregation had been in charge of Joseph Goldsmith (q.v.), the bishop of the near-by Henry County church, and was also served by preachers Joseph Wittrig and Christian Bechler. Meetings were held in private homes until 1868, when the first church, called the Noble Church, was built northwest of Noble. This meetinghouse was replaced in 1895 by a more modern building. A third church, built in 1911 on the same site, is now in use. The first preacher and bishop after the 1862 organization was Benjamin Eicher (q.v.).

After its separation from the Amish Mennonite Conference in 1874, the Eicher Church, as it came to be called, with about 50 members, followed an independent course for a number of years. In 1892 it joined the Middle District Conference (GCM) and in 1893 the General Conference Mennonite Church.

Those who have served as pastors of the Eicher Church are Benjamin Eicher, H. G. Allebach, P. E. Stucky, S. M. Musselman, L. L. Miller, P. K. Regier, H. J. Schrag, A. H. Miller, D. E. Welty, H. D. Metzker, Walter H. Regier, Leander Fast, and H. L. Metzker. In 1953 approximately half of the congregation of 179 withdrew from the Mennonite Church to establish the Fern Cliff Free Evangelical Church under the leadership of Leander Fast. In 1955 the membership was 112, with H. E. Nunemaker as pastor. W.H.R.

Eichstock, a Mennonite congregation northwest of Dachau (q.v.) in Upper Bavaria, Germany, which was founded in 1818 by Mennonites from the Palatinate, Baden, Alsace, and Donaumoos (q.v.). In the first 25 years about 35 families settled on farms and in small villages in the wooded region of Eichstock; often from two to six families lived at one place, as in Eichstock, Hammerhof, Thann, Schwaig, and Singern, which were at that time almost exclusively Mennonite settlements. All of these families owned their land. Since they came from regions which were farther advanced, they were able to be a progressive influence on the peasants of the Dachau region. The principal reason for settling here was probably the fact that land was cheaper than in the Palatinate or Baden.

Religious services were held alternately in Eichstock and Hammerhof in the homes of members until the church was built. There was some difference of opinion as to where it should be erected; the government of Upper Bavaria decided in favor of Eichstock because of its burial site, and granted the concession on Jan. 18, 1841 (Records of the B.K.M. No. 25, 606). The funds were raised by the members.

Thus the church had its wished-for meetinghouse, in which they could worship undisturbed. Economically the families were also prosperous. But a certain restlessness took possession of many families; in the years 1844-56, 22 families emigrated to America, most of them to Iowa (q.v.); six families returned to the Palatinate. The church decreased rapidly, but until the end of the 19th century a considerable number remained. Then still other families left, chiefly for economic causes, so that by 1922 the little church was nearly deserted; only three Mennonite families were left.

The following preachers have served the congregation: Johannes Strohm 1821-47, Franz Krämer 1821-24, Jakob Seitz 1825-39, Jakob Haury 1825-39, Elias Dettweiler 1839-45 and 1854-55, David Ruth 1839- (emigrated to America), Jakob Krehbiel 1845- (emigrated), Johannes Stiess 1845-48, Georg Zeiset (1844 until he emigrated), Christian Dettweiler 1851-55 (emigrated), Ulrich Hirschler 1854- ?, Johannes Berger 1855- ?, Jakob Dester 1861- ?, Jakob Schowalter 1861- ?, 1856, 62-64; Hauser (no dates), Jakob Ellenberger (called to Friedelsheim in 1881), Michael Landes 1881-87, Johannes Hirschler 1887-99, Daniel Bähr 1889-1905, Emanuel Landes of the Ingolstadt congregation 1905-54; Hermann Schmutz 1954- .

At present (1954) meetings are held monthly at Eichstock. In addition, the young people of Munich as well as those of the Regensburg and Ingolstadt congregations hold youth conferences here, for the church is very beautifully located. On the Sundays when there is no service in the church, the families gather in various homes for Bible study. The congregation belongs to the Vereinigung and is incorporated. The membership in 1954 was 20.

Eiderstedt, a peninsular district (pop. 29,720) in southwest Schleswig-Holstein, Germany. Because of lively trade between Eiderstedt and Holland, many Dutch religious refugees, including Davidjorists and Mennonites, found their way to Eiderstedt. As early as 1557 a ducal rescript deals with them. In 1566 five of them were expelled, and in 1588, after futile negotiations, six more. Article II of the Eiderstedt Landrecht (1572, printed in 1573, 1591, 1737, 1794) concerns the Anabaptists, as does also point 6 of the oath imposed upon the Lutheran clergy of Eiderstedt in 1574. The fear of a repetition of the Münster episode, and the envy of the wealth of many of the refugees, played a part in the attitude of the authorities and also in the accusations brought by the people. Some opposition and questioning of the Mennonites and Davidjorists followed in 1596, 1597, 1602, and 1604. Now the Mennonites had an able representative and advocate in Johann Clausen Codt (Coodt), called Rollwagen, who was familiar with the Scriptures and who rendered valuable service in building the dikes by introducing the wheelbarrow. In 1607-8 a succession of negotiations, cross-examinations, and disputations took place. Even the use of the new Lutheran cemetery in Tönning was not granted until the Mennonites sent a petition to the duke. On the other hand, the duke ordered them to have their infants baptized, upon penalty of expulsion. But it was not enforced; the Mennonites even brought their own preachers from Holland. In 1614 began a new series of complaints, replies, arrests, and cross-examinations. Finally the duke decided that the Mennonites might stay in the country, but must conduct themselves quietly. In 1623 the newly founded Friedrichstadt (q.v.) was opened to them, where they alone were to conduct all religious services for the entire region. Many Mennonites went there; they were freed from the oath, military service, and the obligation to fill public office. In 1642 a Davidjorist trial took place. But for the Mennonites a confirmation, declaration, extension of their privileges was issued in 1645; in 1663 followed a prohibition against making proselytes among the Lutherans.

In the 18th century there were still Mennonites in Eiderstedt, who were generally respected for their quiet industry. In Koldenbüttel and Tetenbüll they were buying so many farms that in 1763 they were required to pay an additional levy to Lutheran preachers and teachers, so that there should be no great loss of income to them. In 1784 a mandate was issued that they must register the birth of their children not only with their preacher in Friedrichstadt, but to keep school and tax records in order, also with the Lutheran preacher of the town, and in 1787 more detailed orders were given concerning their school tax. But then their number declined.

In 1834 there were only four; in 1880, when there were only nine who were not Lutherans or Catholics, there were probably no Mennonites. E.C.

Eifel, a plateau in the Prussian Rhine Province between the Mosel, Rhine, and Roer rivers, was probably even before the Reformation a center of those groups who opposed the worldliness of the Catholic Church and who are now, following the example of Ludwig Keller (q.v.), usually known as the old evangelical brotherhoods. This would account for the letter written in 1531 by Sebastian Franck "to several in the Eifel at the request of Johann Beckestein" (Rembert, 226-28). Later on the Anabaptist movement must also have found a wide following here. In the 16th century there were many Anabaptists in and around Monschau and in the Schleiden area. Thomas and Zillis worked here as apostles. The Anabaptists were sorely oppressed. One of the martyrs in 1552 was Maria of Monschau (Montjoie) (q.v.; see also hymn No. 25 in the Ausbund). At the Strasbourg conference of 1557 there were delegates representing about 50 churches "from the Eyfelt to Moravia." Daniel Notemann built a hammer for "red copper" in Pleushütte near Einruhr, but settled in the Neuwied congregation. In 1711 there was still a congregation in the Eifel highlands, which met in Einruhr. In the course of the 18th century several Mennonites of Einruhr were baptized at Crefeld. The last member there was Daniel Becker, who died in 1886.

In 1922 there were living in the Eifel region (between Trier and Andernach) about 14 families, some of whom came from the Palatinate about 1827 and settled on leased farms. There were Mennonites in Eischeidhof near Daun, Jägershof near Trier, Jakobstal near Andernach, Kalbergerhof near Trier, Kaltschick near Bassenheim, Leyerhof near Königsfeld, Lissem near Bitburg, Mayen, Pönterhof near Andernach, Spangdalem near Wittlich, and Unkel. The Mennonites in the eastern part of the Eifel belonged to the Neuwied congregation, and those in the western part formed a congregation with the Mennonites of Luxembourg, who are descendants of Eifel Mennonites. They held their meetings in the homes of the members. Neff, W.N.

Eigenheim Mennonite Church (GCM), located six miles west of Rosthern, Sask., a member of the Canadian Conference, was organized in 1894 as a subsidiary of the Rosenort Church of Saskatchewan by members of that church who settled in the Eigenheim area at that time. The congregation built a church in 1896. It became an independent congregation in 1929. In 1954 the congregation had 245 members with G. G. Epp as elder and H. T. Klaassen as minister.

The congregation has German services, 14 Sunday-school classes, 2 ladies' aid societies, a large choir, and Friday evening catechism and Bible classes through the winter months. Jacob Klaassen (d. 1948) and Johann Dueck have also served the congregation as ministers. G.G.E.

Eight Square Mennonite Church (OOM), located near Wooster, Wayne Co., Ohio, is a member of the Ohio and Indiana Conference of Old Order Mennonites (commonly called the Martin or Brubaker group). The congregation began in 1907 as a division from the Chester Mennonite Church, Wisler protesting the use of some modern inventions, chiefly the telephone, and English preaching. The congregation still rejects many inventions and uses the horse and buggy for transportation. They retain the original name for the church in the community, which comes from an octagon-shaped schoolhouse built on the same lot as the church. The group worships on alternate Sundays in the same building as that used by the Chester Mennonite Church. The membership, five in 1953, has been steadily declining. Ministers who have served the group are Peter Imhoff and Daniel Martin, who both withdrew from the Wisler group in 1907, but Martin rejoined the Wisler adherents in 1940, and William Brubaker, the present minister (1954). Eighth Street Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Goshen, Ind., is a member of the Central Conference of Mennonites and of the General Conference Mennonite Church. Organized in 1913 with a congregation of 15 members (formerly of the Silver Street Church, q.v.), which met in a remodeled dwelling, the congregation numbered 298 in 1953 and meets in a substantial brick building erected in 1920. The group is largely urban, of diverse geographical background. The minister since 1946 has been Robert W. Hartzler. The church carries on an active program with regular meetings of Sunday school, young people's organization, six women's organizations, weekly morning and evening services, a choir, and other activities. The observance of footwashing is optional; an organ is used in worship; discipline is practiced to a limited extent. R.W.H.

Eindhoven, an important industrial town in the Dutch province of North Brabant (1947 pop. 137,000, with 367 Mennonites), is seat of a Mennonite congregation. There must have been some Mennonites here in 1570-77, but we know no particulars. Then the traces disappear, and Mennonites are not found here for centuries. On Oct. 10, 1928, the Mennonites who were employed in the city, especially in the noted Philips factories, united to found a Mennonite fellowship (Kring), which organized as a congregation on Nov. 27, 1936. In 1936-42 the congregation was served by S. M. A. Daalder, pastor of Heerlen in South Limburg. Since 1942 the congregation has had its own resident minister: H. Wethmar 1942-46, and J. W. Sipkema 1947- , both serving also the congregation of Breda (q.v.). The young congregation of Eindhoven, which is very active, built a beautiful church, dedicated on Sept. 30, 1951. The membership numbered about 104 when the congregation was founded in 1936. In 1956 it numbered 205. There is a women's circle and a youth group. (DJ 1952, 51-54.) vdZ.

Eine Mutter, a novel by Peter G. Epp (q.v.), b. 1888 in Russia, professor at Bluffton College, 1924-34; Ohio State University, 1934-54. Eine Mutter presents a panoramic view of a span of over 80 years of the history of the Mennonite settlements in Russia, as seen through the eyes of the narrator of the story, the mother of the title. As the reader follows with her the life, the character, and the fortunes of her parents, her half brothers and sisters, her full brothers and sisters, her nephews and nieces, her children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren, he receives an intimate picture of Mennonite life over the vast expanses of Russia. The span begins in the early period of settled, well-established patterns in the nearly self-contained Mennonite settlements in the Ukraine, and describes the upheaval of the first emigration to America in 1873-85, the development of new settlements for the landless, the increasing interest in industrial life and education, the first great war, the terrible consequences of the Revolution, the famine, and the second emigration (in the 1920's) to Canada.

The book lacks the technical form of the novel. It is a tale, told as an old woman might naturally tell it in reminiscing. The story has so compelling a tone of realism and truth that it is quite safe to assume that the material is basically factual or autobiographical. To a large extent its charm lies in that tone, which might have been lost if the author had tried to shape it into some specific artistic form. The simplicity of the style gives the story a luminous, poetic quality in keeping with the personality of the extraordinary mother. Her deeply religious interpretation of life is as unifying as any plot or other artistic design could have been.

Eine Mutter is a thoroughly Mennonite story, which deserves to be translated to make it accessible to American Mennonites. E.H.B.

Einfältige und Christliche Betrachtungen über die Jährlichen und Heiligen Evangelia, durch Gottes Gnade in öffentlicher Versammlung in Altona mündlich vorgetragen durch einen Liebhaber der allgemeinen Wahrheit unsers Herrn Jesu Christi, Und unter währender Predigt von einem Christlichen Zuhörer aus dem Holländischen ins Hochteutsche versetzt; Sodann durch einen andern Freund zu des Nächsten Erbauung zum Druck befördert, im Jahre 1730. Nebst einem Anhange unterschiedener Texte, sowohl aus dem Alten als Neuen Testamente. This popular collection of sermons by Jacob Denner (q.v., 1659-1746), the influential Mennonite-Dompelaar preacher of Hamburg-Altona 1684-1746, leader of the immersionist schism of the Altona Church (with periods of absence at Lübeck 1687-1694, Friedrichstadt 1694-98, and Danzig 1698-1702), according to the title page translated from the Dutch, appeared in Hamburg (?) in 1730 in a quarto volume of two sections of 1,366 pp. and 352 pp. respectively. The former contained 60 sermons for the Sundays and festival days of the church year; the second contained 24 sermons on selected Old and New Testament texts. The title page of the second part is identical with that of the first part except that instead of "über die Jährlichen und Heiligen Evangelia" the phrase "über einige Texte, sowohl aus dem Alten als Neuen Testament" is used. The popularity of Denner's sermons is indicated by the reprints. In 1739 it was reprinted entire at Hamburg with a double title page, the new 1739 title page being placed in front of the old one of 1730. The second part has only the old title page. This may not be a new edition, but merely a rebinding with a new title page, namely, Jacob Denners Erbauliche Betrachtungen. The Amsterdam Mennonite Library has a copy of an almost identical 1739 edition at "Dantzig." It differs from the 1739 Hamburg edition by having separate pagination and a new title page for each of the two parts, and a third part of 40 pages at the end, with its own title page, containing three more sermons. The title page reads: Drey Geistreiche Predigten über das Heilige Vater Unser; gehalten, unter dem Beystande des Geistes der Gnaden und des Gebets, von einem der von Herzen wünscht zu seyn ein Anbeter im Geist und Wahrheit. All three title pages carry the date 1739. In 1751 it was again reprinted (at Hamburg?) under the title Jacob Denners Christlich- und Erbauliche Betrachtungen (Pt. I, pp. 1-1144; Pt. II, pp. 1145-56, with the three additional sermons, pp. 1457-58, also Der Adel des Gewissens, pp. 1487-1502, and Nachricht von den Lebens-Umständen Herrn Jacob Denners, 3 pp. in Preface). This edition was reprinted at Frankental in 1792 for American use (Neue, auf Kosten Johannes Herrstein und Johannes Schmutz gemachte Auflage, welcher die Betrachtung vom Adel des Gewissens, und eine Nachricht von den Lebens-Umständen des seligen Herrn Denners beygefüget worden.), and again in 1860 at Philadelphia, Pa. As late as 1901 an English translation was planned, and a prospectus issued at Doylestown, Pa., but it was never published.

Two earlier Dutch collections of Denner's sermons appeared in 1706 and 1707 under the following titles: De wysheit des Heeren, vertoont door eenvoudige Predicatien, In het uitbreiden van de gebruikelijke Sondaagse als ook eenige Feest-daagse Evangelien. Onder Gods genade gedaan en beschreven door Imant Die van herten verlangt ende wenst een getrouw Dienstknegt des Heeren Jesu te sijn ende blijven. (Amsterdam, and Danzig, 1707), 60 sermons with 2 more in a supplement; and Eenige uitbreidingen; over verscheidene Schriftuerlijke Texten soo wel uyt het Oude als Nieuwe Verbondt, 17 sermons. Under new title pages but with identical content both volumes were published at Hoorn in 1771. The two volumes were printed and bound together in one book without volume number but with separate pagination and title pages, the former with 746 pp., the latter with 202 pp.

The 1730 German edition described at the beginning of this article is almost identical in content with the Dutch book of 1706-7. The first part contains 60 sermons, the same as those in the 1707 and 1771 Dutch editions, but omits the two supplementary ones of the Dutch editions. The second part contains 24 sermons, 2 of which are taken from the supplement of Part I of the Dutch editions, 9 are taken from Part II of the Dutch editions, and 14 new ones are added (thus 8 from Part II of the Dutch edition were discarded). The volume is, however, not a direct translation of the Dutch book; it claims that the sermons were translated from the Dutch into German while they were being preached.

Denner's sermons, thoroughly evangelical, Biblical, and experiential (pietistic) in emphasis, were very popular, attended by people of all denominations, including the nobility of Holstein and near-by Denmark, as well as the later King Adolph Frederick of Sweden. A Lutheran pastor, Erdmann Neumeister, attacked Denner's book of sermons in a polemical pamphlet, Anmerkungen über Jakob Denners Postille (Hamburg, 1731). H.S.B.

Einlage (Kitchkas) was one of the largest Mennonite villages of the Chortitza settlement (q.v.) on the right bank of the Dniepr, province of Ekaterinoslav, Ukraine, established in 1789 by Prussian Mennonites, who named the new village after the one some had come from. Soon after the settlement a flood of the Dniepr River made it necessary to transplant the village to a higher level. Again in 1927 the whole village was moved because of the Dneprostroi power dam which put the village level under water.

Before World War I the village had a population of some 1,500 and about 7,500 acres of land. Because of the favorable location of the village, business and industry, in addition to agriculture, became essential activities of Einlage. Steam-driven mills, factories, and businesses were established and some of the Mennonites became well-to-do. During 1902-7 the second small Katherine Railroad was built through Einlage, greatly promoting industry and business. At that time one of the largest arch-span supported bridges of the world was built here across the Dniepr River; it was destroyed in the two world wars.

One of the earliest industries was the wagon factory of Heinrich Unger, active during the first half of the 18th century. His son Abram was the first Mennonite to construct spring wagons. Abram's son, A. A. Unger, enlarged the factory considerably. Johann Friesen established a factory which produced the first grain reaper among the Mennonites (possibly the first in the Ukraine) in 1879. The firm Koop and Co. bought and enlarged the Friesen factory, producing motors, machinery for steel roller flour mills, etc. The early Dutch windmills were replaced by the large flour mills owned by Heinrich Unger, Kornelius Martens, and others. Einlage also had lumber yards and carpenter shops and a number of business enterprises.

When in 1910 the centennial of the Einlage school was commemorated, the school was housed in its fourth building, which had four large classrooms, a library, and four teachers. By 1927, 42 teachers had taught school in Einlage. In addition to the general Mennonite-supported and controlled school, Einlage had a private school during the middle of the century which was taught first by David Hausknecht (1838) and continued by Heinrich Heese (q.v.) (1846-68). Among the other outstanding teachers of Einlage were Gerhard Loewen and J. D. Rempel. The Revolution changed the Mennonite school completely and when Einlage was resettled (1927) it became a state school. Although the teachers remained predominantly Mennonite, the school soon became a tool of the Soviet state in promoting Communism. During the German occupation (1941-43) the school was resumed by Mennonites.

The Mennonite congregation of Einlage met for a long time in the school and was a part of the Chortitza Mennonite Church (q.v.), without an elder of its own. In 1900 a modern brick church was built in Einlage at the cost of 16,852 rubles, which was torn down in 1929 by the Soviets. Einlage was the center of the beginning and spread of the Mennonite Brethren of the Chortitza settlement. The Einlage Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.) started in 1860 and erected a church building in 1904. Some of the industrialists of Einlage were members of this church and generous supporters of the cause. Not far from Einlage at the beautiful spot where the Dniepr River divided to form the Chortitza island owned by Mennonites, there was the Mennonite Sanatorium Alexandrabad (q.v.) and the Bethania Mental Hospital (q.v.).

During and immediately following the Revolution of 1917 Einlage suffered severely. Many battles raged here between the Russians and Germans during both world wars, as well as during the Revolution. Many of the inhabitants succumbed to epidemics. A total of 100 persons died thus in 1919-20, besides many who were murdered. In 1921, 56 persons died of starvation (figures according to J. D. Rempel). When American help reached the village, rehabilitation and reconstruction began.

In 1926 the Soviet government decided to raise the water level of the Dniepr by building a power dam to make it navigable and to produce electricity. This necessitated the removal of Einlage in 1927. The new Einlage had 27 Mennonite and 16 Russian farmers each receiving about 45 acres of land. The construction of the power dam and the Soviet philosophy determined the course of the new village considerably. Up to 40,000 laborers were drawn to this project and settled near Einlage; this resulted in the development of a number of industries. Soon Einlage was forced to farm its land collectively, producing grains and fruit and raising vegetables, hogs, and dairy products, which found a ready market in the vicinity.

The exile of Einlage Mennonites to the Far North or Siberia came to a climax on July 30, 1938, when two trucks of men were taken away, of whose destination no one ever heard. By 1941 a total of 245 Mennonites had been sent to forced labor camps. When the German army invaded the Ukraine, the Soviet authorities managed to evacuate only 23 persons eastward. During the brief time of occupation the former Mennonite way of life was somewhat restored. Einlage was taken by the Germans on Aug. 18, 1941, and was abandoned early in October 1943. On Sept. 29, 1941, 997 Einlage Mennonite laborers were evacuated by the Germans by train, arriving in Danzig on Oct. 9. Twelve hundred and thirty-five Einlage farmers followed on wagons, making the total population evacuated to Germany 2,232. From here many were sent into industries at Zoppot near Danzig, Dresden, and other places. Automatically they were made German subjects and the young men forced into the army. During the final stages of the war many perished in the bombing of Dresden. After the German collapse most of the Einlage Mennonites were forcibly repatriated by the Soviets and sent to Asiatic Russia. Those that succeeded in remaining in Germany finally reached Canada and Paraguay. C.K.

Einlage Mennonite Brethren Church in the village of Einlage, Chortitza settlement, Ukraine, Russia, was organized on March 11, 1862, when 18 persons were baptized, and within a few months reached a membership of 91. Abraham Unger (q.v.) and Heinrich Neufeld were the first ministers elected, and Unger was the first elder (served 1862-76) elected, to be followed by Aaron Lepp as the second elder (served 1876-1903). For the first two years the Einlage group suffered considerably from repressive measures by the existing Mennonite leadership, and sent Gerhard Wieler as a delegate to St. Petersburg for help. By 1864 the right of existence of the new M.B. group both in Chortitza and in the Molotschna had been granted by both the Mennonite Church and the Russian government, and progress was easier. However, internal troubles caused much difficulty, chiefly due to the radicalism of Gerhard Wieler. The unruly elements did so much damage that Unger lost control and resigned, while the erring members were expelled or reconciled through the intermediation of the Molotschna M.B. leaders. Unger later regained his leadership and the church prospered. Einlage and Andreasfeld became the two leading M.B. centers in Chortitza, with Einlage in earlier years the larger congregation. Out of a total of 600 M.B. members in Russia in 1872, 188 were at Einlage. By 1885 Einlage had six branch congregations and was still the largest M.B. church in Russia.

In 1873 the Einlage Church, while under pressure of officials who challenged them to prove their Mennonite status, hurriedly prepared a Confession of Faith. This was printed in 1876. Since it was written at a time when the church stood in a close relationship with the Baptists, it contained much from their Confession; and since the attitude toward the existing Mennonite Church was then somewhat estranged, it included several harsh expressions about the church. This confession of faith, therefore, later proved to be an embarrassment rather than a help and was not fully acceptable to the Einlage Church and still less to other M.B. congregations (quoted from Lohrenz, p. 40 f.).

The relationship with the Baptist Church was a problem which concerned the M.B. Church in general and the Einlage congregation in particular for a number of years. While August Liebig lived in Andreasfeld and did a good deal of preaching in the various congregations, the relationship between the two churches was intimate and friendly. Later Eduard Leppke, a former Baptist from Prussia, joined the M.B. Church and soon became an influential traveling evangelist. Leppke, together with some brethren of a kindred mind, took an estranged attitude toward their neighboring Baptists and influenced the M.B. Church in this way. After several years a more consistent and more brotherly relationship between the two churches evolved, so that each recognized and respected the autonomy of the other.

The Einlage Church continued to be the leader of the Chortitza M.B. group throughout the 19th century, although this group declined relatively in importance in the entire M.B. Church. Gerhard P. Regehr was elder from 1903 on; and Preacher Johann Siemens, who lived here, carried on an extensive and effective itinerant ministry. Other significant preachers were Dietrich Klassen, Peter Peters, and Cornelius Fehr. Several of the branch churches became independent in 1885-1914, such as those in the villages of Petrovka, Vassilevka, Elenovka, and Barvenkovo.† P.H.B.

Einsiedel, a village 18 miles south of Lemberg in Galicia, formerly a Mennonite settlement and the seat of a Mennonite congregation, was organized in 1786 after Joseph II of Austria had invited German settlers to Galicia. The settlement was named after Count von Einsiedel. The original settlement consisted of 20 farms of about 33, 41, or 50 acres of land each. The village was located on a hill on both sides of a wide street in a very regular pattern. Eighteen of the farms were given over to Mennonites, of whom three settler families were Amish, the other two to families (Schmalenberger and Schweitzer) related to them. They soon built a school (1816), which also served as a church and was for a century the chief meeting place of the Galician Mennonites. In 1786 Jakob Müller, Jr., was elder of this congregation, and Jacob Müller, Sr., was preacher. In 1799 Johann Müller succeeded to the eldership.

At the turn of the century half of the Mennonite settlers went on to Russia to the region of Dubno, Volhynia. In order to secure permission to emigrate the families had to turn their farms over to other families just as they had received them, and repay all the expenses of the government in their behalf, namely 4 guilders per person for traveling expenses and approximately 50 guilders for maintenance which they had received in Galicia before their farms were given them. In 1790, 1859, and 1860 the congregation received financial support from Holland (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2685-88). The following families remained in Einsiedel: Hubin (also von Howen or Huwen), Müller, Brubacher, Kintzi, Linscheid, Rupp, Merk, and Klein. Gradually other families from the two neighboring villages moved in, namely, Bachmann, Bergtholdt, and Ewy.

In 1860 Johannes van der Smissen signed his name as minister of the congregation of "Einsiedel and Horozanna" in a letter he wrote to Amsterdam. There were 13 Mennonite families living in Einsiedel at that time, most of them leasing or purchasing larger estates through the efforts of Peter Müller (q.v.). Some emigrated to America in the 1880's. In 1892 there was only one Mennonite family left in Einsiedel. The name Einsiedel was transplanted to America and was used by the Hanston (Kan.) Mennonite (GCM) Church until 1952.

Ekaterinoslav (now Dnepropetrovsk), a province (Russian, oblast) of the Ukraine, USSR, crossed by the Dnieper River, founded in 1786, named after Catherine II, changed to Dnepropetrovsk in 1917. Ekaterinoslav is bordered on the north by Poltava, on the east by Kharkov, on the south by Taurida, and on the west by Kherson. In 1946 it had an area of 12,590 sq. mi. (size of all Holland) with an estimated population of 2,200,000. The capital city by the same name as the province had in 1939 a population of 500,000.

The Mennonites settled first in this province in 1789, establishing the Chortitza (q.v.) settlement with 18 villages. Daughter settlements which originated in this province were as follows: Bergtal (1836), 5 villages; Tchernoglas (1860), 1 village; Borozenko (q.v., 1865), 7 villages; Brazol (1868), 4 villages; Yazykovo (1869), 8 villages; Neplyuevka (1870), 2 villages; Baratov (1872), 2 villages; Schlachtin (1874), 2 villages; Neu-Rosengart (1878), 2 villages; Wiesenfeld (1880), 1 village; Memrik (1885), 10 villages; Miloradovka (1889), 2 villages; Ignatyevo (1889), 7 villages; Borissovo (1892), 3 villages. Before World War I the Mennonite population of the province was 30,000, distributed over 74 villages and some large estates. Including both the village settlements and the large estates, they owned a total of 761,400 acres. Next to the province of Taurida, Ekaterinoslav had the largest Mennonite population in Russia. The center of government, education, and industry for the Mennonites was Chortitza. Alexandrovsk (today Zaporozhe) also became an industrial center.

Most of the Mennonites who came to Canada after World War II came from the province of Ekaterinoslav, since the Soviets did not succeed in evacuating the settlements from west of the Dnieper River to the east when the German Army invaded the Ukraine in 1941. (For information on the Mennonites of this province under the Soviets, see Chortitza, Ukraine, Russia, and the individual settlements listed above.)

Ekaterinoslav (now Dnepropetrovsk), pop. 500,000, the capital of the province of the name in South Russia, on the right bank of the Dniepr, founded in 1787. It was the largest city in the vicinity of the Chortitza Mennonite settlement, about 50 miles south, which was founded in 1789, and served as the business center for the Mennonites. In 1805 the Mennonite Heinrich Thiessen family was operating a vinegar distillery and later a steam mill in Ekaterinoslav. At about the same time, or perhaps a little later, came Heinrich Cornies and David Schröder, and then Heinrich Töws and Jakob Epp. The initial period of the Mennonite congregation ended with the coming of young Abraham Hamm and Heinrich Heese II, a son of the teacher Heinrich Heese (q.v.), who was sent here as a student, and married into the H. Thiessen family. In 1889 there were in the city 9 Mennonite families with about 50 souls. Ten years later there were 31 families with 158 souls. The rapidly growing milling industry, in which nearly all were engaged, kept drawing others from the settlements. At that time the following firms were in the business: J. H. Thiessen, Johann Töws, the Heese Brothers, and the Fast Brothers. The Mennonite group in the city was again augmented in 1919-21, when many large estate owners sought protection from anarchist attacks there.

At first the Mennonite services were held in a private home on alternate Sundays. For official services, such as baptism, communion, etc., they called on the elder of Kronsgarten, a Mennonite village about 40 miles distant. In October 1889 they called their first minister, D. H. Epp of Rosental, who also served as a teacher in their school until 1912. He was followed by Johann Klassen, who had until then been the teacher of religion at the Chortitza Zentralschule, and in 1918 for a short period by Jakob Rempel, who was later ordained as an elder, until anarchy completely destroyed the once thriving Mennonite community.

In 1851 the Mennonites opened a German elementary school, especially for their own children, which developed into a larger school with three teachers, and was also attended by Russian students and foreigners as a school preparatory to the Russian secondary school. In 1910 the congregation built a new school with an apartment for a teacher or minister; in it church services were also held. The war breaking out in 1914 prevented the church they had planned from being built.

In its prime the Ekaterinoslav Mennonite Church had a beneficial influence on outside circles. To meet the needs of the large number of Mennonite students who came to the city to study in the Russian secondary schools there, it organized various activities with this definite objective. By means of family connections, choral groups, lectures, amateur presentations, and a large library of German books they sought to keep the young people together, away from the disintegrating influence of the metropolis. In addition to Sunday services, religious instruction was given all age groups.

The first work preliminary to the establishment of Bethania (q.v.), the hospital for the mentally ill, was done here, as also for the founding of the Chortitza girls' school. There were always experienced men here, who were willing and able to aid the brethren in the colony in matters relating to government institutions, banking, or church business. There was, for instance, Johann Thiessen, with all his wealth a humble Christian, always ready to help wherever the need arose, an anonymous benefactor of the poor; Heinrich Heese in his position on the board of directors of the city branch of the federal bank and many private banks; Jakob Heese, a young attorney, who devoted himself to youth work, serving many years as an excellent choral director; Heinrich Töws, in whose large, beautiful home all youth festivities were held; Jakob Esau, long a practicing physician in the Chortitza villages, then head and owner of an eye clinic in the city. Finally engineer Johann Esau must be named, who remained faithfully at his responsible post, first as assistant to the mayor, then as mayor, when none of the Russians would allow themselves to be elected because of political disturbances. Under his leadership and his energetic support, a series of welfare institutions was inaugurated in the city: a great new water system was laid, a streetcar line built, and several excellent girls' schools erected. When ingratitude and envy made it impossible for him to serve any longer, even his enemies had to recognize his incorruptible fidelity. After the Russian Revolution in 1917 the Mennonite community of Ekaterinoslav never regained the significance and strength of the former years. The large enterprises were confiscated and the Mennonites scattered. Although Mennonite students attended schools and others lived here, the community life and congregation gradually disintegrated. El Ombu Mennonite settlement and congregation in Uruguay, ca. 185 miles north of Montevideo, on the main highway to Paysandu (65 miles away), the town of Young (pop. 5,000) being the nearest market, founded in 1950 with the aid of the Mennonite Central Committee by Mennonite refugees from Danzig and West Prussia, most of whom had been in refugee camps in Denmark since their flight from Danzig in January 1945. El Ombu (the name refers to a shade tree) is actually the name of a 25,000-acre estate, 3,000 acres of which were bought at a price of $100,000 and occupied April 17, 1950. About half of the 750 Mennonites who arrived in Uruguay Oct. 7, 1948, on the Volendam settled here, a total of 80 families and 12 single persons. (In April 1951, about 400 persons in 100 family units were living in El Ombu, 10 of whom had previously belonged to two congregations in Poland, Deutsch-Kazun and Wymysle.) In September 1950 the El Ombu co-operative ("Flor del Rio Negro") was organized, to which every settler (head of a family) belongs. The El Ombu congregation was organized on March 10, 1952, with the following ministerial organization: elder, Ernst Regehr, formerly elder (1934) of Rosenort; preachers, Gustav L. Reimer (1931 Heubuden), Heinrich Wall (1934 Fürstenwerder), Alfred Hinz (1935 Orlofferfelde), Otto Jochem (1941 Fürstenwerder), Reinhard Fast (1952 El Ombu); deacons, Johannes Wiebe (1933 Heubuden), Heinz Dyck (1952 El Ombu). The crops in El Ombu are wheat, corn, flax, sunflowers, and peanuts. Milk, butter, and fruit are also in production. An orange orchard of about 100 acres with 11,000 bearing trees was on the tract when bought. El Ombu is the oldest Mennonite settlement in Uruguay and to date the center of Mennonite life there. El Trebol, the third settlement effort by Mennonite refugees who fled from Russia and landed in Mexico. El Trebol was located in the state of Durango on a tract of land east of the Old Colony Mennonite village of Grünfeld. Twenty-four families moved from Irapuato (q.v.) after that effort failed. These families, not all of one branch of Mennonites, struggled for three or four years to eke out an existence but finally gave up. Some of the families moved to Cuauhtemoc in the state of Chihuahua, others moved to Canada, and one or two married into the Old Colony group. Today all evidence of a former settlement has disappeared. C.K.

Elahuizen, a hamlet in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 14 persons in 1551-54. Yet there is no evidence that a congregation ever existed in this town. Likely the people baptized by Bouwens joined the congregation—now extinct—of Legemeer (q.v.). vdZ.

Elbing, a city in West Prussia (pop. 85,000), was until after World War I the seat of two Mennonite congregations. As early as 1531 Anabaptists are said to have lived in Elbing, and since about the middle of the 16th century Mennonites had lived in Elbing and vicinity. The city had suffered so severely in the war between Poland and Prussia (1519-21) that the government made serious efforts to attract capable colonists. They gladly accepted the Mennonite refugees fleeing religious persecution in Holland, and gave them charge of managing the farms in the vicinity. In the city proper they were at first not tolerated. In 1550 the council announced to the Mennonites a royal decree that they must leave the city within two weeks. But the expulsion was not rigorously carried out. Nor was the order of expulsion issued by the Polish King Sigismund in 1556 taken very seriously by the city authorities. Their services seem to have been especially required to clear the land in the Ellerwald, which was apportioned to the ruling families of the city in 1565. In 1571 Sebastian Neogeorgius, the pastor of St. Mary's, declaimed against tolerating them on the Ellerwald estates and induced the council to issue an order that the "foreigners" were to leave the region of the city by Easter of 1572. The terminus was extended to autumn, "until the Mennonites have harvested their grain," and then again to Jan. 6, 1575; then the order was completely forgotten (Mannhardt, Wehrfreiheit, 71). The Mennonites stayed on the country estates and are said even to have won Lutheran fellow citizens to their faith.

Soon after this they began to settle in the city of Elbing again. In 1585 Jost van Kampen and Hans van Keulen were granted citizenship and the permission to engage in the silk trade, which had not yet been introduced into the city (Mannhardt, Danzig, 49), and in 1610 several other Mennonites were accepted as citizens; by 1612 there were 16 Mennonite families living in the city. Difficulties were placed in the way of their residence in the city by the decree of Sigismund III in 1653 requiring the oath of citizenship. But they continued to be tolerated and were not molested by any demands running counter to their conscience. In giving the oath of citizenship with "yea" and "nay," they were required to place the hand on the breast; for freedom from military service they paid a special tax—the regulations of 1660 required one Polish guilder (Carstenn, p. 35), whether they were natives or foreigners, and only in a few insignificant matters in trade and commerce did the council give the Lutherans any advantage (Mannhardt, Danzig, 72).

In the meantime a Mennonite congregation had formed in Elbing. The first church was built in 1590 on land owned by Jost van Kampen, Kurze Hinterstrasse 8, now Wilhelmsstrasse. It served the congregation until 1900, when a new, larger building was erected on Berlinerstrasse 20, which was used by the Elbing-Ellerwald congregation until 1945. This congregation had a second church in Ellerwald, a village near Elbing, which was dedicated by Elder Gerhard Wiebe on Oct. 5, 1783, together with a school which was opened by permission of the king of Prussia (Naamlijst 1787, 63). The city and country groups have from the beginning formed the single congregation of Elbing-Ellerwald, with a jointly chosen elder, preachers, and deacons. This is demonstrable back as far as 1606. An old record says, "In 1606 Henrich von dem Bosche served the union in Elbing." In 1610 the council complained to Sigismund III that "the Mennonites among themselves, without the foreknowledge of the government, granted divorces (i.e., proclaimed the avoidance of a spouse), married one another and divided inheritance, whereupon a royal rescript was issued on June 27, 1611, forbidding these independent rites on penalty of a fine of 100 Hungarian guilders. In 1648 Dirk v. Haegen, in 1674 Zacharias Janssen, Hermann Fock, and Anton Momber are called preachers. Then the office of elder appears to have been vacant for a considerable time.

There are letters in the Mennonite archives at Amsterdam that show that the Elbing Mennonites in the early 18th century suffered severely from flooding caused by broken dikes and from crop failures. They received substantial aid from the Dutch Mennonite Committee on Foreign Needs (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1569, 1579, 1652, 1658). In 1726 many Mennonites from Lithuania came into Elbing, but most of them went elsewhere after a short time (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1578-79, 1692). This was an Old Flemish Mennonite congregation. From 1727 a complete succession of elders can be followed. On Jan. 12 of this year, Hermann Janson, who came to Elbing from Holland in 1690, was ordained elder by Dirk Siemens from the Grossen Werder. He was followed by Zacharias Schröter 1745-70 (d. 1771), Antony Wölcky 1770-78, Gerhard Wiebe 1778-98, Peter Dick of Ellerwald 1798-1807, whose ordination caused a brief division between the city and country groups. The former was dissatisfied with his election and chose Antony Wölke, who served as elder of the city church from 1788 until his death in 1804. In that year the groups reunited. Peter Dick was succeeded by Jakob Kröker from Ellerwald 1808-46, Johann Andreas (q.v.) of Nogattau 1846-69, who emigrated to America because he could not reconcile his conscience with the duty of military service on the basis of the royal order of cabinet of March 3, 1868. Andreas was followed in the office of elder by Johann Mierau of Elbing 1870-78, Abraham Dick of Ellerwald 1879-86, Wilhelm Dückmann 1890-97, and Rudolf Wieler of Kraffohlsdorf, later living in Elbing 1898-1923, and Emil Händiges 1923-45.

On Jan. 1, 1920, the congregation numbered 736 souls (male 346, female 390, baptized 572, unbaptized 104, married 276, unmarried 399, widowed 61). Church books were kept since 1825. The church was incorporated in 1897. Until 1904 the Mennonites buried their dead in the Lutheran cemeteries of the city, but the Protestant clergy were frequently intolerant toward the burial rites. Therefore in 1904 the Mennonites purchased a tract of land near the city and furnished it with a mortuary. Services were held in the city church every Sunday and in the Ellerwald church once a month. The church was served by a lay ministry until recently. Only the elder received any financial compensation for performing the functions of his office. Most of the members were farmers or merchants; few had trades; a number lived on their private means. The church was a member of the Vereinigung (q.v.). Church discipline was exercised in cases of gross sin.

From this congregation of Elbing-Ellerwald came a second Mennonite congregation in Elbing, known as the Elbing Mennonite Church. In the middle of the 19th century a number of the members of Elbing-Ellerwald felt the need for a trained minister. For the city people, many of whom were educated, the country preachers no longer sufficed, and the instruction of youth left much to be desired, as the emphasis was placed on the recitation of memorized answers to the regular questions. The city young people were in danger of being lost to the church.

It was therefore decided to engage as preacher Carl Harder (q.v.), a young Königsberg Mennonite who had just completed his theological studies at the University of Halle. But Harder was chosen preacher by his home congregation and ordained there in 1845. He occasionally preached at Elbing. But when the Königsberg church received as a member a man expelled by the Rosenort church, and by the conference at Neuteich July 15, 1847, was consequently cut off from fellowship by the other West Prussian churches, the board of the Elbing-Ellerwald church forbade Harder to preach in the Mennonite church in Elbing. Harder then held his services at first in a private hall, then (1850-51) in Lutheran Heilig-Geistkirche. When all negotiations with the board of Elbing-Ellerwald failed, several Elbing Mennonites built a second church in the Reiferbahnstrasse, which was dedicated Aug. 1, 1852. The new congregation, which became a subsidiary of the Königsberg church, was joined at once by 24 families. Harder preached to the congregation, which chose its own board, every two weeks. In 1857, when Harder was chosen by the Neuwied church to take the place of de Veer as preacher, the preachers of the Danzig church, J. Mannhardt and van Kampen, alternately served the Elbing congregation for a time.

After van Kampen's death in 1868 the connections with Elbing came to an end. Elbing now had to make its own arrangements, and called Carl Harder of Neuwied, who moved into Elbing at Easter 1869. From that time on services were held every Sunday in the Mennonite church on the Reiferbahn. The Mennonite minister taught the courses in religion in the Elbing schools. Mennonite children were thus no longer compelled to attend religious instruction given by members of the state church; this was true of no other city in Germany. In 1882 the church had a membership of 298 souls, of whom 197 lived in Elbing and the immediate vicinity. Harder died in 1898. The congregation chose Adolf Siebert to take his place; he was installed on Aug. 14, 1898. In 1922 the congregation had a total of 450 souls. In 1940 it had a membership of 113 baptized members and 11 unbaptized children. Aron Mäkelborger was ordained as pastor and elder in 1938, but was called into military service in 1940 and never returned. Both congregations in Elbing were wiped out in January 1945 by the flight before the advance of the Russian army. In 1947, when the MCC relief program was established in the Danzig-Marienburg-Elbing area, one remaining family of members of the Elbing-Ellerwald congregation was found. H. S. Bender baptized their two daughters in the spring of 1948. Some relief supplies were distributed in Elbing (Polish Elblag) by MCC workers, but a child-feeding program was cut short by the Polish government. The fate of the former Elbing ministers is as follows: Elder Händiges was called to serve as pastor at Monsheim, Rheinhessen, where he served until his retirement in 1954, and Preacher Jakob Friesen of the same congregation died in a camp in Denmark in 1945; Adolf Siebert of Elbing (Stadt), d. Jan. 26, 1945, on the flight westward.† E.H.

Elbing, a village in Butler Co., Kan., 12 miles east of Newton, so named because the first members of the Zion Mennonite Church (GCM) here, organized in 1883, came from the area near Elbing, West Prussia, Germany. The 1953 membership of 143, however, included Mennonites from almost every background. The Berean Academy (q.v.), a four-year high school, operated by the Berean Christian Laymen's Association, an organization of Mennonite laymen, is located at the edge of the village. The Gnadenberg Mennonite Church (GCM), located about four miles southwest of Elbing, in 1953 had a membership of approximately 185. (ML I, 550.) L.A.J.

Elbow Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located at Elbow, Sask., was organized in 1927 by immigrants from Russia who had settled there on farm land. The membership soon rose to some 70 or 80, but declined on account of lack of rainfall to about 12. Frank Wiens led the congregation for many years, but moved away in 1945. The church was no longer listed in the 1948 M.B. Year Book. P.C.H.

Elconius, Hermannus (Herman Eelkes), b. at Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, d. there after 1607, was the last Roman Catholic priest at Harlingen before the Reformation; about 1580 he left the Catholic Church and in 1581 became a Reformed minister at Utrecht, and from 1589 at Harlingen. Here he came into conflict with the Reformed Synod; in 1602 he left the Reformed church and joined the Mennonites at Harlingen. In 1605 he is reported to have been their preacher. Nothing further is known about this remarkable man. (N.N.B.Wb. I, 798; DB 1911, 45-48.) vdZ.

Elder (German, Aeltester; Dutch, Oudste) is the name for the highest and most responsible office of the Mennonite ministry in a large number of Mennonite congregations and conferences. The origin of the word goes back to the Biblical times and is mentioned in Acts 14:23; I Tim. 5:17, etc. The New Testament equivalent is presbyter or bishop. In the early Anabaptist usage, the terms elder (Aeltester, Oudste), Leeraar, and bishop (q.v.) were used interchangeably. Gradually, however, the term Oudste or Aeltester became predominant until the usage of "bishop" disappeared in Europe with the possible exception of the Hutterites. At present, wherever this office is referred to in Europe, it is either Aeltester, Pastor, or Dominee. In America, however, large groups, particularly those of Pennsylvania-German background, use the term bishop only. This article will deal mostly with the office and function of the elder. (Regarding the office and the function of a bishop, see the article Bishop.)

It was a principle of the Anabaptists to have their congregations function in a democratic way in contrast to the large state churches, which had a somewhat episcopal form of church government, operating usually from the top down. It would, however, be misleading to assume that the early Anabaptists were able to develop and maintain a thoroughly congregational type of church government. This was impossible because of the very severe and lasting persecution under which the congregations originated and existed. In many instances, the congregations could only survive through strong leadership, which was either delegated or assumed. In principle, and also in practice compared to the state churches, the Anabaptist congregations were democratic. However, the above-mentioned emergency conditions necessitated and were conducive to the development of strong leadership. Capito (q.v.), in a letter of July 31, 1528, to Zwingli, says, "There are among them 'principes' and leaders, whom they themselves call 'Vorsteher.' "

The office of a minister was twofold; some ministers were ordained to preach only (Diener am Wort—servant of the Word, Dienaar, Vermaner Prediger). The elders or bishops (Oudste, Leeraar) were authorized to perform all functions (voller Dienst—full service) of the church. In addition to this, of course, there were also deacons (Armendiener—servants of the poor).

The Emden Protocol (1579) treats in detail the call and function of elders and ministers of the 16-century Anabaptists of Northwest Europe. Pieter van Ceulen states: "Bishops and preachers (Dienaren) are chosen by the congregations under God's guidance by a majority of the vote with fasting and prayer unto the Lord. Such ministers are ordained by the laying on of hands of the elders" (p. 229b). And again this is emphasized when Brixius Gerrits says "that the entire congregation must meet to elect elders or preachers" (Leeraers ofte Dienaren, 239a). The Protocol and Het beginsel en voortganck der geschillen refer to the elders as Leeraar, Oudste, and Biscop. The Protocol uses all of these terms, while Het beginsel consistently uses Leeraar only. The latter uses Dienaer and Vermaender for preacher. These usages are also found in "Oude Gemeente verordeningen" by de Hoop Scheffer (DB 1877).

Thus in the early days the Anabaptists of Northwest Europe spoke of their elders interchangeably as Oudste, Leeraar, and Biscop. Such functions as the administration of baptism and the Lord's Supper and the ordination of church officers could be performed only by holders of this office. They are also referred to as Leeraer in den vollen dienst (Het beginsel, p. 16). The Dienaar (servant, minister) or Vermaner (admonisher) held an office which entitled the holder to preaching only, mostly in his own congregation, while the elders were traveling extensively in the various congregations of their respective districts. An unusual example of the extensive work of such an elder is found in the list of persons who were baptized by Leenaert Bouwens, extending from Meenen to Emden.

In the beginning the number of elders was small. Those who were to practice the "full ministry" (voller Dienst) were usually selected from among preachers and were then ordained as elders or bishops by laying on of hands (Krahn, Menno Simons, 147). This ordination entitled the elder not only to preach and assume leadership in the congregation, but also to baptize, administer the Lord's Supper, and ordain preachers and elders, and exercise discipline, which functions the common preacher could not fulfill.

The early Anabaptist ministers quite often had to defend their calling in their disputes with Catholic, Lutheran, and the Reformed ministers, who, more or less, claimed that their call was based on the Apostolic Succession (q.v.) and denied that the Anabaptist elders and ministers had a proper calling. (See Emden Protocol, "Van de Verkiesinge ende Beroepinge der Predicanten ofte Dienaers," pp. 229-45.) This concerned the Anabaptist leaders very little. Since they did not find a "true apostolic church" anywhere, and since the Bible demanded it, they felt not only authorized but compelled to establish a congregation. Elders and preachers were not working in their own authority, but had received their calling from a congregation or directly from God. Menno Simons says, "Ministers of the Sacred Word are to be called in an orderly manner, either by the Lord Himself or through the God-fearing" (Works II, 342a). The Wismar Agreements (1554), however, state clearly that no one has the right to preach without being called by a congregation or ordained by an elder (BRN VII, 53).

The elders, and particularly the preachers, did not receive a fixed salary, partly because the early Anabaptists were opposed to the practices along these lines prevailing in the state church. The prevalent corruption and lack of integrity, religious convictions, and sincerity they linked to the practice of hiring and paying the ministry for its services. A voluntary church membership and a voluntary ministry with personal conviction and high moral integrity was the aim. This, however, did not mean that the elder was not to receive support and aid out of "the hand of the God-fearing disciples," so that the elder could take care of his spiritual duties (Menno's Works II, 31 ff., 341). In the Emden Protocol Brixius Gerrits states, "To the question whether a congregation should support the minister it has called in a Christian way, we say yes. But we do not know whether they [apostles] had a fixed income" (p. 233b).

Rues states (Aufrichtige Nachrichten, 27-30) that during the early 18th century the conservative groups of the Netherlands still adhered to the practices of the early days. The elder specially ordained for these functions was the only minister to baptize, administer the Lord's Supper, and ordain ministers. He was always the chairman of the church council and took the initiative in matters pertaining to the congregation. The conservative groups were, in principle, opposed to a specially trained ministry, basing their argument partly on statements of the early Anabaptists, while the more progressive Mennonites of Holland soon realized the necessity of a specially trained leadership. The latter probably found as much justification in the writings of the early Anabaptists as the former. Although the early Anabaptist leaders strongly denounced the misuse of learning among the theologically trained ministers of the state churches, they hardly ever said anything against training as such. On the contrary, they made full use of it (Krahn, Menno Simons, 109 ff.).

Among the Waterlanders the distinction between the elders (Oudste, Leeraar) and preachers (Dienaar, Vermaner) soon disappeared. In Rotterdam this distinction was given up in 1687, when the elder died and the three remaining ministers were authorized to perform all functions on equal terms (Kühler III, II). Among the Groningen Old Flemish, where the old practice was adhered to longest, the elders were also known as Opzieners or Commissarissen (Blaupot t. C., Groningen, 132 ff.). The more progressive urban Mennonite congregations of Holland soon felt the need for a trained ministry, which they remedied by electing physicians or other educated members of the congregations into the ministry and eldership. These, in turn, promoted the establishment of a seminary for the training of ministers (see Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary). With this change, the office of elder was considerably altered. Formerly the elder served several congregations, having a number of coministers as assistants. Congregations then chose the elder from among the preachers, who usually had been chosen out of the congregation. With the special theological training of young men interested in serving as ministers, the whole system was gradually altered and finally disappeared. The minister did not necessarily stay for life. Soon there was only one minister in each congregation, ordained at once as both preacher and elder and performing all functions in the congregation.

This new system, started as an accommodation to the need of the day, spread from Holland to the neighboring German congregations, such as Crefeld, Emden, Hamburg-Altona, and Danzig, and finally to the Palatinate. Needless to say there was often a difference of opinion regarding this new system, which sometimes caused splits in congregations (Danzig, Elbing). There was usually the intellectual urban wing urging the calling of a specially prepared minister, and a conservative rural population opposing this change. However, the unwillingness, and sometimes inability, of lay ministers to cope with the multiple and complex problems and responsibilities of urban congregations compelled congregations to accept this change. In Holland the majority of congregations accepted this change during the 18th century, while the neighboring German Mennonite congregations inaugurated it during the 19th century, often calling on trained Dutch Mennonite ministers. The Danzig Mennonite congregation elected Jacob van der Smissen in 1826 as its first theologically trained preacher, but he did not become the elder of the congregation. Later Elbing followed. However, most of the rural Prussian Mennonite congregations retained the traditional system to the end of their existence (1945). Preachers and particularly elders were usually of the well-to-do class with a fairly good education, who could afford to devote a considerable part of their time to their congregational duties. The elders were organized like those of the Verband (q.v.) group in South Germany in a council of elders (Aeltestenrat, q.v.). The elders and preachers together constituted the Lehrdienst or ministerial body.

With the above change, the title of the ministers also underwent a change. In Holland, the word for elder (Oudste) was changed to the title in general use in the state church, Dominee (abbreviated Ds.). The North German and Prussian elders with a theological training, serving the congregations on a salaried basis, are usually referred to as Pastor, but also as Aeltester.

The Mennonite congregations of Poland never came to the point where the old practice regarding elders and preachers was affected. In Russia the matter of eldership caused considerable difficulties when the Chortitza (q.v.) settlement was established. No elders had joined the immigrants and the one appointed by letter by the home congregation in Prussia was not fully accepted. After the initial difficulties had been ironed out by visiting elders from Prussia, the traditional elder-minister practice functioned without great change into the 20th century. The elders and ministers were organized in a Kirchenkonvent, the equivalent of the Lehrdienst in West Prussia.

With the raising of the educational level and the introduction of secondary schools among the Russion Mennonites during the middle of the past century, the demand for specially trained preachers and elders increased. It gradually became the practice to elect preachers from the ranks of the teachers, who sometimes combined the two professions. Thus at the turn of the century most of the elders had secondary school training. With the interest in mission work and the training of missionaries in foreign theological schools came also the demand for the establishment of a theological school, and when this did not materialize, the training of some ministers and evangelists in Swiss and German Bible Schools and theological seminaries came about. Although there was a trend away from the older system in which the elder had charge of a number of other congregations and ministers in addition to his own, a radical change did not take place. Theologically trained and conference-appointed traveling evangelists received some remuneration, as did also some elders, but the system of the unsalaried ministry in general prevailed. On the whole, the development in this matter was about the same among all groups of Mennonites in Russia. The tradition and practice regarding elders and preachers among the Mennonite Brethren congregations was more or less the same.

In Russia, in accordance with an old Flemish regulation, only the elders, not the preachers, were ordained by the laying on of hands; this practice continued in some of the Flemish congregations until 1900.

The Mennonite immigrant congregations of Prussian, Polish, and Russian background of the prairie states (U.S.A.) and provinces (Canada) maintained the traditional office of an elder who was assisted by preachers and was possibly in charge of a number of congregations. For many years lay preachers were elected from the midst of the congregation. Gradually, with the advancement of secondary education and the felt need for an English-speaking, theologically trained ministry, the practice in the United States has been completely changed, very much after the pattern introduced in the Netherlands. This applies especially to the General Conference Mennonite congregations and the Mennonite Brethren. Most of their congregations are now served by men who voluntarily chose the work of a minister by majoring in Bible in college or attending a theological seminary or Bible school, and who have received a call from a congregation to serve full time on a contract basis. Most of these ministers are ordained at one and the same time as preachers and elders and thus perform all functions. Occasionally, in the process of changing, some of the old lay preachers also continue to preach. Thus, each congregation is served by a preacher-elder who performs all functions and can resign and accept the call of another congregation. This change is almost complete in all congregations of the above-mentioned background in the United States.

In Canada, where the more conservative element settled during the 1870's and where the more recent Mennonite immigrants from Russia are predominant, the old system still prevails, although it is apparent that a change is coming. Elders of the Rosenort Mennonite Church, the Blumenort Mennonite Church, the Bergtal Mennonite Church, the Schönwiese Mennonite Church, and others still have charge of several congregations, assisted by a number of preachers, and are the only ones who administer baptism and the Lord's Supper and ordain ministers. However, in the Mennonite Brethren Church, where the office of elder has been completely dropped and the office of elected "leader" substituted, and the recently established General Conference congregations, particularly in the cities, the minister is often in charge of one congregation only, and in some instances, has no assistant ministers. With the demand for college and seminary trained, English-speaking preaching ministers, the usual change will likely take place soon. In the more conservative groups, such as the Old Colony Mennonites (Canada, Mexico), Sommerfelder (Canada, Mexico, Paraguay), and the recent immigrants from Russia and Prussia to South America, the old system of eldership will likely prevail for some time to come.

With the change from the German language to the English, the title Aeltester, which was the only form in use, has been translated "elder," although Canadian groups, particularly when dealing with the public and government, use the Anglican title "bishop." However, generally speaking, the title "elder" will probably disappear since the commonly used title, "The Reverend," in its abbreviated form "Rev.," is becoming predominant. When referring to the office of the minister-elect without the personal name, "minister" is the generally accepted term. "Preacher" is not used as a title preceding the name, as is common among the conservative groups of Pennsylvania-German background. An exception in using "Preacher" as a title is the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite.

The older method of electing an elder (and preacher) among the Dutch, Prussian, and Russian groups prior to the modern change was usually by majority vote. In some instances, however, the lot may have been used (Krahn, 144). References to it are extremely rare and the only known present practice is by vote. When at present a minister is to be called, the congregation has a committee to nominate candidates, one of whom is elected by a majority vote, possibly after the congregation has had occasion to become acquainted with the candidate.

The office of elder, both in the earlier times (16th-18th centuries) in Holland and North Germany and in the 19th-20th centuries in Russia, developed great prestige and considerable power. At times certain elders exercised this power in arbitrary and domineering ways, in effect "ruling over" their congregations or districts. In Holland such exercise of authority was a major factor in many of the schisms of the 16th and 17th centuries. In Russia the village type of settlement, the dominant religious concern, and the prestige of the elder tended to the development of a type of hierarchial theocracy in which at times the elders practically controlled both the civil and ecclesiastical life of the community. The village Schulze or mayor seldom acted in cultural matters without the counsel of the elder, and almost never acted against this counsel when it was received. However, there were men like Johann Cornies who successfully steered their own course, with the backing, to be sure, of the Russian governmental authorities. The Prussian and Russian Mennonite society was essentially patriarchal (as was generally the case in the Swiss-South German type also), in which the elder incorporated in his person in a sense both the familial and the ecclesiastical authority. This tradition is continued among the conservative Old Colony Mennonites of Canada, Mexico, and Paraguay. The common Dutch and Low German title Oom (Ohm; i.e., Uncle) as applied to the elder symbolized and carries much of this feeling of high regard for the church authority. C.K.

Eldert (Aeldert) Gerritsz, born at Velthuysen, near Zwolle, Dutch province of Overijssel, a revolutionary Anabaptist, a follower of Jan van Batenburg (q.v.), was charged with belonging to corrupt sects and having robbed many Catholic churches. He was beheaded at Utrecht (Netherlands) on July 21, 1544. (Berigten Historisch Genootschap IV, 2, 1851, 146.) vdZ.

Eldorado Community Church, located 15 miles southwest of Henderson, Neb., was organized as an M.B. congregation in 1903. Before that the members met with the Sutton M.B. Church. John Deines had the leadership of this group for many years, and M.B. ministers from Henderson assisted in pastoral duties. In recent years Eli Cook served the congregation as pastor. The Eldorado congregation has not been listed in the M.B. conference reports since 1950. H.E.W.

Elementary Education, a term commonly used in America for the training given to children during the first eight years of their attendance at school. The term is in contrast to secondary education, which refers to the work in grades 9-12 inclusive.

A. Europe. During the early days of Anabaptism in Switzerland and Holland conditions were not favorable for the establishment of church or parochial schools. In the days of persecution such institutions would not have been permitted. Lacking relatively permanent and closely knit communities the Anabaptists of these areas would have found it difficult to establish their own schools. The Hutterites, on the other hand, living in colonies, were able to establish their own schools, which they did as early as 1533. School attendance was compulsory and their schools were good enough to attract non-Hutterite children. M. S. Harder explains, "The Hutterian schools were divided into three departments. The first accepted the children when they were one-and-a-half years old. It was like a Kindergarten in modern education. It was concerned chiefly with the physical care of the children. The little children were taught to speak, and received their first instruction in religion and social living. At the age of 5 or 6 the children entered the next department, not unlike an elementary school. Here they were under the supervision of a schoolmaster who taught them how to read and write. The religious training was greatly emphasized. Prayers, the catechism, and religious hymns occupied the center of the curriculum. . . . The children remained in this department until they were old enough to learn to work."

After the persecution of the Dutch Mennonites ended, they became absorbed in the urban life of their country, not living in closed communities. They sent their children both to secular schools and to church schools maintained by other Christian groups. Only in Haarlem did they have their own institutions, where they owned and supported two elementary schools, one of which was still in existence in 1954, both of which however were essentially schools for poor children and not conceived as parochial church schools.

After the Swiss government organized its national school system, the Mennonites organized elementary schools in their homes to comply with the new law. During the last half of the 19th century there were at least 20 such schools among the Mennonites in the Jura Mountains. When the financial burden of these schools became almost too heavy for the Mennonites to bear, they were given state financial aid. The Chaux d'Abel elementary school was the first to be granted equal status with other state schools and therefore to be declared eligible for state aid. A few years later, in 1899, the Mont-Tramelan school was granted similar recognition. In 1949 there were seven one-teacher Mennonite schools in Switzerland, offering nine grades of work, and all complying with the educational requirements of Swiss law. The schools at Chaux d'Abel, Montbautier, and Perceux have their own buildings. The Moron and Jeangisboden schools are held in churches and the Mont-Tramelan and the Perceux schools meet in private homes.

In Germany the Realanstalt am Donnersberg, later known as the Weierhof Real- und Erziehungs-Anstalt, a private secondary boarding school founded by Michael Löwenberg, and patronized by Mennonites, was opened in 1867. A ruling of the Bavarian state compelled it to operate on the elementary level from 1878 to 1884. In 1869 an elementary school was opened in the French village of Etupes for the Mennonite children of this area. Later the school was moved to an estate near the village of Exincourt (q.v.), where it was operated successfully for seven years. The Mennonites of Altona operated an elementary school in 1723-95 with interruptions (Dollinger, 169 f.). The Mennonites of Neustadt-Goedens, East Friesland, maintained an elementary school for some time in conjunction with the Reformed (archives at Aurich). The Deutschhof, Palatinate, congregation also operated its own elementary school for a time.

When the Mennonites moved to South Russia in 1789 ff., they soon established their own elementary schools, although during the first 50 years they were inadequate because of the poverty of the colonies. In 1820 a movement to improve elementary education was begun in the Molotschna Mennonite colony by planning for secondary schools to train teachers. Such a school was the Ohrloff Zentralschule opened in 1822. Johann Cornies as leader of the Agricultural Union in these Mennonite settlements brought about changes in the educational standards which greatly improved the quality of their elementary schools in the years following 1843. By 1910, the number of elementary schools in the Mennonite villages had grown to 400, taught by 500 teachers, mostly men. After 1880 the Mennonite educational system increasingly came under the control of the state. Following the Bolshevik Revolution, the Mennonites lost their control over their schools, which then were used to destroy rather than to maintain Mennonite ideals, and their educational autonomy which had lasted a century was completely destroyed.

B. America. In colonial Pennsylvania, the Mennonites established schools in their communities, although these were not parochial but rather private subscription schools. It was a common practice of the Mennonites to use their churches for school purposes. Sometimes their school was built on the same grounds as the church. J. E. Hartzler mentions more than a dozen Mennonite churches of eastern Pennsylvania prior to 1800 that were used as buildings for elementary schools. Silas Hertzler states that by 1776 at least 16 schools were being conducted by the Mennonites of Pennsylvania. The noted Mennonite schoolteacher Christopher Dock (q.v.) taught two such schools in Eastern Pennsylvania, at Skippack and at Salford, in the first half of the 18th century. His Schulordnung (1770) was a pioneer book on pedagogy in colonial America. During the second half of the 18th century the public school system replaced the private schools in that state, but not without opposition from the Mennonites and other sectarian groups who wished to maintain the former system.

By the last half of the 19th century the Pennsylvania Mennonites and their daughter colonies to the west had accepted the public school system and were no longer maintaining private schools. Later immigrants, however, such as those who came to Lee County, Iowa, from Germany, established their own school in 1853. The subjects taught in the seven-month term included the catechism, singing, reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, and nature study. Instruction was given in both English and German. At one time there were three of these parochial schools in Lee County and one in Washington County. One of these was continued until shortly before World War I.

Another pioneering experiment in elementary parochial education was launched by the Amish in Iowa when they organized the German School Association of the Old Order Amish (q.v.) in 1890. Although their schools placed much emphasis upon learning German and the catechism, several of the elementary subjects were taught both in the summer and in the winter terms.

When the Mennonites from Russia settled on the western plains in the 1870's they established the kind of elementary schools that they had been accustomed to in Europe. This was possible because there were well-trained teachers among the immigrants. Their first schoolhouse in Kansas was a sod house in Gnadenau, in which Johann Harder taught during the winter of 1874-75. Besides teaching the usual elementary subjects, these early instructors taught German, Bible history, and the Mennonite catechism. Although the public schools soon began to offer competition to their church elementary schools, their numbers increased down to the time of World War I. In the 1898 meeting of the Western District Conference (GCM), it was reported that their committee on education had received reports from 42 schools. There were seven others from which reports were not received. In the conference of 1915 it was reported that questionnaires had been sent to 60 schools in the district. The demand for trained teachers led to the development of preparatory schools and eventually colleges among the General Conference Mennonites. The German Teachers' Association (q.v.) and the German Teachers' Institute were outgrowths of this educational program. The 1903 Institute, for example, had an attendance of 57. Eventually the competition of the public schools and the dropping of the German language brought about the abandonment of the system of private elementary schools, so that by 1954 only a very few remained.

Soon after most of the General Conference Mennonite elementary schools had been discontinued, the Mennonite Church (MC) and the Conservative Amish Mennonites launched a program of building elementary schools. The first of these was the Mennonite Private School, started at Dover, Del., in 1925. From there the movement spread to Pennsylvania (1938), Virginia (1941), Ohio (1944), Arkansas (1944), Tennessee (1944), Idaho (1945), Florida (1946), New York (1948), Oregon (1948), Arizona (1949), Illinois (1950), Indiana (1950), and Michigan (1953). In the school year 1955-56 there were 86 of these elementary schools, in which nearly 5,000 children were enrolled in the first eight grades. The disappearance of the isolation which Mennonite communities had earlier enjoyed, the tendency of public schools to become completely secular, the realization that certain standards, such as nonresistance and nonconformity to the patterns of a worldly society, were endangered by the public schools, and in some instances a reactionary approach that tried to stop all changes, were in part responsible for this vigorous new movement that was still advancing in 1954.

When Pennsylvania Mennonites migrated to Ontario in the early 19th century, they took the private school pattern with them. Benjamin Eby, leader and bishop in the early Waterloo County settlement, not only taught such a school but wrote his own Neues Buchstabir- und Lesebuch, first published in 1839 and often reprinted, also a Fibel.

One of the chief reasons why Mennonites from Russia settled in Manitoba in 1874 ff. was that here they were granted complete school autonomy, a privilege which they enjoyed without interruption until 1883. During those years they established their own German private elementary schools, supported by village taxes. They regarded these schools as the "nursery of Christianity" and guarded their privileges zealously. Although at first these Mennonite schools were as good as or better than the public schools of the province, in time they became stagnant because of the growing shortage of well-trained teachers. Progressive elements in the settlements wanted the better schools which public tax money could afford. As a result the school problem became a most serious one in the Mennonite settlements, producing not only intragroup conflict but also conflicts with the provincial regulations designed not only to improve the quality of education but also to impose an English-Canadian culture upon the Mennonites. In the end the Mennonites lost their battle and those conservative groups, the Old Colony Mennonites, who refused to surrender, retreated to Mexico and Paraguay, where they were privileged to establish their own elementary school system. In 1922-24 some 5,000 Manitoba Mennonites settled in Mexico and in 1926-27 some 1,700 in Paraguay. Some of them, however, solved their problem for the time being by moving into Canada's Far North, where public schools have not been organized, and where they are again allowed to carry on their own elementary schools.

The thousands of Mennonite refugees from communist Russia who also settled in Paraguay after World War I and again after World War II have established their own schools. Twelve thousand Mennonites in Paraguay were living in 138 villages in 1950. In these villages 2,330 Mennonite children were enrolled in 94 elementary schools. In 1951 the Mennonites in Brazil had at least one elementary school and in 1950 the Mennonite refugees recently settled in Uruguay had one such school. Elenchus (Refutation). Two Latin polemics against the Anabaptists appeared in the 16th century with this Greek word in the title: Zwingli's In catabaptistarum strophas elenchus (Zürich, 1527), and Hendrik Anthonieszoon van der Linden's (Antonides, q.v.) Elenchus Anabaptisticus (1576).

Eleutherobios, Stoffel and Leonhard, two 16th-century humanists from Upper Austria (Linz and Wels), whose real name "Freisleben" they translated according to the humanistic fashion of the day into Greek ("Eleutheros" means "frei," i.e., "free"; "bios" means "Leben," i.e., "life"). They belonged to the circle around Bünderlin (q.v.), with interests both in the Anabaptist way of life and the world of the "spiritual reformers" (like Hans Denck and Sebastian Franck). They were active in the 1520's. Later they drifted into other directions, mainly Catholic. Their influence upon Anabaptist thinking can be traced in many Anabaptist tracts, mainly where humanist scholarship was needed (church history).

1. Christoph (Stoffel) Freisleben in the records sometimes called the "schoolmaster of Wels." He had some humanistic education, most likely at the University of Vienna, was then a follower of Erasmus, and also had some correspondence with the latter. In his religious life he went through all stages: Catholic, Lutheran, Zwinglian, Anabaptist, and again Catholic. In Austrian court records of the 1520's (Nicoladoni, 208) we hear that he was "the beginner and leader" of an Anabaptist group in Wels, Upper Austria, and that also his wife, son, and daughter belonged to this brotherhood. It is most likely that he was won by Hans Hut, who in 1527 was most active all over Upper Austria, and who had also baptized his brother Leonhard (Nicoladoni, 31-33). He now began an intensive activity himself between Linz, Wels, and Passau. Around the turn of 1527-28 Stoffel left his home, perhaps together with Bünderlin, and went to Bavaria and beyond. In 1528 he had a book of his printed in Strasbourg, entitled Vom wahrhafften Tauff Joannis, Christi und der Apostlen/ Wann und wie der Kindertauff angefangen und eingerissen hat/ Item wie alle Widerreden der Widerchristen wider den Tauff sollen verantwortet werden./ (15 leaves, 4°). (A copy of the 1528 edition may be found in a Sammelband of the University of Utrecht; a copy of the second edition of 1550 is found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library.) It was a book much read among the Anabaptists, supplying them with good arguments, both historical and otherwise, against infant baptism, in this respect almost equaling Hubmaier's tracts on the same subject (excerpts in Rembert, 469-71). Thomas of Imbroich (q.v.) quotes it and in handwritten form we find it in no less than five Hutterite codices. A careful study proves that it was of definite Anabaptist character. The fact that another print was necessary in 1550 (when its author no longer cared for his earlier work) shows its continuing popularity among the brethren.

In 1530, Stoffel had found his way back to the Catholic Church; he taught the school of St. Mauritius in Augsburg. Later he returned to Vienna, where he became a syndicus of the University, and in 1547 an official of the bishop of Vienna, said to have been the very soul of the latter's government.

2. Leonhard (Linhart) Freisleben, his brother, in the records sometimes called "the schoolmaster of Linz." Like his brother he must have had some humanistic education (Vienna?); in 1524 he published a German translation of Bugenhagen's (q.v.) Latin booklet, Was und welches die Sünde sei in den Heiligen Geist . . . die nicht vergeben wird, . . . (Nicoladoni, 13-14). Three years later he also joined the Anabaptists. He admitted later on that Hans Hut (q.v.) had baptized him and his wife at Hut's lodging in Linz, in 1527. Soon hereafter we find him in Regensburg, now baptizing and preaching in genuine Anabaptist fashion. On Nov. 15, 1527, he, his wife, and his sister stood before the Regensburg authorities and made a full confession. Afterwards he was expelled from that "Free City," but his later fate is not known. Most likely he followed the steps of his brother. NEFF, R.F.

Elfregi, a Dutch youth association founded Dec. 27, 1929, at Zaandam, Dutch province of North Holland, composed of the Mennonite catechumens of the whole Zaan district. A clubhouse at Zaandam was obtained in 1931; besides this, church services for the youth were organized in September 1932 and meetings were held in the Broederschapshuizen (q.v., brotherhood homes) of Elspeet and Schoorl. In 1945 the association was reorganized, becoming a Mennonite scout organization, which now has sections at Zaandam-Wormerveer, Haarlem, Amsterdam, and Groningen. The name Elfregi symbolizes the contacts of the three Mennonite brotherhood homes and camping centers which existed when the Association was founded, Elfregi being formed of the first syllables of Elspeet, Fredeshiem, and Giethoorn. The total membership in 1954 numbered about 400. vdZ.

Elgersma, Franciscus (1625-1712), Dutch Reformed minister of Oudkerk 1650, Leeuwarden 1652, Oudeschoot 1661, and Grouw after 1669. He was an ardent opponent of the Mennonites, whom he attacked both orally and in writings. In 1683 he charged Foecke Floris (q.v.), the Mennonite preacher of Surhuisterveen who had preached in Grouw, with the heresy of Socinianism (q.v.); when the States of Friesland did not take action against Foecke, Elgersma published a book dedicated to the States of Friesland, Rechtzinnige Leere van het Sacrament des H. Doops . . . teegen Socinianen, Papisten, Mennisten en andere Dwaalgeesten (Leeuwarden, 1685) and Kanker der Sociniaansche Ketterye (Leeuwarden, 1688). Foecke answered his antagonist by Beschermingh der Waerheyt Godts, of Schriftuyrlijcke Verantwoording (Leeuwarden, 1687). Thereupon Elgersma published Seedige Verhandeling van de hooge Verborgentheit der H. Drieeenigheid (Leeuwarden, 1689). Then Elgersma was attacked by the anonymously published (the author was probably C. Stapel, q.v.) Klaar vertoog, Dienende tot Wederlegginge van de ongefondeerde Beschuldigingen door Franc. Elgersma . . . tot last van Foeke Floris en andere Christenen, die hy Socinianen noemd (1689, n.p.). Meanwhile Foecke was arrested at Leeuwarden (1687), and banished from the province of Friesland (1688), but Elgersma, not satisfied that his enemy had been expelled, continued to warn about him and his pernicious doctrines in a Reformed Synod of 1689. Elhorst, Hendrik Jan, b. Oct. 29, 1861, at Wisch in the Dutch province of Gelderland, the oldest son of W. F. G. L. Elhorst and Jacomijntje van der Ploeg, who belonged to an old family of Mennonite ministers; d. March 20, 1924, at Amsterdam. He attended the Gymnasium at Deventer and studied at the university and the Mennonite seminary in Amsterdam 1880-86, became a ministerial candidate in 1886, and served as minister in Irnsum (Friesland) 1887-88, Arnhem 1888-98, The Hague 1898-1900, and Haarlem 1900-6. He then accepted a position as professor of Hebrew and other Semitic languages, Old Testament exegesis, and Hebrew literature in the University of Amsterdam 1906-24. He received the degree of Doctor of Theology from the University of Amsterdam (1891) and an honorary degree from St. Andrew's University (1911), was a member and editor of the Teyler Theological Association, and was one of the founders and editors of Teylers Theologisch Tijdschrift.

Of his publications the following should be mentioned: De Profetie van Micha (1899), and Israel in het licht der jongste onderzoekingen (1906). He also wrote articles for Dutch and foreign periodicals. (DJ 1925, 21-32, with portrait; ML I, 551 f.) M.L.D.

Elida, Ohio, is a town of 550 inhabitants seven miles northwest of Lima in Allen County. The first Mennonite church in the vicinity was organized in 1841. There are now three Mennonite (MC) congregations in this area, with a combined membership of approximately 450. The Central church is located in Elida, the Salem church three miles northeast of Elida, and the Pike church three miles west of Elida. J.B.S.

Elim Bible School was established in 1929 in Gretna, Man., to meet an urgent need of the Bergthal and Blumenort Mennonite churches of southern Manitoba. The school functioned for two years. It was again opened in 1936. In 1940 it was moved to Altona and a board of directors was elected of eight conference (GCM) churches and one independent. It is a member of the Evangelical Teacher Training Association, and stresses an evangelical teaching along Mennonite principles. In 1953-54 there were five teachers on the staff, A. A. Teichroeb serving as principal, and the enrollment was 107. The Bible school plant consists of a modern four-room school with separate dormitory facilities for girls, boys, a principal's residence, and a teachers' residence. H.J.G.

Elim Gospel Beach, a beautiful retreat ground and summer resort, including 260 acres of ground and 60 acres of water located at the north end of Lac Pelletier, about 26 miles southwest of Swift Current, Sask. The beach is owned and operated by the Mennonite Youth Society (GCM) of Saskatchewan, with the head office at Rosthern, Sask. Elim Gospel Beach offers a quiet place for rest, spiritual worship through retreats, Gospel services, and missionary and Sunday-school conventions. It has an auditorium, restaurant, refreshment booth, and cabins. J.P.L.

Elim Mennonite Brethren Church, located at Kelstern, Sask., a member of the Herbert District Conference, was organized in 1910 under the leadership of Peter Penner, in whose home the church meetings were held at first. From 1911 to 1918 worship services were held in the newly built Queen Centre school. In 1918 the congregation built its own meetinghouse. The 1955 membership was 54. Following Penner, the leaders were Jacob Mueller, Gustav Ewert, Paul Koop, Jacob J. Knelson, Abram J. Redekopp, John G. Redekopp, and (1955) J. H. Kehler. J.I.R.

Elim Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Gruenthal, Man., composed largely of Mennonite immigrants from Russia in 1923-26, was organized on Feb. 27, 1927. The members live in the villages of the Old Colony Mennonites who emigrated to Mexico. The central church is located in Gruenthal. There are three additional places of worship. In 1955 the congregation had 250 members and was served by Elder J. J. Enns, two ministers, Abraham H. Froese and Heinrich A. Warkentin, and two deacons, Abraham Driedger and Jacob Woelke. There are two Sunday-school classes, a youth organization, and two sewing circles. J.J.E.

Elisabeth (Elysabeth) Bruyne, an Anabaptist martyr, wife of Janne de Snydere, was burned at the stake at Brussels on May 5, 1571, together with her husband. Elisabeth (Lijsbeth or Lijsken) Dirks, an Anabaptist martyr, perhaps the first Mennonite deaconess (q.v.), was drowned on May 27 (not March, as van Braght erroneously states), 1549, at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland. As a child she had been taken to Tienge, a convent near Leer in East Friesland, Germany. At the age of 12 she was profoundly impressed when she heard that a heretic had been burned for repudiating the sacraments. She managed to get a Bible and as she read it she became more and more doubtful of the doctrines of the Catholic Church. She was later imprisoned for a year on a suspicion of heresy, but on the petition of the nuns she was released and kept under constant supervision, until she fled disguised as a milkmaid. She went to an Anabaptist home in Leer, and joined the brotherhood there. Later she was in Leeuwarden, in the home of an Anabaptist woman by the name of Hadewijk (Hadewych, q.v.), the widow of a man who had had to beat the drum at the execution of Sikke Frerichs (q.v.) to prevent his addressing the crowd. Because he expressed his horror at the execution and his sympathy for the martyr, whom he had known as a friend, he had to flee and was never heard of again. The two women lived together quietly. Elisabeth apparently was much with Menno Simons, for she was mistaken by her captors to be his wife. On Jan. 15, 1549, the women were arrested. Hadewijk escaped and lived to an advanced age in Emden. Elisabeth was cross-examined and gave a moving testimony of her faith. In spite of terrible torture she neither recanted nor betrayed the names of the brethren. A song was written on her death beginning "Twas een maechdeken van teder leden Elisabeth dat was haren naem." It has 21 stanzas and is found in the Het Offer des Heeren (1562), and also in the Ausbund, No. 13. She is said to have composed a song, which was included in Sommige Stichtelycke Liedekens (Hoorn, 1618), but this song has as yet not been identified. NEFF.

Elisabethtal, a village of the Molotschna settlement in the Ukraine, volost of Gnadenfeld, province of Taurida. It was founded in 1823, had about 5,000 acres of land, and in 1913 a population of 436. The elementary school was attended by 52 children. The inhabitants were members of the Pordenau Mennonite Church (q.v.), who with the Flemish branch opposed the merger of the Flemish and Frisians in the 1820's as well as any other innovation (such as the Ohrloff Zentralschule and the Bible Society). Concerning the fate of the village and the congregation under the Soviet government, see Molotschna Settlement, Collectivization, Concentration Camps. (ML I, 552.) C.B.

Elizabethtown, a borough of 5,000 in northwestern Lancaster Co., Pa., was laid out by Barnabas Hughes in 1753 and named in honor of his wife, Elizabeth. The Harrisburg-Lancaster Pike, built in 1805, passed through the town, thus bringing the stage coaches and the six-horse Conestoga wagons. With Lancaster, Harrisburg, and Lebanon 18 miles away, the town was a prosperous trading center. A variety of industries, the State Crippled Children's Home to the north, and also the Elizabethtown (Church of the Brethren) College on the east side, make it a prominent, prosperous, and clean town for retired Mennonite farmers. The Elizabethtown (MC) Church was established here in 1905, with 223 members in 1953, and there are five other old established congregations in the vicinity, viz., Good's, Bossler's, Risser's, Strickler's, and Stauffer's, in addition to several mission stations, with a total of ca. 900 members more. I.D.L.

Elizabethtown Mennonite Church (MC), located in western Lancaster Co., Pa., is a member of the Lancaster Conference. In 1905 a meetinghouse was built in town, where a number of retired Mennonite farmers had settled. A revival meeting followed with 125 confessions. A young people's Bible meeting was organized in 1911. The congregation in 1955 numbered 225. Noah W. Risser and Clarence E. Lutz were bishops, John W. Hess and Walter D. Keener, Jr., the ministers, and Walter D. Keener deacon. I.D.L.

Elk Run Brethren Church, located on the Leaksville Road four miles southwest of Luray, Page Co., Va., was a preaching point once a month for the Mennonites (MC) during the last half of the 19th century. H.A.B.

Elkhart, Ind. (pop. 35,000), a leading commercial and railroad center in northwest Elkhart County, 100 miles east of Chicago, founded in 1832, seat of the Prairie Street Mennonite Church, the oldest city congregation of the Mennonite Church (MC), established in 1871 (two daughter churches have since been established in the city, in addition to two U.M.C. congregations). Elkhart achieved importance as a strong center of life and activity for the Mennonite Church (MC), first through the establishment here of the Mennonite Publishing Company (q.v.) by John F. Funk in 1867, which was the publishing center for the M.C. until 1908, then through the establishment of the headquarters office of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities in 1892. From here the first foreign missionaries of the church were sent out in 1898 (to India), and here the first church school was established in 1894 as Elkhart Institute, which was moved to Goshen in 1903 to become Goshen College. Elkhart is also the seat of the Bethel Publishing Company and Bookstore, the publishing agency of the United Missionary Church. H.S.B.

Elkhart County, Ind., the center county in the northern tier of Indiana counties on the Michigan border, is the seat of one of the largest concentrations of Mennonite and Amish populations east of the Mississippi. The total of 43 organized congregations with nearly 8,800 members is distributed as follows: M.C., 17 churches with 4,200 members; U.M.C., 10 churches with 1,400; O.O.A., 7 churches with 600; G.C.M., 3 with 700; C.A.M., 2 with 425; O.O.M., 2 with 250; A.M., 2 with 250. Expansion into Lagrange County on the east and St. Joseph County on the west has added 28 additional churches, to make a total of 71 with 11,000 members (1953). Two large O.O. Amish settlements with a total of 2,300 members are included in the above figures, the larger being that east of Goshen and reaching well into Lagrange County with 1,600 members in 23 congregations.

The first Mennonite settlers came from eastern Ohio in 1845, locating west of Goshen in the Yellow Creek district. The first Amish contingent arrived in 1841, locating east of Goshen in Clinton Township.

The county has been the scene of several schisms: (1) the Old Order (Wisler) Mennonite of 1871 west of Goshen; (2) the Brenneman (UMC) of 1874 in the same area; (3) the Progressive Amish vs. Old Order Amish, east of Goshen about 1860-65; (4) the Central Conference group in 1892 at Silver Street; (5) the similar schism in 1924 at Nappanee, Middlebury, Topeka, and Goshen; (6) the Burkholder Amish in 1948.

The county since 1894 has been the seat of Elkhart Institute-Goshen College and of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (MC) since 1892. It has always been a strong center of Mennonite life and influence. H.S.B.

Elkhart Institute (1894-1903), the forerunner of Goshen College, was a secondary school established at Elkhart, Ind., by an unofficial group of laymen and ministers to offer educational opportunities to the young people of the Mennonite Church (MC). During the first year, Aug. 21, 1894, to June 4, 1895, it was a small proprietary school owned and operated by Dr. H. A. Mumaw, a Mennonite physician with a strong interest in education, and conducted in the G. A. R. Hall in downtown Elkhart. The enrollment was small, chiefly of short-term students (10-20 weeks) securing training in commercial subjects and a review of elementary school subjects for prospective teachers' examinations, although the high-sounding name, Elkhart Institute of Art, Science, and Industry, promised much more.

The real history of the school began with the transfer of the school from proprietary to corporate ownership on May 16, 1895, when the Elkhart Institute Association (q.v.) was incorporated to take over the school and continued to operate it at Elkhart to 1903, then in Goshen as Goshen College to 1906, when it turned over the school to the newly organized official church agency, the Mennonite Board of Education.

After a period of weakness (1895-98), during which the principals (four of them in succession), much of the small staff, and most of the small student body were non-Mennonite and the program of the school was poorly defined, N. E. Byers, B.A., a Mennonite from Sterling, Ill., became the principal. Byers reorganized the school, established it on a sound academic basis, and led its development into a junior college (1903) and finally a senior college (1908). J. S. Hartzler, a preacher of Topeka, Ind., was the other strong figure in the school, along with the president of the board, preacher-evangelist J. S. Coffman. Lewis Kulp, treasurer of the board, early business manager and financial supporter, was a strong asset. C. Henry Smith, who came in as teacher the same year as Byers (1898), was an important faculty member. Other important teachers were D. S. Gerig (1900-3), E. J. Zook (1901-3), J. W. Yoder (1900-2), and W. K. Jacobs (1899-1903).

The academic program included Latin-Scientific (College Preparatory), Seminary (3-year course), Commercial, Bible, and Normal curriculums, plus a summer school from the beginning and a special Bible Term (six weeks in the winter beginning in 1898). The teachers in the Bible Term were S. G. Shetler, Daniel Kauffman, J. S. Coffman, A. D. Wenger, and George R. Brunk. The student body grew more rapidly beginning about 1900, reaching a peak of 245 in 1902-3, including the Summer Session and Special Bible Term (Academic 134, Commercial 59, Bible 52). A total of 73 certificates of graduation were issued: 23 commercial, 6 Bible, 12 Normal, and 32 Latin-Scientific and Seminary. The Latin-Scientific course actually included about the equivalent of first year college. A considerable number of the Latin-Scientific and Normal graduates went on to advanced college, university, and professional study to become leaders in various fields (1900, S. F. Gingerich; 1901, I. R. Detweiler, F. S. Ebersole, C. E. Bender, J. M. Kurtz, John Umble; 1902, W. B. Christophel, G. J. Lapp, A. B. Rutt, O. C. Yoder, D. B. Zook; 1903, S. T. Miller). Among the outstanding Bible graduates were A. J. Steiner and I. W. Royer of 1900, Mrs. J. A. Ressler (Lina Zook) of 1901, and I. R. Detweiler of 1902. An Alumni Association was organized in 1901 (now the Goshen College A.A.) composed of all those who completed a course of two years or longer.

The first and only building of the Institute was dedicated Feb. 22, 1896, located on South Prairie Street almost opposite the Mennonite meetinghouse. The school had no other campus than the lot on which the building stood. The need for space for expansion led to the search for a new location which culminated in the move to Goshen in 1903 as the result of an attractive financial offer, with the condition that the name become Goshen College.

From 1898 on the school had an active student life with a strong religious and Mennonite emphasis, and many of the student activities and organizations (Y.P.C.A. and literary societies, for instance) which played such a vital role in the later Goshen College were established in the old Institute.

The Elkhart Institute pioneered in a great movement of education in the Mennonite Church (MC) which has now become a powerful force in the life of the denomination with three colleges, ten high schools, a theological seminary, and two schools of nursing. It had to face much opposition and misunderstanding, since the great majority of the church was opposed to it, although the two local Indiana-Michigan Conferences (Mennonite and Amish) and the General Conference endorsed it in the period 1898-1902. Those who fought the battle for education in these early days, board members, faculty and staff, and students, deserve much credit. Chief among them, without whom the enterprise would probably not have succeeded, were J. S. Coffman, N. E. Byers, and J. S. Hartzler. H.S.B.

Elkhart Institute Association, a stock company incorporated in the state of Indiana May 16, 1895, with 15 original stockholders, for the purpose of owning and operating a Mennonite school in the city of Elkhart, Ind., specifically to take over the Elkhart Institute from its owner, Dr. H. A. Mumaw. The original capital stock was $10,000, later raised to $25,000. The Association elected a board of directors of nine members which carried on the work of the Association. The first president was Dr. H. A. Mumaw, the secretary A. C. Kolb. J. S. Coffman was the president from 1896 to his death in 1899, followed by M. S. Wambold 1899-1902, and John Blosser, 1902-6. J. S. Hartzler was secretary 1896-1906, and Lewis Kulp treasurer 1898-1904. In 1901 the board of directors was enlarged from 9 to 25, selected from the various conference districts of the Mennonite Church throughout the United States and Canada; previously the membership had been largely local of Elkhart and Northern Indiana. In 1903 the Association moved the school to Goshen, renaming it Goshen College, although the corporate name remained unchanged. In 1906 the Association turned over all its assets to the Mennonite Board of Education, organized in that year as the official educational corporation of the Mennonite Church (MC), although the Association was not legally dissolved until Oct. 16, 1911. Thus what had originally been a local self-appointed group of interested persons in northern Indiana developed finally into a nation-wide official church board. The men of the Association were the pioneers who for eleven years carried the burden and opened the way for Goshen College with its highly significant contribution in educational leadership and service to the Mennonite Church (MC). Elkhart-Lagrange County (Ind.) Old Order Amish Settlement, now (1955) consisting of 24 districts with a membership of ca. 1,850, was founded in 1841 by settlers from Somerset Co., Pa., and Holmes Co., Ohio, who settled first in Clinton Township about 5 miles east of Goshen, then in Newberry Township in Lagrange County, about 15 miles farther east. The first preacher was Joseph Miller, one of the very first settlers, who was ordained bishop in 1848. The second preacher was Isaac Schmucker from Holmes Co., Ohio, who arrived the same year and was ordained as the first Amish bishop in Indiana (1843). The settlement has spread eastward until it now occupies an almost solid block 12 x 25 miles. In the early 1860's a split occurred between the Old Order and the more progressive elements. The latter group began to build meetinghouses and ultimately formed a part of the Indiana-Michigan Amish Mennonite Conference, 1888-1915, organized chiefly in the Clinton Frame and the Forks congregations. About 1855 another Amish group from Fairfield Co., Ohio, settled near Topeka (Maple Grove congregation), joining the progressive conference group.

In the 1890's another group broke off, forming the Griner Conservative Amish Mennonite group. In 1945 still another group broke off to form the Burkholder Amish Mennonite group. Today the descendants of the original Amish settlement constitute a total of at least 4,000 members in the area east of Goshen, of whom about 1,600 have remained true to the Old Order pattern, maintaining rigidly the older forms of worship, costume, and home life. They still use the Pennsylvania-German dialect, and rigidly reject modern conveniences such as automobiles, telephones, gasoline engines, and electricity. Next to the Holmes County (Ohio) and the smaller Lancaster County (Pa.) areas, it is the largest Old Order Amish settlement in North America.

The smaller Amish settlement around Nappanee, some 25-30 miles southwest of the Clinton settlement, has a different origin and has had little connection with the latter. H.S.B.

Elkton Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, located in Hickory Co., Mo., was established in 1868 by settlers from Berne, Ind., and a few from Wayne Co., Ohio. It participated in the sessions of the General Conference Mennonite Church in 1884, 1887, and 1890, but had died out by 1896. The leader of the settlement was the preacher P. S. Lehman from Berne, who continued to serve to the end, when he moved back to Berne in 1896. Some of the congregation moved to the Bethel Church in Morgan Co., Mo., others back to Berne. By 1910 practically no Mennonites were left in the settlement. M.G.

Ellenberger, a Swiss Mennonite refugee family living in the Palatinate as early as 1717. In that year Michael Ellenberger lived at Gönnheim and Hans Ellenberger at Branchweilerhof. In 1738 a Christian Ellenberger lived at Obersülzen. Christian Neff's Mennonitisches Adressbuch of 1936 listed Ellenbergers as members of the Friedelsheim congregation. Jakob Ellenberger (q.v., 1800-79) was a well-known minister of the Friedelsheim, Germany, Mennonite Church. His nephew Jakob Ellenberger (q.v., 1831-1901) served as minister in the Mennonite churches of Ibersheim, Eichstock, and Friedelsheim. Albrecht Ellenberger arrived in America Sept. 9, 1749, with a large number of Mennonite and Amish immigrants. Jacob Ellenberger, a cabinetmaker from Bavaria, settled in the Lee Co., Iowa, Mennonite community in 1847. Two years later he was chosen preacher by the Lee County church, although there is no proof he ever served in the office. A Mennonite Elder Henry Ellenberger, father of Jacob, moved into the community in 1850, where he served the church many years. The family is still represented in the Lee County Mennonite settlement. Adolf Ellenberger was the last minister of the Friedrichstadt Mennonite Church, Schleswig-Holstein; he emigrated to the United States, settling near Los Angeles, Cal. M.G.

Ellenberger, Jakob, minister of the Mennonite congregation at Friedelsheim, Germany, b. Oct. 18, 1800, at Gönnheim, Palatinate, d. Feb. 8, 1879, attended the pietistic school in Beuggen, Baden, 1824-29, taught the Mennonite children at Friedelsheim after passing his examination at the normal school at Kaiserslautern, was chosen preacher in 1832 and ordained at a conference at Weierhof by J. Molenaar of Crefeld, and served the Friedelsheim congregation with great blessing until his death. He helped to formulate the Palatine catechism, the Formularbuch, and the hymnal of 1832 and 1854. In addition he compiled the book of tunes (see Choral Books), and sponsored the development of singing in his church by organizing a men's choir. Both Jakob Ellenberger of Friedelsheim and Heinrich Ellenberger, preacher at Eppstein, received subsidies from the Amsterdam congregation. NEFF.

In 1872 he served the congregation at Eichstock, Bavaria, and from 1881 to the end of his life he worked with great success at Friedelsheim. His outstanding contributions are three volumes of Bilder aus dem Pilgerleben (1878, Ellert (Ellart) Jans, an Anabaptist martyr, a tailor of Woerden, Dutch province of South Holland, baptized by Gillis van Aken (q.v.), was executed by burning at the stake with five men and two women of the same faith at Amsterdam on March 20, 1549. He could have taken part in a successful escape, but declined because he had a wooden leg. He cheerfully went to the place of execution and talked to his cousin Jan Jans whom he met on the way, so that all that heard were amazed. Through the iron bars of his prison he handed his cousin his will, and admonished him to join the brotherhood of the cross. His cousin did so. His martyrdom is sung in the hymn which begins, "Tis nu schier al vervult ons broeders getal," in Veelderhande Liedekens (1566 and succeeding editions). NEFF, VDZ.

Ellice Township, Perth Co., Ont. Meetings (MC) were held here in a Mennonite home as early as 1854. J.C.F.

Elm Creek (Man.) Mennonite Brethren Church, located a few miles northeast of the town by that name, was organized in 1929 with 20 charter members and H. J. Wiebe as first pastor. In 1954 it had a new up-to-date meetinghouse, with 183 members and J. G. Wiens as pastor, and J. J. Funk as assistant pastor. H.NE.

Elm River Hutterite Bruderhof (Schmiedeleut), one mile west of Newton, Man., was founded in 1934 by Preacher Zacharias Hofer and ten families from the Rosedale Bruderhof near Elie, Man. They bought land and built houses and barns. Zacharias Hofer, who was born in Russia, died in 1936. In 1935 David Hofer was chosen minister. In 1947 the Bruderhof numbered 153 souls. D.D.

Elmira, Ont., a town of 2,800, is located in the northern part of Waterloo County about 12 miles north of Kitchener. Approximately 2,200 Mennonites live within shopping distance of the town. The various branches of Mennonites in the community are Old Order Mennonites, 60 per cent; Mennonites (MC), 35 per cent; and the Dave Martin group, 5 per cent. Elmira is centrally located in this Mennonite settlement, which also extends into Wellington County. Approximately 10 per cent of the Mennonites live in town or in the villages in the community. Mennonites have lived in the community since the early 1800's. The Elmira Mennonite (MC) Church (256 members in 1953) was established in the town in 1924. The Old Order Mennonite church at the edge of town has a total of over 400 members in two divided groups. H.S.BA.

Elmira Old Order Mennonite Church, formerly known as the West Woolwich Mennonite Church, is located at the western limits of the town of Elmira, in Woolwich Twp., Waterloo Co., Ont. Two acres were donated for church purposes about 1853 by Christian Schneider and a frame church was erected, which is still standing. A large cemetery adjoins the church. Two additions have been built to the church. The church, which seats 500, is often filled to capacity. In 1939 the church was divided. Since that time both groups have held regular church services in the building. One group drives horses; the other uses cars. Each group has a baptized membership of at least 200. The Elmira Mennonite (MC) group uses the old cemetery conjointly with the O.O. groups.

The first minister here was Peter Martin and the first deacon William Hembling. Other ministers were David B. Martin, Amos Gingrich, Jesse Bauman, Edward G. Martin, Amsey Martin, and George Brubacher. I.G.M.

Elmira Mennonite Church (MC), in Elmira, Woolwich Twp., Waterloo Co., Ont., a member of the Ontario Conference, was organized on Aug. 31, 1924, with Oliver D. Snider as minister. Deacons of the congregation include Reuben Dettwiler, 1929-34, and Aaron B. Martin, ordained in 1935. O. D. Snider was ordained bishop in 1936. Simeon W. Hurst of this congregation, who was ordained to the ministry in 1940, is now serving in Tanganyika, Africa. Others who were ordained within the congregation are Howard S. Bauman in 1945 and Osiah W. Horst in 1946 for the pastorate of the Latschar congregation. A number of members of the Elmira Church became charter members of the recently organized Bethel and Hawkesville congregations. In 1954 the membership was 264, with Howard S. Bauman as pastor. H.S.BA.

Elmspring (Tanny) Hutterite Bruderhof (Lehrerleut) established in 1929 near Warner, Alberta. In 1950 it had a population of 177, with Michael Entz serving as leading preacher.

Elmspring (S.D.) Hutterite Bruderhof was established in 1877 on the James River at Alexandria near Parkston, S.D., 65 miles northwest of Yankton, by 13 Hutterite families from Johannisruh, Ukraine, Russia, led by Jacob Wipf, a teacher and preacher. This was the last of the three original Hutterite colonies to be established in North America and is the one which with its descendant colonies or Bruderhofs has been called the "Lehrerleut," one of the three Hutterite subgroups. The development of daughter colonies was as follows: (1) in 1892 Rockfort Bruderhof, 6 miles north of Elmspring; (2) in 1900 New Elmspring, 3 miles southwest of Elmspring; (3) in 1910 Milford Bruderhof in Beadle County, 80 miles north of Elmspring. Due to persecution experienced during World War I a considerable number of families removed to Alberta in 1918, establishing there five Bruderhofs, viz., Milford (Raymond County) and Rockfort, Elmspring, and New Elmspring (all three in Magrath County), and Big Bend in Woolford County. In South Dakota, Milford and New Elmspring were closed, while Elmspring and Rockfort continued but in affiliation with the Schmiedeleut (q.v.). In 1955 the Lehrerleut had 30 Bruderhofs, 19 in Alberta, 8 in Montana, and 3 in Saskatchewan, with a total population of ca. 3,000 souls.

Joseph Hofer and Michael Hofer, the two Hutterite conscientious objectors who died in Alcatraz prison during World War I as a result of brutal treatment by the military prison officials, came from the Elmspring group. J.P.E., H.S.B.

Elmwood, a village in Grey Co., Ont., on the county line between Bruce and Grey, about six miles north of Hanover, was a location in which Mennonites (MC) were to be found from before 1870, when ministers from Waterloo County were sent to Brant Township every eight weeks to conduct services which alternated in the homes of Mennonite families living there. Before 1875 these families were losing members to the United Brethren Church. In 1875, when the Mennonite Brethren in Christ were organized in Ontario, Elmwood became one of their earliest places of worship. It was the village into which the retired farmers moved when they left the farms in that community. The M.B.C.'s first worshiped in private homes in the village and then in the U.B. Church. As the U.B. group lost out and the M.B.C.'s grew in strength, the U.B. church building was taken over by the M.B.C. group, whose work continued well into the present century. Then as Mennonite young people were attracted away from their homes, the M.B.C. membership decreased, until only a few members remained. In 1948 the church building was sold. This work was not far from the Mennonite settlements near Lake Huron—Brant Township, Hanover, and Port Elgin and Culross townships. From Elmwood many M.B.C. ministers, missionaries, and pioneers went to Alberta in the early 20th century. J.C.F.

Elmwood Mennonite Brethren Church, 155 Kelvin St., Winnipeg, Man., formerly North End Mennonite Brethren Church, 621 College Ave., Winnipeg, originated in 1907, when several brethren from Winkler, Man., under the guidance of the late John Warkentin, opened a mission in Winnipeg. In 1913 the Northern District Conference took over the mission, which by now had developed into a mission church. The membership in 1913 numbered 33; by 1926 it had risen to 60. In that year the membership doubled through immigration from Russia; in 1936 the membership was 550.

The first church was constructed in 1929. Originally the whole congregation met for worship at this North End meetinghouse, but the increase of membership and the housing and rental conditions made it expedient for the congregation to assemble at three different localities, North End, South End, and North Kildonan, where later on church buildings were either purchased or built. Besides these three groups in Winnipeg, the church at that time had affiliated rural branches in Springstein, Marquette, McAuley, Foxwarren, and Moosehorn-Ashern.

The larger groups gradually developed into independent churches. In 1936 the South End group was organized with a membership of 110, and in 1942 the Springstein group with a membership of 50. Until 1937 the city missionary was also entrusted with the leadership of the church. Since that year the congregation has had its leading minister, while the city missionary has been solely engaged in city mission work.

Because of need for more room and a more central location, the church voted on Nov. 22, 1953, to sell the church building on 621 College Avenue and build a new church at 155 Kelvin Street in the district called Elmwood, the name to be changed accordingly to "Elmwood Mennonite Brethren Church." The new meetinghouse seats approximately 1,100 persons, and has an educational building adjacent to it. The present (1955) membership stands at 420 with 13 ordained ministers and 4 deacons, with I. W. Redekopp serving as pastor.† I.W.R.

Elspeet, a village (pop. 1,500) in the Veluwe district, Dutch province of Gelderland. Two miles south of this village on a fine wooded plot are found the buildings of the Doopsgezind Broederschapshuis Elspeet (Elspeet Mennonite Brotherhood House). Its first simple building was opened on June 1, 1925. In course of time more buildings were added; in 1928 a chapel (capacity 200) was dedicated. During World War II the buildings, all built of timber on concrete foundations, were severely damaged; they have been restored. Besides camping grounds for youth, there are 72 rooms (about 200 beds). The Broederschapshuis Elspeet, followed by other such houses elsewhere, was built to lodge the meetings of the Vereeniging voor Gemeentedagen (q.v.) and its several subdivisions, and also for the youth conferences. In 1936 the Mennonite World Conference met here. It is also used as a recreation center, led by a Mennonite minister as a pater familias, where Mennonites and non-Mennonites may spend their holidays in a Christian atmosphere for moderate price. It is opened each year from about May until September. The first president of the Board of Management was J. Koekebakker, followed by A. H. van Drooge (q.v.) and C. Nijdam (q.v.). In 1953 the president was N. van der Zijpp. Mrs. M. Bennema-Feenstra (q.v.) was treasurer for nearly 25 years.

Elten, von, a prominent old Mennonite family in Crefeld, which is still flourishing there. Their progenitor, Gottschalk Dietrichs, was born in Cologne ca. 1580. In 1609 he purchased the estate "auf der Deusz" in München-Gladbach-Eicken, and was a wholesale dealer in yarn and linen. His son was Jan Gottschalks (q.v.) auf der Deusz. Jan's son Gottschalk Jansen von Elten lived later on in Rheydt, was expelled in 1694, and in the same year acquired citizenship in Crefeld. The second son of Gottschalk Dietrichs, Dietrich Gottschalks, went to Haarlem when the Mennonites were expelled from Gladbach, but in 1664 he moved to the Merxhof in Rheydt-Bonnenbroich, and was therefore called Dietrich Gottschalks Merx, and at least after 1681, also von Elten. His son Gottschalk Dietrichs von Elten or Merx bought the Kütges estate in Rheydt-Geneicken in 1684. Expelled in 1694, he betook himself to Wesel, but acquired Crefeld citizenship in 1697. He died April 18, 1707, in Wesel. In Rheydt the family has also continued the linen business. In 1694 all the Mennonites in and around Rheydt were suddenly arrested by Palatine commissars of the duchy of Jülich, taken to Jüchen and Pfaffendorf, and all their goods confiscated. Among the 40 persons seized, the two von Eltens were especially threatened; but in spite of threats of imprisonment and execution they could not be moved to recant. After days of misery the "heretics" were released upon payment of 8,000 Reichstaler in addition to 800 Reichstaler to cover the cost, which was raised by brethren in Crefeld and Holland (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1427).

Most of the families then, like the von Eltens, moved to Crefeld, where a place of refuge had been opened under the house of Orange for the persecuted, and laid the foundation for the prosperity of the city. The Mennonite congregation now felt itself strong enough to build an adequate church (1695); on Jan. 19, 1696, the first wedding was performed in it. William III of England, who belonged to the house of Orange, and the minister of the States-General furthermore induced the Palatine Elector to restore the confiscated and partly wasted Mennonite estates in 1697; the exiles were also permitted to offer their houses and other goods for sale. The proceeds made it possible for them to share in the extension (the first extension) of the city.

Concerning their expulsion, the Mennonites of Rheydt had a record made in Crefeld in 1696 by the notary Hermann Marthens in the presence of the mayors, Johannes Reiners and Johannes Bruckmann (as witnesses), which describes their sufferings. It was printed verbatim 107 years later in Crefeld with the title, Instrumentum Publicum wegen desjenigen, was bei denen Churfl. Pfaltzischen Herren Commissarien gegen die Protestante Menoniste zu Rheydt in Anno 1694 in facta vorgenohmen und sich zugetragen (24 pp.).

In the family chronicle, which has been carefully compiled by Friedrich von Elten (b. 1835), with the family trees of most of the older Crefeld Mennonite families, to whom the von Eltens are related, as the op den Graaf, Scheuten, von der Leyen, Jentges, von Beckerath, Cornelius Floh, van Dulken families, the reason for the persecution in Rheydt is also stated (according to an oral tradition from the 18th century): "The origin of this persecution I heard from a reliable source as follows: the flourishing linen business of the Mennonites there was coveted by the Reformed. The Mennonites gave money to the lord of Rheydt for protection and freedom from military service. The Reformed therefore had to render more guard and military service; therefore they sued their lord. The Mennonites would not contribute to the cost of the suit. All of this embittered the Reformed to such an extent that they besought the Palatine elector, their feudal lord, to persecute the Mennonites, as can be seen from their petition full of lies."

The von Elten family has successfully shared in the thriving linen and silk industry in Crefeld. Most of the branches of the family still adhere to the faith of their fathers, and several members are always active in the consistory of the Crefeld Mennonite Church.

In Rotterdam there have also been members of this family. Antony Godtschalck was before 1632 a preacher of the High German Mennonites in Rotterdam. The minister of the Flemish congregation here in 1672-85, Adam van Reed (Rheydt?), was married to his daughter Marytje Antheunis Godtschalck. Her brother Wouter Antoni van Elten was preacher of the same congregation, 1680-83. In the year 1683 he moved to Amsterdam, where he died Nov. 11, 1689.

Jan Godtschalcx, also called J. G. van Elten (q.v.), a weaver who moved from Gladbach to the Dutch town of Nijmegen in 1655, and Dierick Godtschalck, also a weaver, who migrated from the territory of Jülich to Nijmegen in 1657, obviously belonged to a collateral branch of this von Elten family.

Jakob Gottschalk (q.v.), elder of the Germantown congregation, whose Mennonite ancestors lived first in Gladbach and then in Goch, from where Jakob Gottschalk emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1701, though he and his family did not bear the name of von Elten, may have been members of the same family (MQR I, 1949, 35-47). Elten, Jan Godtschalks van (Jan Godtschalcx), rendered invaluable service to the Mennonite congregation at Nijmegen, in the Dutch province of Gelderland, which arose about 1635. In consequence of the decree of expulsion of Dec. 30, 1652, he had emigrated from Gladbach in the Jülich region with his family in 1654, and on April 11, 1655, became a citizen of Nijmegen. He was a weaver. On July 11, 1656, he was ordained deacon by Jan ter Mehr of Crefeld. For a period of more than 40 years he served by reading sermons to the congregation, and especially by his management of the church capital, so that it contributed much to the thriving growth of the congregation. Elze Quirijnsdochter, a revolutionary Anabaptist, who together with her husband Harman Henricxszn and others was taken prisoner at Amsterdam on July 18, 1540. Before this time she had been in Antwerp, Belgium. She was drowned on March 28, 1541, at Amsterdam. This group likely were followers of Batenburg (q.v.). During the trial she revealed that she had been taken in't verbont (into the union) of the Anabaptists by Cornelis van Schiltwolt, an otherwise unknown leader; she became a member not by baptism, but merely by laying on of hands. Emancipation, a legal term denoting the release of a child of the family from the father's control. Whereas the word kept its legal meaning until very recent times, it had already by 1700 become a political catchword and remained thus in many kinds of connections. At times it means release from oppressing injustices or prejudices that hinder progress.

After religion, especially the Christian religion, had in the course of history become closely connected with temporal government, it is proper to regard the Anabaptism of Central Europe as the first great attempt to emancipate religious life from the guardianship of the state. In England it was primarily the Anabaptist spirit in the Independent movement that carried on this emancipation struggle with great political consequences (see England). In that country there was also the further phenomenon that later furnished the typical case for a narrowed concept of "emancipation." The adherents of the Catholic faith were subject to oppression that the nation sought to justify. The Catholics had actually been disfranchised. Emancipation proceeded very slowly for them. The struggle for the emancipation of the Catholics in England is one of the most disturbed epochs of Parliament. The "Emancipation Acts" (Peel) of 1829 became the foundation of the legal recognition of the Catholics, though even today they do not enjoy complete freedom.

The political position of the Anabaptists or Mennonites in Central Europe was similar. Besides them, only the Jews occupied this status of differentiation. The omission of the Anabaptists from the several religious peace treaties of the 16th and 17th centuries was followed by a legal depreciation of the Mennonites. This was evident in various ways in the different political units. The most serious in its effect was the law of recession or ius retractus (q.v.) in the Palatinate, that could become a tool for the injury of the Mennonites by any person of another faith. The exclusion of Mennonites from public office was at first not thought of as oppression, since taking such offices conflicted with their old religious principles. But as these were gradually modified and the Mennonites were willing to assume such office, the prohibitive laws still blocked them. These restrictions were usually based on the principle of nonresistance (q.v.) and the rejection of the oath (q.v.). Likewise in the rise of constitutional government both the active and passive franchise of the Mennonites was questioned.

In the Netherlands, after the Calvinists had obtained the majority (about 1570), the Mennonites and other dissenters, as well as Catholics and Jews, had the political status of only "tolerated citizens." It was not till 1795 that they obtained full citizenship.

It must be stressed that the Mennonites never engaged in a public struggle for their political emancipation. To the extent that such a struggle existed, it was stirred up by the outside and compelled the Mennonites to defend themselves. On the contrary, the Mennonite achievements in economic lines and their advancement of the common good brought them recognition. From this consideration they were also led into politics. In this field several of their great men, such as Hermann von Beckerath (q.v.), who once warmly defended the political rights of the dissidents and the Jews, by their own character proved the harmlessness of the Mennonites for the state and made the greatest contribution to the emancipation of their coreligionists. Emblems. An emblem is a device, sign, or article associated with a person or truth; in Catholic piety, e.g., a carpenter's square is associated with Joseph; an eagle with the evangelist John and with Augustine. In Mennonitism the term has most frequently been used in connection with the bread and cup of the Lord's Supper, the expression most commonly being the "sacred emblems." In the Anabaptist-Mennonite tradition the bread and wine are symbols only, the doctrines of transubstantiation and consubstantiation being alike rejected.

In modern times the Mennonite Central Committee (q.v.) emblem has become familiar in Mennonite circles and in relief work—a circle within which is a cross with two clasped hands superimposed over it, along each side heads of grain, and over the cross a dove, together with the words, "In the Name of Christ." This symbol of peace, love, and service represents the concern to minister to mankind in the name of Christ and in response to His love which moves His children and disciples.

In the Netherlands youth groups like Menniste Bouwers (q.v.) have emblems; on the Dutch hymnbook of 1945, appear the symbols of Lamb and Sun (emblems of the former separated groups of Lamists and Zonists). The Mennonite congregation of Aardenburg (q.v.) has a seal which shows a lamb.

Emden, a seaport city (1950 pop. 36,762) of Lower Saxony, West Germany, on the Dutch border, largest city of East Friesland, the seat of a Mennonite congregation ever since early Reformation times. In the summer of 1530 Melchior Hofmann (q.v.) came to the city and united the Sacramentist elements that had been fleeing to Emden from the Netherlands. He must also have had some following among the Reformed clergy of the city, for he baptized about 300 persons in the Geerkammer (vestibule) of the Grosse Kirche. This bold deed attracted a great deal of attention. The authorities of the city and the province, both civic and clerical, prepared for energetic resistance. Hofmann left the city and went to Strasbourg (z. Linden, 256).

Before he left he installed Jan Volkerts Trypmaker (q.v.) to take his place. Trypmaker continued the work in the city and also sent out missioners. Two weeks before Christmas 1530 he baptized the martyr Sicke Freerks (Vos, 24), but soon had to leave the city because of increasingly severe measures against the Anabaptists. Exactly a year later he was martyred at Amsterdam. But the brotherhood in Emden continued. On May 12, 1534, Count Enno (q.v.) wrote a letter to the Emden authorities, urging a close watch on the Anabaptists, and ordering that they be arrested wherever found. Also Enno's stern mandates of 1535 and 1537 prove the presence of Anabaptists. Especially Dirk Philips (q.v.) must have worked here with considerable success. At Enno's death in 1540 their number was greater than before. His widow, Countess Anna (q.v.), gave them protection and toleration.

Menno Simons took advantage of this toleration to make a brief visit to Emden. During 1536-42 he spent some time in the near-by village of Oldersum. Johann a Lasco, the reformer of Emden, invited him to a debate, which was held with Anna's consent in the church of the Franciscan monastery in Emden, Jan. 28-31, 1544, before a large audience. Present were also the Reformed clergymen Gellius Faber and Hermann Brassius. The debate dealt with the Incarnation, infant baptism, original sin, sanctification, and the true calling of preachers. Both sides claimed the victory. A regrettable literary feud developed between Menno and a Lasco.

Menno soon had to leave the city. At the insistence of Charles V, Anna passed a mandate ordering all the adherents of a sect, especially the Anabaptists, to leave the city and province at once. A Lasco succeeded in having it limited to the Davidjorists (q.v.). Nevertheless Menno left and went to Cologne. His followers, the quiet Anabaptists, were unmolested. To be sure, to comply with the emperor's demand, the countess issued another severe edict on April 6, 1549, but it was not vigorously applied.

In 1547 a momentous meeting of the Anabaptist leaders was held in Emden. Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, Frans de Kuiper, Adam Pastor, Hendrik van Vreden, Antonius of Cologne, and Gillis van Aken debated the important doctrines of the Incarnation, infant baptism, and avoidance in marriage. Frans de Kuiper and Adam Pastor sharply opposed Menno and his friends, and finally left the brotherhood. Once more, in 1549, Menno was in the city to discuss matters with his opponents (Vos, 91, note 4).

Two years later, in 1551, Menno ordained Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) as elder in Emden. Bouwens lived in 't Falder (q.v.), a neighboring village. In 1551-54 he baptized 51 persons in Emden (City) and in 1556-82 another 360. Through his extreme severity on the question of the ban, he brought great trouble upon the brotherhood. When Zwaantje Rutgers, a pious woman of Emden (Vos, 132) of blameless conduct, did not want to give up companionship with her husband, who had been placed in the ban, Bouwens banned her. The others disagreed with this procedure. Letter after letter of complaint reached Menno; he wrote a conciliatory letter to Emden, urging peace.

The three-day colloquy to which the Reformed challenged the Mennonites in 1556 was held in Norden (Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 120). It dealt chiefly with the Incarnation.

In a letter of April 8, 1562, the Mennonite congregation at Dokkum requested Emden to assist them in obtaining a preacher. The request was presumably granted.

In 1567 Dirk Philips came from Danzig to Emden. Here he wrote a reply to Hoyte Renix and four letters to Jan Willems and Lubbert Gerritsz, the elders at Hoorn, summoning them to Emden to talk with them. When they did not comply, he commanded them in the fifth letter to "stand still" in their office until it could be determined whether they were guilty or innocent. In the same vein he wrote to the Hoorn congregation. When the congregation replied that they would not let their elder go to Emden, but that he should come to Hoorn, he sent a sixth letter to Jan Willems and Lubbert Gerritsz, demanding more positively than before that they lay down their office, threatening to put them out of the brotherhood if they refused to come. Hoyte Renix had obeyed the demand, but in return demanded that Dirk Philips come to Bolsward to prove his charges. When this did not happen, his congregation exonerated him, and he felt justified in resuming his office. Then four representatives of the churches in North Holland and five from Friesland came to Emden to settle the dispute. After being urged six times, Dirk Philips agreed to come to a border city in Holland to deal with his opponents and bring the matter to a decision. Meanwhile a meeting of the preachers in North Holland had been held, from which Jan Willems, Lubbert Gerritsz, Pieter Willems, and Bogaert and Hoyte Renix were sent to Emden. They met with the nine brethren on their return to Holland in Appingedam and decided to go to Emden together, in order to clear the matter there. But Dirk Philips did not wish to deal "with the crowd" and ordered only Jan Willems and Lubbert Gerritsz to come to him; they did not comply, whereupon Dirk Philips put them and their friends in the ban on July 10, 1567.

This led to a division in the Emden congregation into a Flemish and a Frisian group. The two parties at first opposed each other radically. There was absolutely no communion between them. The most sacred ties of family were broken by strife. Anyone who wished to join the other party had to be rebaptized. All attempts to unify them failed. On April 2 and May 22, 1578, a mutual offer of peace was made (DB 1893, 81), but it failed. The elder of the Flemish congregation at Emden about 1569 was Jan van Ophoorn. He was austere and implacable, and is reported to have banned the entire congregation except himself and his wife (BRN VII, 69 f.).

On Jan. 17, 1568, a meeting of Waterlander preachers was held at Emden, at which 21 points were agreed upon. It was the first meeting of this kind in this branch of the brotherhood. Points 1-7 deal with the elders and their work in the churches, 8-15 with preachers and deacons, and 16-20 with the bearing of arms, working for the churches, and marriage outside the brotherhood, and point 21 was an appendix on the regulation against lending money on interest (DB 67-75).

External pressure was added to internal strife. On Jan. 9, 1577, the mayor and the city council wrote a complaint to Edzard II (q.v.), saying that the Mennonites were doing a thriving business in the city, and that they were holding their meetings openly (Müller, 29). Edzard replied that all such preaching and meetings should be strictly forbidden. In February 1578 he wrote that Menso Alting had informed him that about 1,000 Anabaptists were coming from Holland, and that they should not be permitted to settle in Emden.

This warning was also occasioned by the large number of Mennonites from the outside gathered for the disputation of Emden from Feb. 25 to May 17, 1578, between the Reformed and the Mennonites. The leaders of the Flemish, Frisian, and Waterlander Mennonites from the Netherlands and Friesland were there. In 124 sessions they discussed 14 points of doctrine. It was peaceful in character, but did not lead to any practical results. An extensive report of the debate was published at Emden in 1579 with the title Protocol. Dat is, Alle handelinge des Gesprecks tot Embden. (See Emden Disputation.)

In the next year, April 3, 1579, seven representatives and preachers of the congregations at Rijp, Purmerend, Amsterdam, and Rotterdam gathered in Emden; a consequence of this meeting was the union of the Emden congregation with the Waterlander wing of North Holland (DB 1877, 79; Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 264-70). Under the influence of Hans de Ries (q.v.) an agreement was drawn up which breathes the spirit of true Christian generosity and brotherly love (Brons, 121). The assumption that Hans de Ries was the elder at Emden at that time is probably an error. He was there only temporarily, and did not serve as elder of the Emden congregation until 1592-98. The church had experienced a great influx of Waterlander Dutch refugees, and de Ries gave it valuable assistance in making the adjustment (DB 1863, 115).

Further growth of the congregation at Emden was prevented by severe repressive measures on the part of the government; the center of the Mennonites in East Friesland was shifted to Norden. Count Enno III (1599-1625) issued an edict on Nov. 21, 1612, prohibiting the Mennonites from exercising their religion in the open, and a mandate of Nov. 20, 1630, set a fine of 5,000 talers on any Mennonite worship services. For eight years the Mennonites remained quiet. Many may have left the city in the meantime. As usual, the prohibition ended in extortion. For a payment of 12,000 talers on Aug. 22, 1622, Enno granted the 400 Mennonites living in his realm the right of private worship services for a promised period of ten years. When this sum was not paid he issued a new edict on Sept. 25 depriving the Mennonites of all rights and protection.

His successor, Rudolph Christian 1625-28, finally gave the Mennonites a letter of protection, which became the basis for all future terms (Mitteilungen der Gemeinde Norden, 1914, 150 f.). But this was not the end of oppression. Again and again these rights were violated, until an additional payment was made. Rudolph Christian's successor, Ulrich II 1628-48, revoked all liberties granted the Mennonites on March 10, 1641. After further extortion they were restored by Enno Ludwig, 1651-60, in May 1658; but in 1666 Christine Charlotte, regent for the minor Christian Eberhard, forbade Mennonite worship. On Sept. 18, 1666, the Mennonites were summoned to give an account of their teaching, and two days later a fine of 30 gold guilders was set for Mennonite religious services. After lengthy negotiations the Old Flemish group received the desired letter of protection for the sum of 400 talers on Dec. 7, 1666, and the Waterlander group on April 2, 1667.

The Old Flemish or Uckowallists (q.v.; they were often called Mennonites, whereas the Waterlander group had since 1579 adopted the name Doopsgezinde) were a branch of Mennonites named after Ucko Walles (q.v.), who came to East Friesland from Groningen in 1637, from where he had been expelled, and is said to have lived in a village between Emden and Norden. He returned to Holland, was expelled again, and rented the land of the former monastery of Sielmönken in East Friesland until shortly before his death. He was the strictest of all the Mennonites, adhering to footwashing and a severe interpretation of the ban. A register of Mennonites in Emden and vicinity (Emderland) in 1644 shows 12 families belonging to this group. For a long time they met "outside the old New Gate," in the house (Wilhelmstrasse 11) now known as the "Uckenvermaning." Members of this Uckowallist congregation or Groningen Old Flemish congregation lived in Emden, Emderland (q.v.), and Norden (q.v.). This congregation in 1710 had a total of 65 men (the number of women is not given). In that year a friendly division took place, and henceforth there were two congregations—one at Norden, and one of Emden and Emderland. The Emden-Emderland congregation had 65 members in 1733, 70 in 1746, 44 in 1754, and in 1767 Emden had only 7 (Emderland apparently became independent between these dates). In 1739 the Uckowallist congregation acquired a new church. The preachers then were Myndert Waerma, Lourens Warners (from 1721), Pieter Popkes (from 1731). They were followed by Hendrik Waerma 1741-60. By 1767 it had been without a preacher for several years. On March 9 of that year it merged with the Waterlander congregation, sometimes also called the United Flemish and Waterlander congregation, or even United Frisian and Waterlander congregation. It is not clear whether the entire Flemish congregation adopted the strict convictions of Ucko Walles, or whether a part of this congregation acted independently and then later, perhaps soon after 1665, united with the Waterlander-Frisian congregation.

A strange division occurred on Oct. 22, 1692, in the Waterlander congregation. Jehring relates the following account: A preacher, Mindelt van der Stork, moved from Groningen to Emden "for business reasons." In preaching he had a silent prayer before the sermon and an audible one at its close. Soon he offered both of the prayers audibly. When the preacher in charge grew weak, van der Stork was requested to take his place for a small compensation, on condition that he offer the opening prayer silently again. He did not consent and the church council yielded the point. All this had taken place without the knowledge of the congregation, "which alone had the right to negotiate in such affairs." A meeting was held after the church service to ask the preacher why he had done this. He explained the situation and persisted in his view. The consequence was a split. The dissenters were called the "silent ones." The division lasted 40 years. In 1732 the group that had sided with the preacher joined the "silent" wing, sold its church, and gave all of its capital to the "silent" branch, which met "in the warehouse."

For 37 years more the congregation continued to meet here. Then they purchased a house on Hofstrasse and remodeled it into a church. The total cost amounted to 6,174 guilders, which the members obligated themselves and their children to pay according to a rate depending on income. In 1776 the church was free of debt. The new church was used for the first time on Jan. 26, 1770.

On Dec. 25, 1717, a flood devastated Emden, filling the church chamber with four feet of water. All the church records, which had been kept since 1582, were soaked and had to be replaced.

In 1739 the Mennonites were required to present to the government a record of births and marriages. Both groups entered their marriages on the same register.

In 1744 Prussia took possession of East Friesland. The Emden congregation was released from all special fees (the exact date is unknown) and no longer needed a letter of protection; it could now develop undisturbed. Its membership, however, remained small, declining no doubt through emigration. But at the same time its members were faithful and united, as is shown, for instance, by the numerous bequests and gifts made to the brotherhood.

For a long time church discipline was exercised earnestly and carefully. Thus on Jan. 19, 1643, the ministers of the congregation summoned a married couple to the church rooms and notified them that their conduct had created some offense in the congregation and that they had not kept their marriage vows. Thereupon they shook hands and promised to live as was fitting. Then the ministers prayed with them, asking that God might preserve them in evangelical discipline. On Jan. 24, 1772, a chorister (Vorsänger) was excommunicated for some misdemeanors and had to give up his apartment in the church buildings.

The Emden Waterlander congregation joined the Zonist Sociëteit in 1674 as soon as it was organized. All of the Emden ministers belonged to it; until most recent times they had all come from Holland. Some of them had studied in the Lamist Seminary and to some extent represented the more liberal point of view of this brotherhood. In 1702 Cornelius van Huyzen (q.v.) was confirmed in the ministry, and on July 28, 1709, he delivered a sermon in Altona on John 17:3, which resulted in his noted book, Historische Verhandeling van de opkomst en voortgang, mitgaders de Godgeleerdheijd der Doopsgezinde Christenen (Emden, 1712). In 1739 Cornelius van Campen became the preacher of the congregation. He was followed by Sjoerds Sijtses Hoekstra, who delivered his initial sermon on Nov. 17, 1757. For 30 years, until his death on Aug. 17, 1789, he faithfully performed the duties of the ministry. Under his leadership a new translation of the Psalms was introduced as a hymnal. On Oct. 10, 1771, he began to conduct Thursday evening meetings from November to February, for an increase of 25 guilders in his annual salary. These meetings were discontinued after 13 years because of lack of interest. From April to September, beginning in 1784, the regular Sunday services were held in the forenoon, and in winter in the afternoon. The duty of the chorister (Vorsänger) was defined thus: the first song was to be Psalm 37:1; then Psalms 1, 25, and 116 were to be sung; Romans 16 was then to be read. Relations with the Reformed Church were friendly. For the celebration of peace observed by the Reformed Church in 1779 the Emden Mennonite congregation made a considerable contribution.

After Hoekstra's death the Emden pulpit was vacant for three years. Four deacons, Tobias Bouman, Pieter Onne Brouwer, Jan Tobias van Oterendorp, and Ysaak Bouman, took care of the congregation during this time. A list of voluntary annual contributions begun at this time showed the amount of 356 florins. Then a contract for a preacher was drawn up (the contract is found in ML I, page 568 f., footnotes).

Of six proposed candidates, Wynald Ewertzoon, the preacher at Blokzijl, was chosen on Dec. 25, 1790; he refused the position even after a second offer with an increase of 1,000 florins in salary. The position was rejected also by the following preachers: Jansen of Campen, Hoekstra of Utrecht, and Rahusen of Altona. In 1792 Jan de Bleijker, a ministerial candidate of Utrecht, was chosen; he accepted, and on June 24, 1792, in the presence of the magistrate and numerous visitors from the city, he was inducted into his office by Hoekstra of Utrecht. But the hope of the Emden church now to have a capable preacher for an extended time was not to be realized, for in May of the following year de Bleijker was called to Helder and left Emden in spite of an offer of 100 additional florins and the omission of winter evening sermons.

His place was filled by Konrad Bavink, the minister of the Groningen congregation, who was installed by Pieter Beets (q.v.) in May 1795. In 1808, after eleven years of faithful service, he accepted a call to Nijmegen. Again the congregation was left for some years without a minister. Again a series of preachers refused the call to Emden: M. Martens of Holwerd, who preached for a while, ministerial candidate Plantinus, A. R. Vink of Winterswijk, Jan van Hulst of Norden, J. Goverts of Rijsdijk, J. van Hulst of Cleve. The congregation was in need of a competent minister, especially since the Reformed Church had some good ministers who attracted members of the Emden Mennonite Church. Finally, in March 1811, the congregation acquired a preacher—Hendrik van Someren Greve, who served for 15 years, until his death in 1826.

The congregation grew slowly. Whereas it had 74 souls in 1808, it had increased to 86 by 1814 (23 men, 18 women, 24 young men, and 21 young women). In 1834 the membership was 51. In 1860 it was 62, with a total of 106 souls. The levies for the support of the poor were high. The congregation spent almost 700 florins for members in need of support, and so for this reason it very definitely rejected the suggestion to assume the obligation to furnish money to young men of military age to pay for substitutes (May 28, 1816). Equally definite was the position of the congregation on the question of the oath in a statement handed to the magistrate of the city of Emden on Jan. 6, 1822, which says, "The church council, after taking the voice of the congregation on this matter and finding it in agreement with its own, considers the swearing of any oath in conflict with its principles, and therefore unpermissible and this on the basis of the requirements of Jesus Christ as found in Matthew 5:36-37, and James 5:12, at the same time supporting its position with the doctrine of various church fathers and honorable men after the time of Christ and on the general regard with which this opinion has been recognized by all governments here as well as in other countries through all ages. It must also be added that the upright, earnest declaration of the truth or promise of conscientious faithfulness, with the words 'Yea' and 'Nay'—the arbitrary misuse of which we consider equally punishable with perjury and thereby offer the state adequate security—is considered as completely satisfactory for the decision of important debated questions, as well as in the assumption of public office here (at least under French and Dutch authorities) as well as in neighboring Holland."

Also under Greve's successor, L. van Hulst of Norden, who was initiated on Jan. 10, 1827, in the Emden congregation, the congregation vigorously defended its legal position as well as its religious point of view. On Nov. 17, 1828, the congregation presented a petition to the magistrate of the city of Emden for an increase in the subsidy to the preacher's salary equal to that of the preachers of the other creeds, especially since all the creeds were considered equal and the Mennonites enjoyed equal rights with the others. This petition says:

"We take the liberty here to remark that we believe we have so much the more right to an equating also on this point because

"(1) We have no special educational institutions as have the other congregations of the city which draw contributions from the city treasury for their support and the pay of the schoolteachers.

"(2) Even though our congregation is not so large with respect to the number of persons as the Reformed and the Lutheran Church of the city, nevertheless, certain members of our congregation can make substantial contributions to the city taxes. A number of us have quite extensive communications as merchants. A number own important city real estate. These are conditions which are too well known here to require any extensive presentation so that we relatively pay just as much to the city expenses as other churches.

"(3) The endowment fund of our congregation is very small. The truly small salary of our minister of annually 700 Dutch florins, cannot even be met from the revenue of our endowment. The church members must make considerable contribution from their private funds for this purpose and in addition make further private contributions for the upkeep of the church building and to cover the support of impoverished church members."

The magistrate replied on Nov. 27 that he "could neither grant this petition himself nor recommend it to a higher office, since the constitution of the city of Emden in paragraphs 5, 27, 55, 57, and 58 by no means grants the Mennonite congregation equal rights with the three principal Christian confessions." In the reply of Dec. 4 the congregation insisted on its right and referred to a royal rescript of July 27, 1822, which expressly stated: "It shall be permitted to well-qualified members of the East Frisian Mennonite congregations to enter into public office to the extent that they can be admitted to administrative positions of the city (if they upon entering this service submit themselves to those regulations which the A.G.O. wishes to have observed with respect to the performance of oaths in affairs of private law), and that members of the Mennonite brotherhood shall in the future participate in the rights granted to all citizens of the principal creeds, with respect to their appearing in the meetings of the citizens and in active voting."

The church council of this congregation had obviously, with all the openness and the decisiveness with which it presented its position to the magistrate, already adapted itself to the circumstances of the established church. The council made a demand for support by the state equal to that which the ministers of the state church drew, whereas, as a matter of principle, the Mennonite brotherhood rejected all state aid. The same is evident in further negotiations with the magistrate of the city and with the government of the country.

An inquiry of the magistrate concerning the celebration of the third centennial of the signing of the Augsburg Confession was given the answer that they did not want to participate in the celebration. When the consistorium of the state church in Aurich asked for a statement of the differentiating tenets of faith, the East Frisian Mennonite congregations made a unanimous reply. The Emden congregation sent its document off in February 1831, which expressed itself briefly and definitely:

"1. That we have no creedal books like other religious parties, but only have the Bible as our regulam fidei (rule of faith).

"2. That on the whole we differ from other Protestants only on two points of doctrine; namely, with respect to baptism and with respect to the oath.

"To be sure, the idea that Christ had forbidden war service was formerly accepted and vigorously defended by all the Mennonites, and this may still be the case with some few individuals. In general, meanwhile, a thorough exegesis and free investigation has long since convinced the Mennonites that this their former position is by no means tenable. Our brethren in Holland have already for several decades and we in the last years clearly enough shown that we have given up this opinion and no longer differ from other Protestants therein." In this writing the principle of nonresistance was abandoned and the principle of brotherhood was not stressed.

A long-drawn-out struggle developed with the authorities in the matter of the political rights of the Mennonites of East Friesland. It was fought out together by the congregations of Emden, Leer, and Norden. In 1831 they presented a petition to the meeting of the estates in Aurich, asking for a change in the requirement that a deputy must be a member of one of the "three confessions."

In January 1832 a lengthy document composed by a jurist (Brückner) was sent to the government with the petition "that paragraph 30 of the constitution of the state be authentically declared to mean that we as members of the Evangelical Anabaptist brotherhood in East Friesland enjoy absolutely equal civic and political rights with the members of the Protestant and Catholic churches."

When the answer was long in coming they sought further legal counsel, and on March 2, 1848, they decided to send delegates, together with Norden and Leer, to Aurich to present this case. All in vain. In 1857 Consul Bernhard Brons was chosen as the delegate of the town of Emden to the second chamber, but he was rejected by the government because the Mennonites were not one of the recognized churches. It was agreed at a conference in Emden, that for the time being they would take no further steps of this sort until they had more favorable prospects with the government.

In 1863 a deputation was sent to the king, who was staying on the island of Norderney for his health. It was apparently successful. Soon afterward, on Sept. 18, 1863, the Norden congregation received upon its request of Aug. 10 of that year the very important government decision that it should be counted among those churches which had been explicitly accepted by the state (details in ML I, 570 f.).

The matter was, however, settled only on paper. When a member of the Mennonite congregation of Norden was elected to participate in the extraordinary session of the provincial states in November 1863 and admission was refused him as a Mennonite, the representatives of the three East Frisian Mennonite congregations met in Emden on April 15, 1864, and decided to present a petition to the assembly of the estates at Hanover; this was sent on April 25. The petition requested that the new constitution about to be drawn up should make a clear statement that members of the Mennonite churches were admittted to complete political equality with the other recognized Christian churches in the country. This petition was not successful. It was finally the government of Prussia that granted the Frisian Mennonites full civic equality. In 1866 East Friesland, which was under Dutch dominion 1807-10, and French 1810-13, again became a part of Prussia. On Sept. 7, 1900, the decisions of the Hanover government were set aside by the governor at Aurich, and the Mennonites were urged to secure the right of incorporation according to the Prussian law of June 12, 1874, relating to the Mennonites. This they did on Oct. 23, 1901. But civic equality did not give the Mennonites religious equality. When their preacher, Dr. J. P. Müller, in a dispute with the magistrate of the city insisted on his right as a clergyman, it was pointed out to him that as a Mennonite preacher he was not one of the clergy in the intention of the regulation of Sept. 23, 1867, and that the Mennonites could not claim complete equality with the Lutheran, Reformed, and United churches. Higher instances confirmed this decision. It was not until the great revolution of 1918 and the new German constitution of Aug. 11, 1919, that the Mennonites of Germany received full religious equality, with the rights of a public religious society.

Another law, unsought to be sure, secured to the Mennonites of East Friesland their membership in the Prussian state. When East Friesland was from Nov. 17, 1813, to Dec. 15, 1815, in Prussian hands, the Emden congregation in co-operation with Leer and Norden (without informing Norden of this step) asked for release from military service, obligating themselves not only to pay the customary protection fee, but also to show themselves grateful in other ways financially. Already on Dec. 17, 1815, Frederick William decreed that the East Prussian Mennonites, like other Prussian Mennonites, be released from military duty. The total sum of 46,060 talers was set, of which the Emden congregation was to pay 14,950 talers. In response to a petition the total sum was, however, reduced to 15,000 talers. But the East Frisian Mennonites were not to enjoy this release from military service for very long. Even before the end of 1815 they became citizens of Hanover. They made a special appeal for consideration and finally achieved an offer of release from military duties if they would pay the sum of 100 talers for each member of the congregation that was subject to military duty, whether he was rich or poor (July 15, 1817). The Emden congregation refused this offer, whereas Norden collected a sum for the purpose. On May 23, 1821, the special position of the Mennonites on the matter of military service was legally removed and henceforth they were treated like any other citizens. Then when East Friesland became Prussian again this question once more became acute. It was agreed at a meeting in Emden on Oct. 17, 1867, not to present a special petition to the government and to make no use of any exceptional status.

In the execution of the written and oral negotiations Deacon Ysaak Brons was outstandingly active. From Jan. 6, 1832, to Sept. 22, 1875, in addition to his business, political, and charitable activities, he managed his office in the congregation with unusual faithfulness, circumspection, and vigor, giving five pastors a most understanding support.

Laurens van Hulst served the congregation for 23 years, 1827-50. He provided for the use of an organ, the introduction of a new songbook, for the repair of the church, the new pews, which were now rented out for the first time (1834), founded a branch of the Dutch Society for the Common Welfare, and founded a nature study association, which still exists. In recognition of his services the congregation raised his salary from 800 to 1,200 Dutch guilders and in the last years gave him an honorary sum annually of 100 talers. In 1850 he resigned to become one of the directors of the Teyler (q.v.) Association at Haarlem. With great sorrow they saw him leave the congregation.

Next L. E. Halbertsma of Ternaard was chosen as preacher; he was initiated on Nov. 10, 1850, by Leendertz, the pastor of Leer. On Oct. 26, 1854, he died. His widow was granted a pension of 200 talers. The Algemeene Doopsgezinde Sociëteit of Holland gave the congregation a considerable contribution.

The next minister was L. T. Goteling Vinnis of Stadskanaal. After a trial sermon he was unanimously chosen on May 27, 1855. The congregation offered him an annual salary of 1,500 florins. He succeeded in stirring up and preserving an active spiritual life in the congregation. With the Dutch congregations he maintained active connections. Repeatedly the Emden congregation had the opportunity of aiding younger or even older Dutch congregations in building churches or parsonages. Also with the preachers of the congregations in Norden and Leer he maintained close connections and instigated a regular exchange of ministers with them. He required young baptismal candidates to make a written confession of faith to the church council. In the benevolent institutions of the city of Emden the congregation participated in an outstanding degree, as for instance in building a hospital or establishing an educational board. Vinnis also provided for the purchase of a new parsonage and for equipping the church with gas lights. Upon the request of several church members that he occasionally preach in German he held the first German sermon on Jan. 1, 1860. The congregational endowment was considerably increased by the substantial sum of the "Boumannsfonds." On account of unpleasant domestic circumstances Vinnis had to resign, and on Oct. 3, 1869, he preached a moving farewell sermon on Rom. 3:28.

His successor was S. Cramer, the minister of Zijldijk, Tjeenk Willink of Tjalleberd having rejected the offered position. On Sept. 25, 1870, Cramer was initiated by Leendertz of Leer, but already on Aug. 15, 1874, he accepted a call to Enschede in Holland.

Then J. P. Müller, preacher of Zwartsluis, was chosen. He was also introduced into his office by Leendertz and held his initial sermon on Nov. 17, 1874. Soon the wish became predominant that the preaching be done in German for the most part. The record book was carried on in Dutch until 1889, likewise the baptismal instruction. By 1889 the German language was the only one in use. Also a German hymnal was introduced. A plan to adopt a songbook of their own in common with the other East Frisian Mennonite congregations was not accepted on account of the cost; but on Oct. 1, 1876, the Emden congregation adopted the Gesangbuch für die Reformierten Gemeinden Ostfrieslands.

The women of the Emden congregation (women have voted in the church since 1826) presented a petition for the establishment of an endowment for the education of ministers in the German language. It will probably not be an error to assume that Anna Brons (q.v.) was the instigator of this move. She revealed a deep interest in the Mennonite brotherhood in Germany and it may be ascribed to her and to her oldest son, Bernhard Brons, who served as deacon of the congregation from Sept. 22, 1875, to his death June 8, 1911, that the Emden congregation supported all the spiritual and communal efforts of the German Mennonites most warmly. Thus she participated in the founding of the Vereinigung der Mennoniten-Gemeinden im Westen Deutschlands (which had only the one meeting at Friedelsheim in 1874), the Mennonite Central Relief Treasury in the Palatinate, and above all, the Vereinigung der Mennoniten-Gemeinden im Deutschen Reich at Berlin in 1886.

The Emden congregation also promoted actively the rising research in Mennonite history. Mrs. Brons in 1884 published the first history of the Mennonites in the German language (Ursprung, Entwickelung, und Schicksale der . . . Mennoniten); Pastor Müller published the results of his research in the state archives of Aurich in his book, Die Mennoniten in Ostfriesland vom 16. bis zum 18. Jahrhundert. His congregation supported him substantially in this undertaking. Also the publication of the Mannhardt Jahrbuch in 1888 and the research of C. A. Cornelius (q.v.), Nippold (q.v.), and Ludwig Keller (q.v.), as well as the Comeniusgesellschaft founded by Keller were received with great interest. A congregational library was established. On Oct. 18, 1898, when Müller resigned on account of advanced age, J. G. Appeldoorn of Gorredijk was chosen as his successor. He served for 18 years, and then accepted a call as professor at the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam. In 1918 A. Fast, a German-Russian, was chosen pastor, who has continued to the present, 1956. In 1921 the congregation had a membership of 80 and 10 children.

World War I and its consequences struck a severe blow at the outward existence of the Emden congregation. The income from former endowments was wiped out in the inflation of 1923, as was also the capital of many members. As a result of losses on the field of battle and especially because of emigration of many younger members in search of better opportunities to make a living, the membership dropped sharply to 30 adults and 4 children. But there was enough spiritual strength left to give the impulse for a new growth, by means of two important decisions of the church council at the instigation of the new pastor in 1918.

First, the three congregations of East Friesland, Emden, Leer, and Norden, as well as the small Gronau congregation, formed an experimental union. All four of these congregations had hitherto been served by Dutch ministers, all of whom retired because of age during these years. In 1941 the union was strengthened by three agreements: one between Emden and Leer, stipulating that the church capital of Leer be transferred to Emden in case the Leer membership should decline below a certain point. Second, a similar agreement was drawn up between Emden and Norden. Since the capital of Emden had already been assigned to the Vereinigung, that of the other two congregations is now also assigned to it. Third, an agreement was drawn up between all four congregations to support the common pastor on a specified ratio. This was, of course, an emergency measure, which reduced the number of regular services and also the amount of time available for baptismal instruction. But these drawbacks were more than compensated for in the increased participation in all church functions.

The second decision was, after consultation with other congregations, the removal of the restriction practiced in all European Mennonite churches with the exception of Holland, limiting the membership to old Mennonite families. This custom, originating in the earlier lack of legal status, which of course contradicted the principle of baptism upon confession of faith, and which promoted a clannish spirit, was to be dropped. The result of this decision was that more and more children of other creeds came to the instruction classes and were received by baptism into the Mennonite congregation. In 1925, 70 families, in most cases the parents of the children, requested admission. Also the congregations of Gronau, Norden, and Leer received members from other confessions. In Emden the membership including children rose to 200 in 1933, and in 1934 was able to enlarge the church and improve the residences of the pastor and the sexton. The "Mennonitentag," when the world conference met at Amsterdam in 1936, held a service at Emden. The congregation was in a thriving condition. Plans were being made to employ a second pastor for the Northwest German churches.

Then came World War II, with its 80 per cent destruction of Emden. The church, the parsonage, and all the homes and businesses of the members were annihilated. The Mennonite library, with its very valuable Bibles and hymnbooks of former centuries, and also the archives with 39 large record books bound in pigskin burned at Sögel, where they had been put for safe keeping.

In the following severe years of hunger, the completely impoverished members received food and clothing through the relief work of the American and Canadian Mennonites (MCC). The Dutch Mennonites also contributed relief goods. Services were held in a barracks in the cemetery. But this was not yet the end of this, the oldest Mennonite congregation, in which Menno Simons himself worked. Since it was not feasible to build a church in the ruined city, it was decided to build a congregational house with a chapel and a residence for the pastor on the second floor. One half of the required sum was furnished by the four participating congregations, one third by American and Canadian congregations, and the rest as a loan from a bank. On Sept. 13, 1953, the house was dedicated. The membership in 1954 was 218 baptized members. The pastor was still Abraham Fast.

The Emden congregation has been a member of the Vereinigung der Deutschen Mennonitengemeinden from its founding in 1886. It was also a member of the Dutch A.D.S. from its founding in 1811, and from 1829 of the Dutch Groningen Sociëteit, which had been founded in 1826, and also of a number of charitable funds. Emden Disputation. The protocol book of the Dutch Reformed Church of Emden has an entry dated Jan. 20, 1577, stating that some of the ministers were to go to Count Edzard II to ask him to issue a mandate to restrain the Anabaptists from preaching (leren en predigenn). Should they not be willing to defend their faith their meetings should be prohibited. Then it is added that Willem de Visscher should first be spoken to "as a brother," asking him whether the above plan was advisable. A later entry states that the brethren had spoken to him on Jan. 30. On Feb. 20, 1577, Menso Alting, Jasper Celos, and Luppe Sikkes proposed to the Drost of Emden a disputation with the Mennonite leaders. Although the protocol book does not further mention this event, what followed is known through other sources. The protocol book does, however, reveal that among the Reformed clergy and church council there had been during the preceding years a concern and jealousy regarding the spread of the Anabaptists.

Early in 1578 numerous Mennonite elders met in Emden, a fact which did not remain unnoticed (Protocol . . . des Gespreckṣ, 378b). In the preface to the Protocol Count Johann of East Friesland, reviewing the factors that had led to the disputation, stated that it had always been the concern of the government to keep the land free of "errors" and "sects." It attempted to achieve this by securing good and qualified ministers for the congregations and by issuing mandates forbidding the introduction of sects by severe penalties. In spite of all efforts, he continued, the Anabaptists had increased in numbers and therefore his government was thinking of other means "to maintain the pure evangelical teaching" (ija, iija). In February 1578 Edzard wrote that Menso Alting made a statement from the pulpit of the Grosse Kirche indicating that about a "thousand Anabaptists were coming to Emden from Holland and other places to live there" (Müller, 32 f.).

In addition to this an Anabaptist leader was apprehended who declared himself willing to discuss matters of faith with the Reformed ministers. Not able to "condemn anyone without a hearing," the government granted the request of the Reformed ministers to combat the Anabaptists with "decent means" (met behoorlijke middelen weyren) and to arrange for a disputation. The Waterlanders and the Frisians did not accept the invitation, while the Flemish not only accepted it in a response of Feb. 23, but also suggested Feb. 27 as the first day of the disputation (Protocol, iijb, iiija). The disputation was first held in a private home (Klunderberg), but soon was transferred to the Gasthaus Church and opened to the public.

From Feb. 25 to May 17, 1578, the debate continued, through 124 sessions, at eight in the morning after a prayer, and at two in the afternoon. The Reformed debaters were the preachers Menso Alting and Johannes Petrejus of Emden, Wicherus Mellesius of Hinthe, Feyto Rumerdi of Oldersum, and Johannes Nicasius of Borssum. The Flemish speakers were the preachers Hans Busschaert, Peeter van Ceulen, Paulus Backer, Christiaan Arends, Jan van Ophoorn (of Emden), and Brixius Gerritsz. The chief speakers were Alting, Petrejus, Peeter van Ceulen, and Busschaert. Of the Flemish only Brixius knew the classical languages.

The following served as chairman: Ocko Vriesen, Helmerus Diurken, Onno Tyabbren, Henricus Geerdes, and H. Paulinus. The speeches were taken down by the imperial notary, Dominicus Julius, and on the Flemish side by Carel van Gent. The records were then read aloud and signed by the chairmen, speakers, and recorders. In 1658 a book appeared written by J. H. V. P. N., entitled Beginsel . . . der geschillen (1910 reprinted in BRN VII), in which (page 67) the author calls himself "their secretary." But this was not Carel van Gent; for he later became a Reformed preacher. There was a second Mennonite scribe at the debate, Abel van Oosterwolde, as is seen on page 380 of the record, where an unofficial record is mentioned.

Certainly the following Mennonites were present: Hans van Deutekom, Willem Jansen, Gerritt Tincken, Beno Dolinck, Hans Krop, Hermann von Manschlacht, Hans de Clerck, Gerhard Rebbers, Hans de Boser (son of the martyr Maeyken Boosers, q.v.), Johann von Arssum, Frans Moltmaker, Antonius Tingieter, and Ariaen Berents. But the second secretary is not one of these, but presumably Cornelis Jansz (q.v.), the compass maker, who was later preacher at Middelburg. The following points were debated: (1) That God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are three independent and differentiated persons, and yet one eternal true God and one divine Being; (2) Concerning the creation of man; (3) Concerning the fall of man and the ruin that has resulted, as original sin and the loss of freedom of the will; (4) Concerning Christ, that is, that Jesus Christ, true God and man in a single person, received His humanity from the substance of His mother Mary; (5) Concerning justification and sanctification or second birth of human beings; (6) Concerning good works; (7) Concerning the Church of God, and by what means one may confess it; (8) Concerning the election and call of preachers; (9) Concerning baptism and whether infants of the covenant shall be baptized; (10) Concerning communion; (11) Concerning the proper use and misuse of the ban; (12) Concerning the oath and the meaning of Matthew 5; (13) Concerning the resurrection of the flesh.

The debate was carried on in the spirit of Christian love. According to J. H. V. P. N. it was fortunate that Peeter van Ceulen was present, for Busschaert, who was actually the most important Flemish preacher, was sometimes embarrassed for an answer. Of Peeter van Ceulen the chairman said: "I tell you, Peeter, if you had the training we have, you would dispute all of us out of this church" (BRN VII, 548 f.).

The original record as it was taken down by Dominicus Julius and Carel van Gent has been preserved in the archives of the Gesellschaft für bildende Kunst und vaterländische Altertümer at Emden, and a microfilm copy has been obtained by the General Conference (GCM) Historical Committee (Newton, Kan.). A careful study of this record, comparing it with the printed copy, would reveal whether and to what extent changes have been made. The Protocol book of the church council of the Reformed Church of Emden, dating back to 1557, preserved in the archives of the Grosse Kirche (microfilm copy with G.C.M. Historical Committee), contains valuable information regarding the relationship of the two groups in Emden.

The recordings of the disputation were first published in the Saxon language (literary language of that area) under the title Protocol. Dath is, alle handelinge des gesprecks tho Emden in Oistfrieszlandt mit den Wedderdöperen, de sick Flaminge nomen, geholden . . . (Embden, G. Goebens, 1579). Printed by the same printer and during the same year appeared also a Dutch translation of the Protocol done by Dominicus Julius under the title Protocol. Dat is, Alle handelinge des Gesprecks tot Embden in Oostvrieslant met den Wederdooperen, die hen Vlamingen noemen, gehouden . . . . Of this edition a reprint appeared at Leiden in 1616. Copies of all three editions are found in the Mennonite libraries of Amsterdam, Bethel, and Goshen.

Before the Protocol was published the Mennonite participants expected a biased slant and published a Voorlooper, a warning, entitled Een Christelicke ende voorloopende Waerschouwinge, written by a "lover of divine truth" (Liefhebber der Godtlijcker waerheyt), whose identity is unknown. This pamphlet was added to the Protocol with a brief introduction and a refutation point by point (pp. 375-84). The Mennonite representative makes numerous accusations to the effect that his group was not treated fairly. The refutation and the preface to the Protocol by Count Johann make it obvious that the Mennonites were not treated as equals and that the disputation was not a brotherly conference, but that it was a means to defeat the movement in East Friesland. EMEK (Europäisches Mennonitisches Evangelisations-Komitee) was organized in August 1952 as the central mission committee of the Mennonites in Europe representing the four countries of Holland, Germany, Switzerland, and France. A preliminary meeting was held at Elspeet, Holland, in 1950. The committee meets annually in the four countries in rotation. Meetings have been held in Germany (1953), Switzerland (1954), and France (1955). The committee promotes the mission cause among the Mennonites, particularly the support of the work of the Dutch Mennonite Board in Indonesia and New Guinea, but it does not administer any work itself. It is composed of 11 members appointed as follows: (1) four by the Dutch Mennonite Mission Board; (2) three by the German Mennonite Mission Committee; (3) two by the Swiss Mennonite Mission Committee; (4) two by the French Mennonite Mission Committee. The chairman and treasurer of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Board (Doopsgezinde Vereniging tot Evangelieverbreiding) are ex officio the chairman and treasurer of EMEK, and together with a vice-chairman and secretary chosen annually by EMEK constitute the executive committee. Emergency Relief Board of the General Conference Mennonite Church was organized as a standing body of the General Conference in 1899 under the name of Emergency Relief Commission. The immediate occasion was a famine in India. This Commission had been preceded by the Mennonite Board of Guardians (q.v.) formed on behalf of the Mennonites then planning to migrate to the United States and Canada from Russia. After contributing $7,000 and 800 bushels of corn for relief in India in 1900, the Emergency Relief Commission continued to function as a relief agency among members of local churches in the conference.

At its regular session in 1920, the General Conference authorized the Emergency Relief Commission to give aid to the needy Mennonite brethren in Russia and to send a representative to that country to investigate the conditions and to help in relief work; it further authorized the commission to unite its relief efforts with those of the all-Mennonite organization then in the process of formation, the Mennonite Central Committee, with which it has continued its affiliation by the regular election of two members.

In 1933 the Emergency Relief Commission was recognized by the General Conference as a permanent board known as the Board of Emergency Relief, consisting of five members. Since 1938 the Emergency Relief Board has co-operated with the MCC in its war relief and rehabilitation program, in the Civilian Public Service program, and other projects. In addition its work included relief to needy members of local Mennonite churches of the conference, co-operation with the home and the foreign mission boards in relief projects in the mission fields, and co-operation with other boards and organizations in various conference projects. In 1950 the board was merged with the Board of Christian Service (q.v.) by action of the General Conference of that year. I.W.B.

Emeritaatsfonds (Fund for Pensions of Retired Ministers). Since the ministers of Dutch Mennonite congregations give full time to their ministry, provisions have been made to grant them a reasonable yearly pension when they retire at the age of 65. These funds serve at the same time as Invaliditeitfondsen, i.e., they provide for those who have to leave the ministry before they have reached the age of 65, because of bad health. There are now (1953) four of these superannuation funds in the Netherlands: Friesch Emeritaatsfonds, founded in 1845, Zaansch Emeritaatsfonds since 1848 (see Algemeen Emeritaatsfonds), Groningsch Emeritaatsfonds since 1917, and Pensioenfonds der A.D.S. (q.v.) since 1940. vdZ.

Emma Mennonite Church (MC), 5 miles north of Topeka, Lagrange Co., Ind., was organized in 1901, with 40 charter members formerly belonging to the Shore and Forks congregations. The church is a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference. The first minister was O. S. Hostetler and the first deacon Menno J. Yoder, both ordained Oct. 15, 1902. Hostetler has served as bishop since 1923, and Yoder as minister since 1923. On June 29, 1924, Amos O. Hostetler was ordained to serve as deacon and on Sept. 3, 1944, he was ordained minister. On April 1, 1945, Ivan Miller was ordained deacon and March 1954, bishop. The membership in 1953 was 205. A new church was built in the Plato community 5 miles east of Lagrange, where a number of the present members have located and organized a separate congregation. A.O.H.

Emmanuel Bible College, Kitchener, Ont., is operated by the Ontario Conference of the United Missionary Church for the purpose of training young people for service in the church. The school was founded in 1940 with Ward M. Shantz as the first principal. In 1953 Shantz became president and Lyness L. Wark was elected principal. To date there have been 140 graduates, many of whom are ministers and missionaries, serving in five countries. The enrollment for 1954 was 108, of whom 44 were registered in the day classes and 64 in the evening classes. The college offers courses in theology, missions, and Christian education, but does not require graduation from a high school for entrance. E.R.S.

Emmanuel Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, organized in 1936, is situated six miles south and a half mile west of Fredonia, Wilson Co., Kan. The present building with a capacity for 108 persons was purchased in 1938. Jesse H. Jantz and Lee Schultz were the ministers in 1955, with a membership of 65. J.J.

Emmanuel Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located one mile south of Rich Hill, Bates Co., Mo., was organized in 1923. The first worship services were held in homes and schools. In 1942 a church was built with a seating capacity of 120, with Henry Dirks as the leading minister. In 1945 J. J. Esau was ordained as minister and Nathan Schmidt as deacon. The 1955 membership was 90, with Harvey Yost and Henry Dirks as ministers. N.Sa.

Emmanuel Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located 20 miles northeast of Garden City, Finney Co., Kan., came into being when settlers from various churches, especially from Janzen, Neb., came there in 1918, with Elder J. K. Ens as leader. In 1926 the membership had reached 80 and the Sunday-school enrollment 110. A public school and later a church basement served for a meeting place. The church was disbanded in 1936 when the majority of its members moved to other localities. Other ministers who served the congregation are I. M. Friesen and J. J. Voth. C.F.P.

Emmanuel Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located 4½ miles northwest of Chasely, N.D., was organized on July 3, 1921, under the leadership of Paul F. Gross, who served as first pastor. In 1927 the membership was 34. The new church was built and was dedicated on Pentecost 1920. A German parochial school was carried on for some time. The church died out in 1932. D. M. Hofer served the church with special meetings, at baptisms, and in the organization and dedication of the church. Samuel J. R. Hofer served as pastor about ten years. C.F.P.

Emmanuel Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, Langham, Sask., had its beginning in 1901 when a few members moved in from South Dakota. A. Stahl served as the first pastor, when the church was organized and a meetinghouse was built in the summer of 1917. The baptized membership in 1955 was 50, all of whom were rural people, and the pastor was Paul Stahl. The meetinghouse is located 11½ miles southeast of Langham. P. St.

Emmanuel Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, located 6 miles straight east of Onida, Sully Co., S.D., was organized on Oct. 10, 1920, with 28 members, under the leadership of David J. S. Mendel, who served it as pastor up to the fall of 1934. In the spring of 1940 Edwin F. Walter accepted the call as pastor of the church. Its 1955 membership was 99, with E. L. Hofer as pastor. Ed.W.

Emmanuel Mennonite Church (GCM), sometimes known as Homestead, now extinct, located five miles southwest of Aberdeen, Idaho, a member of the Pacific District Conference, was organized April 22, 1912, under the leadership of Jacob Hege, who served as the first pastor. The membership at the time the church was disbanded (December 1930) was approximately 75, consisting almost entirely of rural people. Other ministers who served the church were Leonard Dirks and John Toews. F.L.W.

Emmanuel Mennonite Church (unaffiliated), located in Meade Co., Kan., 5 miles south and 4 miles east of the city of Meade, was organized April 30, 1944, as an independent church, with 124 charter members, under the leadership of Henry R. Harms, who served as its first pastor, as a direct result of the dissolution of the Kleine Gemeinde congregation at Meade. One of the two church buildings formerly used by this group has been enlarged to seat about 350, and is now being used by the Emmanuel Mennonite Church. In the winter of 1952-53 the congregation built a new parsonage near the church. Samuel H. Epp, the present pastor, successor to H. R. Harms, serves an average congregation of 230, the membership to date (1954) being 210. The deacons assisting the pastor are George J. Rempel and Peter L. Classen. S.H.E.

Emmanuel Mennonite Church (GCM), until 1931 known as the Canton Church, located six miles north and one-half west of Moundridge, McPherson Co., Kan., a member of the Western District Conference, was organized in 1875 by Mennonites from Poland.

The Christian Endeavor Society was organized on May 8, 1908. The women's mission society was organized in 1941. A new church was dedicated on June 14, 1942. The membership in 1955 was 87, with Garman H. Wedel serving as their pastor. G.H.W.

Emmanuel Mennonite Church (GCM) near Pratum, Marion Co., Ore., formerly called Waldo Hill's Mennonite Church or Emmanuel's Mennonite Church was organized May 25, 1890, although the first building was not built until 1904. The present building was remodeled in 1940. The 1955 membership was 232, with Frank S. Harder serving as pastor. (ML I, 564.) W.A.R.

Emmanuel Mennonite Church (GCM), located near Denver, Lancaster Co., Pa., was organized in 1939 with 22 members under the leadership of the present pastor Elmer D. Hess. The congregation united with the Eastern District Conference in 1940 and the General Conference Mennonite Church in 1941. Its membership was 55 in 1953. E.D.H.

Emmanuel Mennonite Church (GCM), located 13 miles south and one mile west of Doland, Spink Co., S.D., a member of the Northern District Conference, was organized in 1921 with 36 members under the leadership of J. W. Kleinsasser, the first pastor. The 1953 membership was 89, and all were rural people. The original frame meetinghouse, erected in 1922 and seating 180, was still in use in 1954. Ministers who have served the congregation are J. W. Kleinsasser, Jacob A. Friesen, missionary Elmer Dick, who served two months as interim pastor, Frank Loewen, Lyman W. Sprunger, and the present pastor, Paul Quenzer. L.W.S.

Emmatal Fortbildungsschule was established as a Kansas Conference Mennonite (GCM) secondary school in 1882 and occupied an empty school of the Emmatal school district, Marion County. H. H. Ewert (q.v.) was the teacher. After the first year the school was transferred to Halstead where it was known as the Halstead Seminary (q.v.), and in 1893 to Newton to continue as Bethel College (q.v.). The Emmatal Fortbildungsschule, also called a "Zentralschule," was the first attempt of the Mennonites of the prairie states and provinces to introduce secondary education. C.K.

Emmaus (Pa.) Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, 28 members in 1911, had 156 members in 1953, with W. W. Hartman as pastor.

Emmaus Mennonite Church (GCM), located 1½ miles north and 2½ miles east of Whitewater, Butler Co., Kan., a member of the Western District Conference, had its origin with the arrival of West Prussian immigrants in 1876. Family heads included Abraham, Dietrich, and Eduard Claassen, Johann Dyck, Johann and Bernhard Harder, Heinrich Penner, and Gerhard Regier. These were joined in the following year by the Leonhard and Abraham Sudermann families coming from South Russia. Leonhard Sudermann served as the first elder (1877). He was assisted by his brother Abraham Sudermann and Peter Dyck as ministers. The former later affiliated with the First Mennonite Church of Newton, and the latter with the Zion Mennonite Church of Elbing. Succeeding ministers and elders were Eduard Claassen, minister 1884-1902, and elder 1900-2; Gustav Harder, minister 1884-1923, and elder 1902-23; Johann P. Andres, minister 1893-1905; Heinrich M. Wiebe, minister 1902-5; Bernhard W. Harder, minister 1902-39, and elder 1923-39; Henry Thiessen, minister 1908 (installed in 1911) -39; Bernhard Wiebe, minister 1910-21; John C. Kaufman, minister and elder 1939-47; Walter H. Dyck, pastor 1948-54; and L. R. Amstutz 1955- .

The first meetinghouse was erected in 1878 with a seating capacity of 200; the second in 1908, seating 400; and the third in 1929, seating 800, which was still in use in 1953. A parsonage was built in 1950. The membership continues predominantly rural. Weekday parochial schools and catechetical instruction have been provided from the early years. Until 1908 the hymnal used at worship services was one without notes brought from Germany. Until 1929 four brethren had taken turns in leading congregational singing. At present a song leader (see Chorister) is elected annually.

The first deacons were elected in 1917. These together with the ministers constituted the church board. A church constitution was adopted in 1923. Communion is observed three times per year. Footwashing has not been observed. Morning worship services still include a kneeling prayer and ten minutes of song and meditation in the German language. The first missionaries to go out from the membership were Alfred Wiebe and wife, who went to the American Indians in Montana in 1911. Members have shown an active interest in the Berean Academy, Elbing, Kan. The membership in 1955 was 379. W.H.D.

Emmaus Mennonite Church (GCM), located in the area of Swift Current, a city of about 9,000 in southwestern Saskatchewan, a wheat-growing area, is a member of the Conference of Mennonites of Canada. The congregation has (1954) seven church buildings, the largest of which, with a seating capacity of 250, is in Swift Current.

In 1913 the Home Mission Board of the Canadian Conference began to serve the scattered families living in the area and in 1914 the first 12 candidates were baptized. During the following years this group was served by Elder Johann Gerbrandt, Drake, Sask.; Gerhard Buhler, Herbert, Sask.; Peter J. Epp, Eigenheim, Sask.; and Elder Benjamin

Ewert. After World War I, a number of families from Russia settled here. As a result a congregation was organized June 16, 1928, and Isaac H. Wiens was ordained as the first minister, although Benjamin Ewert served for some time longer as elder.

The first meetinghouse was built in 1916 near Neville. The other six churches have been built with aid from the General Conference Home Mission Board since 1937. The membership in 1954 was 371, about half urban and half rural.

The congregation has Sunday schools, Christian Endeavor groups, women's mission groups, prayer meetings, and choirs. The German language is used for some morning services and the English in Sunday schools and in some morning and all evening services. The ministers in 1954 were Werner Zacharias, David Quiring, Wilhelm Zacharias, Cornelius P. Kehler, Jacob J. M. Friesen, and Valentine E. Nickel, who was ordained as elder Oct. 31, 1948. V.E.N.

Emmen, a rapidly growing town (1947 pop. 55,500, with 175 Mennonites) in the Dutch province of Drenthe. In 1879 there were about 100 Mennonites here, most of whom seem to have joined the Baptist Church which arose here at this time (DB 1894, 85). In 1939 the Mennonites living here, having held occasional meetings in the preceding years, organized a Mennonite fellowship (Kring). About 30 members joined. From 1942 the group met in a school building, then once a month in a room of the Reformed Church, and now (1956) in a rented hall. The membership in 1956 is 35; there is a Sunday school for the children (39 children). J. Meerburg Snarenberg, pastor of the Zwolle congregation, is in charge of this group. vdZ.

Emmenholz, Zuchwil district, in the Swiss canton of Solothurn, in the angle where the Emme flows into the Aare. In 1899 Christian Gerber leased a large farm here and converted it into a model agricultural project. By industry and capability father and son won recognition and were elected on community and school boards.

Always interested in the welfare of the Mennonite Church and led by the wish to keep his family true to it, Christian Gerber furnished a hall with chairs and an organ as a place of worship. He thereby established in Emmenholz a new subsidiary of the Kleintal (q.v.) congregation. He put the hall also at the disposal of the Evangelical Society in which he was active; meetings were held here twice a month, alternately led by Mennonite preachers (Jura and Emmental) and evangelists of the Society. Communion is observed four times annually. Since 1910 there has been a Sunday school. In 1922 the congregation numbered 15 baptized members and 27 children. In 1953, Elder Abraham Gerber of Brestenberg was the local minister in charge. Since 1946 the meetings of the Mennonites of the Solothurn district are no longer held in Emmenholz, but in the home of Elder Abraham Gerber in Brestenberg near Riedholz, where 8-10 families assemble. A Mennonite preacher serves on the first Sunday of the month, and a preacher from the Evangelical Society on the third Sunday. Emmenholz (Brestenberg) has never been an independent congregation. (ML I, 577.) A.T., S.G.

Emmental, a district in the Swiss canton of Bern, where Anabaptism gained a following in the Reformation era, and in spite of very severe persecution has maintained itself up to the present. The narrower Emmental (Emme Valley) is made up of the two townships, Signau (the upper valley) and Trachselwald (the lower valley), together with the adjacent Konolfingen and Burgdorf. The meadows of the upper part of the Emmental extend to the Lower Alps. Mt. Napf rises to a height of 4,670 ft. Here is the home of the famed Emmental cheese. In the lower regions farming and fruit-growing predominate. In the narrower Emmental there are only a few towns of any size, of which Langnau, with its population of 8,600, is most important. In general it is an extensive region of individual farms. Besides the church and school there are few buildings to mark a center. The brooks have cut deep, narrow furrows in the meadows. Thickly sprinkled over the landscape are the trim homesteads. This form of landscape and of settlement produces in the inhabitants a strong self-reliance and a consequent weakening of group or community consciousness. Their independence of thought has frequently been demonstrated to both state and church. To this territory we add the flatter land of Aarwangen and Traubrunnen (the Oberaargau). This extended Emmental embraces a considerable part of the canton of Bern, approximately 450 sq. miles with 160,000 inhabitants.

What is said in the article Bern (q.v.) about the Anabaptist movement applies in especial degree to the Emmental. Here Anabaptism arose and spread very quickly. Although the movement spread throughout the canton, nevertheless the Emmental was specifically an Anabaptist region. This may be due in part to the fact that it is adjacent to the cantons Aargau, Lucerne, and Solothurn, where the Anabaptists were likewise more numerous during the 16th century. The canton of Basel (q.v.) also extends to within five miles of Wangen and Aarwangen. Thus missionary Anabaptists always reached this region first to strengthen the brotherhood, and were then all too frequently seized and finally also executed.

Since the history of Emmental has already been discussed in Bern, the present discussion will center especially on those places where Anabaptists are mentioned in documents (see the map). The first dealings of the council of Bern with the Anabaptists (Oct. 22, 1525, and Jan. 13, 1526; see R.A. Nos. 746 and 801) lead in the direction of Aargau (q.v.), which was at that time largely under Bernese jurisdiction (until 1798). On March 7 and 12, and April 27, 1526, dispatches were sent to the magistrate of Wangen (R.A. Nos. 839, 843, 876), which mention secret meetings, clandestine preaching (Winkelpredigen) and preaching in the tavern, and order the magistrate to banish these preachers if they will not desist. It is not certain that these acts deal with Anabaptist preaching. But in later dispatches the preaching of the Anabaptists is often referred to as "corner preaching" and "tavern preaching" (R.A. Nos. 2721 and 3058). A similar case occurs in a dispatch of May 8, 1527, in which two men of Lower Huttwil are to answer for talking about the sacrament and are released (R.A. No. 1202).

On Sept. 6, 1527, in an order to the communes, the Anabaptists are mentioned, which indicates that the movement was widespread. Measures are passed to "eradicate these weeds." The banished outsiders who return are to be "drowned without mercy," likewise their leaders and "masters." On Jan. 7, 1528, a command is issued to keep Anabaptists imprisoned until the conclusion of the approaching disputation (R.A. No. 1456). On Jan. 10, 1528, Jegenstorf receives instructions concerning the imprisonment of Anabaptists (R.A. No. 1459). On Jan. 22, 1528, a dispatch is issued to city and canton, which deals only with Anabaptists, with the "earnest and urgent command" to watch carefully and closely all Anabaptists, whether "foreign or native" (R.A. No. 1481). On Feb. 23, 1528, an order is given to the communes concerning the Reformation: Anabaptists are not to be tolerated anywhere, neither in city nor canton; they are to be captured and sent to Bern (R.A. No. 1534). Strangely there is now a gap in the succession of notices about the Anabaptists, from Feb. 23, 1528, to Oct. 7, 1529 (R.A. Nos. 1534-2557). On Oct. 7, 1529, an order is issued to the magistrate of Wangen, to send the "peasants and pastors" of Rohrbach and Madiswil to him, the "Disputatz thöuffer" (disputation Anabaptists) (R.A. No. 2557). On Oct. 14, 1527, and 28, 1529, orders go to the same magistrate concerning the Anabaptists in his territory. The towns Wangen, Rohrbach, and Huttwil are named (R.A. Nos. 2564, 2565, 2584, and 2585).

Upon receipt of information that the Anabaptists of Basel were planning a missionary campaign in Bernese and Solothurn territory, Bern issued orders to the districts of Attiswil, Bipp, Wangen, Aarwangen, and Landshut (as also Seeland and Aargau) to guard carefully against the Anabaptists, in order that "such weeds be exterminated" (R.A. No. 2693). This appeal was not without purpose; on Feb. 1, 1530, the magistrate of Bipp is to "guard the Anabaptists well and give information." Feb. 2, 1530, Bern reports to Solothurn about the Anabaptist movement in Wangen, Aarwangen, and Bipp (R.A. No. 2716). Feb. 7, 1530, Röthenbach appears, and Feb. 18 Oberdiessbach (Diessbach) in the same affair (R.A. Nos. 2721 and 2728). On the same day instructions are issued to the magistrate of Landshut, to inform himself actually and secretly by day and night concerning the Anabaptists in Utzenstorf (R.A. No. 2728).

On Feb. 18, 1530, Bern reports to Basel that in the district of Bipp four Anabaptists have been captured, and on May 18 Bern issues a warning to Solothurn on account of the Anabaptists. In the district of Solothurn the persecuted and banished Anabaptists of Emmental often found refuge and temporary asylum (in Bucheggberg, Lüsslingen, Aetigen, Kriegstetten). In a rather lengthy, undated dispatch of the close of 1530, all deans are ordered, each in his own chapter, to give faithful warning against the "seditious sect of the Anabaptists." Now the Council is occupied with "Uli Flückinger" and "Osswalden" of Huttwil.

The severe mandate of July 31, 1531, to city and canton demands the "abolition and extermination" of the Anabaptists. Proof of the seriousness of the Council's intention are the numerous edicts and directives to officials; for example, Aug. 31 to Trachselwald and Signau, Sept. 6 to city and canton, Oct. 10 to Burgdorf, Huttwil, Wangen, Aarwangen, and Trachselwald, Nov. 21 again to Burgdorf. The captured Anabaptists are taken to Bern and tried; but their names are rarely given. For example, there are Anabaptists brought in from Aarwangen, Huttwil, Trachselwald, Signau, Burgdorf, and Rohrbach. The pastor of Dürrenroth complains that the Anabaptists are preaching and attacking his teaching. An Anabaptist teacher has been preaching at Sumiswald, and intends to preach in the market place of Huttwil. In Sumiswald and vicinity the Anabaptists have created "general confusion." The priest is removed and replaced by another, who "is to preach at Sumiswald, Dürrenroth, and Eriswil, to try to bring the churches back to their old custom." In prison in Bern are mentioned Christian Brügger of Rohrbach and Hans Riff, called Kaderli of Madiswil. The magistrates of Wangen, Aarwangen, Bipp, Trachselwald, Sumiswald, and Huttwil receive a reprimanding order to obey orders at once. In 1533 orders are issued to Aarwangen (to bring an Anabaptist to Bern with his father), to Trachselwald (concerning Miescher, a tailor at Dürrenroth), to Burgdorf (to keep the Anabaptists in prison until further notice or punish Miescher's wife and child), to Brandis (to send prisoners to Bern), to Signau (to come to Bern for instructions or to release Klaus Schumacher and the Müller of Gunten from fines), and to Melchnau, Sumiswald, Wangen, Aarwangen (to capture Anabaptists en route; and imprison leaders of the rabble and fine those who keep them in their homes). The pastor of Sumiswald is removed because of scandalous speech against the Anabaptists. At the close of the year the "Küfferli" is brought in, which is of significance to the people of Emmental. In 1534 directives are issued to Aarwangen, Trachselwald, Trub, Burgdorf, Brandis, Sumiswald, Oberburg, Signau, Wangen, and Heimiswil.

Several Anabaptists recant; thus in Rüegsau, Oberburg, Zäziwil, and Bigental. Others join the Anabaptists, and backsliders return to them; thus in Trachselwald and Grosshöchstetten. The Anabaptist Grete Wyss of Höchstetten is released on account of sickness. Peter Hofer of Biglen must appear before court because he "murmured" in church when the pastor said "the Anabaptists disregard the government." The number of steadfast (Anabaptists) increases, the measures of the government fail. In 1535 directives are issued to Wangen, Aarwangen, Bipp, Brandis, Trachselwald, Signau, Sumiswald "where Anabaptists are living."

On Jan. 30, 19 persons at an Anabaptist meeting, all from Emmental, appear before the council, among them Stucki, Vögeli, Blum, Tierstein, Bürki, Lienhart, Gfeller, Baumann, Künzi, Jenni. As new towns of their origin are named Konolfingen, Gisenstein, Niederhünigen, Stalden, Freimettigen. Two days later four appear from Rüegsau and Lützelflüh and seven from Signau (Wyss, Bürki, Salzmann, etc.), then from Höchstetten, Dürrenroth, Sumiswald, Biglen. From Huttwil comes bitter complaint that in Rüegsau there are unbaptized children, and in Madiswil the constable has helped the Anabaptists to hide. In Sumiswald the people warn the Anabaptists when they are in danger.

At the Anabaptist disputation of March 1538 (see Disputation) Emmental Anabaptists were present from Eggiwil, Signau, Grosshöchstetten, Walkringen, Schufelbühl, Sumiswald, Burgdorf, Niederhuttwil, Rohrbach, Madiswil, and Winigen. According to magistrates' reports there were Anabaptists also in the districts of Sumiswald, Bipp, Trachselwald, and Signau. In 1551 it is found that "the strip of land from Münsingen over Höchstetten throughout the Emmental has experienced a significant increase in the number of Anabaptists and the regulations are to be more strictly observed." In the districts of Signau, Trachselwald, and Brandis an open letter must be read from the pulpits, proclaiming that those who do not desist are to be punished in body and possessions, likewise those who shelter them. In 1585 the statement is made that all previous efforts have failed, and that the number of Anabaptists has rather increased. The pastors of Langnau often took pains to try to teach the Anabaptists in a friendly manner. In 1620 the pastor of Langnau receives the names of 17 Anabaptists in the vicinity (Mühlibach, Dürsrütti, Scheidegg, Brügglen, Gartegg, Frittenbach), among them names like Baumgartner, Probst, Friedrich, Bichsel, Ruch, Studer, Jost, Dählenbach, Reber, Krähenbühl, Röhtlisberger, Gerber.

In 1640 directives are issued to Aarwangen, Signau, and Brandis, in 1644 to all officials where Anabaptists are living. Teachers (preachers), "agitators and seducers" are to be sent in, especially Uli Zaugg, Uli Nüwhus, and Christen Stauffer. In 1654 the preacher of Eggiwil in reply to a request names 40 Anabaptists in his district. In 1658 a record of Anabaptists is demanded of the chapters (deanships) Burgdorf and Langenthal. In 1660 an order from the Council is again sent to Langenthal. A record mentions eleven Anabaptists in the penitentiary, of whom eight are from the Emmental, one from Lauperswil, and one from Koppigen. In 1669 the Anabaptist teachers Christian Güngerich and Hans Burkhalter escape in Bern. In 1670 an interdict is issued to Konolfingen against "harboring and visiting" Anabaptists. In particular they are to try to seize the Anabaptist teachers Durss Aebi and Hans Haldimann. The preacher of Lauperswil holds a discussion with the Anabaptists there.

On May 3, 1671, the magistrate of Signau receives orders to seize the Anabaptists of district Eggiwil, and to deliver them to the orphanage. Somewhat later 12 of the wealthiest persons in the district are sent to Bern as hostages until the Anabaptists would be delivered to Bern or move away. The hostages were to be kept at their own expense. This measure proved "effective in several places."

In 1692, 28 known Anabaptists are staying in Langnau; the populace is very favorable to them and does not want to hear them preached against. In 1693 a division occurs (see Jakob Ammann). The Emmental Anabaptists stay with the more lenient group led by Hans Reist. In the same year directives concerning Anabaptists are issued to the districts of Landshut, Burgdorf, Brandis, Trachselwald, Signau.

Further places appearing in Anabaptist history are Herzogenbuchsee (Niklaus Häberle of Buchsee, in prison in 1710), Ranflüh (Peter Geissbühler has given six "High German Anabaptist Testaments" to the bookbinder for binding), Goldbach (the forbidden Froschauer Bible to be demanded of Hans Reber), Wasen (Ulrich Scheidegger and Hans Wysser, smith, are on trial), Worb (Trini Bigler, a simple poor soul of 52 years), Wichtrach (Daniel Loris's wife), Hasli (Jakob Schüppach in der Träyen).

The names and places of persons executed in Bern 1529-71 point predominantly to the Emmental, especially to Sumiswald, Lützelflüh, Rüderswil, Rüegsau, Signau, Hasli, Röthenbach, Schüpbach, and Tannental.

In 1670 the chapter (deanery) Burgdorf complains to the Council: "The number of these sectarians increases daily; for instance nine members of the little Reformed Church at Schangnau have withdrawn this year. The half-Anabaptists, who differ in that they still attend our services at will, are so numerous that it is to be feared that in some places there are more of them than of ours." Ernst Müller remarks correctly: "The surmise of the pastors that the 'half Anabaptists' (q.v.) might in several places constitute the majority of the congregation, explains the renewed zeal of church and secular authorities, and shows again how independent the Emmental always was toward church and government."

At that period the movement in the Emmental reached its greatest following. In the following period persecution took a severer turn. Fluri states: "The almost unceasing persecution of the Bernese Anabaptists occasionally burst out with the violence of a volcanic eruption, . . . it never stopped, not even in the years of pestilence 1667-69, and in 1670 took on the form of actual hunts." The persecuted Anabaptists often fled to Lucerne territory, as for instance Daniel Grimm and Hans Brechbühl at Willisau. The Anabaptist hunts frequently led to the violation of district and cantonal boundaries. Especially long-drawn-out proceedings followed a hunt near Kröschenbrunnen, in which Anabaptists entered Lucerne territory. The sound folk-will of Emmental expressed itself forcibly against the Anabaptist hunts. In Sumiswald a crowd of 60-70 persons released the Anabaptists and severely beat the hunters (1714).

Naturally the perpetrators of this deed whose names were known were punished. "Bendicht Widmer, the schoolmaster, took part, is removed from his position for a half year to Brassu in the district of Romanmotier," Uli Loosli in Trachselwald receives 24 hours of imprisonment because of "improper conduct" toward the Anabaptist hunters when his sister was seized by them. The canon Hans Schöni of Sumiswald ventures to defend the Anabaptists; he receives 24 hours of imprisonment. Anabaptists are warned by "horns, cries, and similar signs."

If we compare the present congregation at Emmental (q.v.), with the complaint of the Burgdorf chapter in 1670, it is evident that Anabaptism was greatly weakened by continued persecution. This is, however, not due to any extensive recantation, but to the numerous voluntary removals from the canton, the frequent banishment, and above all to the extensive emigration. True to their faith, the Anabaptists sacrificed their kin and homeland, went out into the unknown, depending on God and the help of the Brethren.

The canton of Solothurn (q.v.) probably served as nearest refuge for shorter or longer sojourn. Then the blue mountains of the Jura (q.v.) beckoned, where in the district of the more tolerant bishops of Basel numerous Emmental Anabaptist families found shelter and work. Beyond these mountains France became an asylum for the refugees. In the Jura and in France even today the majority of Anabaptist families are of Emmental origin (Mathiot).

In the 16th century Moravia (q.v.) was also for a time the goal of fleeing Swiss Anabaptists. The migration was at times unusually great (for example in 1585-86). Bern attacked the problem of emigration several times and tried to prevent it. Names like Gerber, Schenk, Hofer, Baumann, Amsler, and Horn prove that Emmental had a part in this emigration.

A far more important goal for emigrants in the 17th and 18th centuries was the Palatinate (q.v.) with the adjoining country (Hege, 178). Already in 1527 an immigration takes place here from Switzerland, and only from Swiss Anabaptists did the movement in the Palatinate make any considerable gain (Hege, 7). It is also significant that the Moravian Anabaptists called their brethren in the Palatinate Swiss Brethren. The greatest emigration, chiefly from Bern, took place in 1671—about 700 persons, large and small, impoverished (record in Müller, 290-94). Most of the names given indicate Emmental as their home. Emigration continued for many years. Lists of heads of households in the Palatinate congregations in the years 1731 and 1732 name for the most part Bernese names, and those chiefly from the Emmental (Müller, 209-12; Menn. Jugendwarte II, 1921-22, 10). The present-day Mennonites in South Germany probably derive for the most part from the Emmental.

A further goal of emigration was Holland. Sympathetically and continuously the Dutch Mennonites concerned themselves for their harassed brethren, with financial support and petitions to their persecutors. They did their best in word and deed to ease the lot of their persecuted brethren. Some Swiss Brethren settled in Jülich and Berg in 1653. Driven out by the Jesuits, others fled to the Netherlands. On Sept. 10, 1660, eleven exiles left Bernese territory, of whom eight were from Emmental. Jakob Schlappach of Oberdiessbach, Ulrich Baumgartner of Langnau, Hans Zaugg of Signau, Peter Frider of Biglen, and Matthys Kaufmann, stopped at Koppigen. Later other Anabaptists attached themselves to this first small emigration to Holland. Benedicht Baumgartner (see Dürsrüttilied) and Christen Christen returned and were again incarcerated. In 1711 came the great emigration of about 346 persons (Müller, 307, 313). On the Emmental boat the overseers were Hans Bürki, Christen Gäumann, and Jakob Rechener. This ship to be sure did not harbor only refugees from the Emmental (e.g., from Bolligen, Stettlen, Rüeggisberg); on the other hand there were on the "Oberländer" boat, the "Thuner" boat, and the "Neuenburger" boat many persons of Emmental descent, so that Emmental here again furnished the greatest number of immigrants. Many returned because of homesickness and others settled in the Palatinate.

A new haven for emigrants was Prussia. Bern and Prussia negotiated. Prussia offered favorable terms and the investigation commission, headed by Benedikt Brechbill, brought back a good report. But the Swiss Brethren disregarded this goal. In greater numbers they settled in Neuchâtel (q.v.) which was at that time Prussian.

The greatest territory for emigration was, however, America. In 1699 the Bernese government intended to banish the Anabaptists to the East Indies, but this plan had to be abandoned. Instead in 1710 more than 50 persons were to be banished to America. The exiling took place, but the Dutch managed to bring it about that the plan of the "gracious patrician lords" of Bern ended in favor of the Brethren. A large number of the exiles had to be left behind in Mannheim, because of sickness, and the rest were freed in Holland. The Mennonites who from this time on emigrated from South Germany to America are probably almost all of Emmental origin. These numerous emigrations in the 18th and 19th centuries had serious consequences at home. In the Jura several congregations died out.

Love of home and kin induced many emigrants and exiles to return, where they were again persecuted, imprisoned, and exiled. With their intense love of home these Emmental exiles must have suffered severely from homesickness. (See the deeply emotional poem "Peter Krehbiel's Abschied aus der Schweiz," 1671, in Gem.-Kal., 1911, 46.)

The Bernese government made an effort to exile the Brethren as penniless as possible and keep their resources in the country. Numerous communities had Brethren estates to manage, as Roggwil, Seeberg, Huttwil, Dürrenroth, Sumiswald, Eriswil, Heimiswil, Trachselwald, Lützelflüh, Rüegsau, Rüederswil, Walkringen, Münsingen, Wichtrach, Oberdiessbach, Grosshöchstetten, Hasli, Lauperswil, Langnau, Trub, Eggiwil, Röthenbach, Schangnau. These lands were used for church and school purposes. From the income from the Anabaptist land, Lützelflüh paid its church musician and repaired the church tower. Sumiswald and Langnau returned some of the income to the descendants of the original owners; Langnau finally restored the land to its rightful heirs.

From about 1720 there was some lessening of persecution, although even until the middle of the 19th century harsh measures were taken by the cantonal government against the Mennonites. In 1743 the Anabaptist Commission (Täuferkammer, q.v.) was disbanded, and the "Anabaptist-hunters" disappeared from the country.

A new cause of emigration from the Emmental lay in the conflicts concerning military service. In 1737 it was decided that Mennonites who refused military service were to be sent to work in the silver mines. In 1745 those who failed to appear were charged with fines, and in 1780 they were threatened with banishment from the territory of Bern. The plan of 1786 to compel each Mennonite liable to military service to work a month per year in harvesting the crops of the poor was never carried out.

Through the influence of ideas of the French Revolution (q.v.) conditions improved greatly for the Emmental Mennonites. In 1798 they obtained formal recognition and toleration, but soon again a number of restrictions were made. In 1810 four leaders of the Emmental congregation, Niklaus Gerber, Christen Gerber, Ulrich Kipfer, and Christen Brand, made an appeal to the Bernese government, recalling the rights granted them in 1798. But about the same time the Langnau parish ordered a compulsory baptism of all who had not been baptized since the French Revolution, and in 1811 some 27 young Mennonites were brought to the state church by the local police and baptized by the minister Stephani. In 1823 the Mennonites had to hand over lists of all members, in order to enable the magistrates to determine whether proselytes were being made among the members of the state church. This system continued for several years in the Signau district of Emmental until as late as 1850.

After the formal toleration of 1798 the question of military services remained critical for more than a century. In 1815 the Mennonites of the canton of Bern were freed from military service on condition that they send a person as a substitute, or pay a special fee. From 1835 exemption from military service was granted on paying a special tax. In 1874 the matter was settled by a federal act for all Swiss citizens (see Military Service).

Notwithstanding these conditions only a few Emmental Mennonites emigrated after 1798. In January 1852 a number of them left, most of them settling in Adams Co., Ind., where they founded the town of Berne. Among them there were two Emmental ministers, Matthias Strahm and Ulrich Kipfer.

When we consider the difficult terrain, the complicated district and cantonal boundaries, the frequent visits of outside Anabaptists, the amazing love of home of the Emmental inhabitants, the almost unmatched steadfastness in faith, and the generally favorably-minded populace, then we understand why the century-long persistent attempts at annihilation on the part of Bern were unsuccessful against the Anabaptists of this region. Anabaptism had from the very beginning struck such deep roots that it outlived all the storms of persecution. Of course the numerous exilings and emigrations broke off some powerful limbs. But these branches have taken fresh root in other places and thus have helped to spread Anabaptism. The Emmental is the original home of many Mennonites in the Jura, France, Hesse, Bavaria, Baden, Württemberg, Galicia, and the Netherlands, as well as the American Mennonites who came from these places, and is thus the source of numerous Mennonite congregations in Europe and America.

There are no stone monuments to the suffering of the Brethren in the Emmental. But the recently discovered Anabaptist history speaks insistently of it. The books of local folklore say little about it. Ernst Marti created a literary monument in his novel, Zwei Häuser, zwei Welten (Two Houses, Two Worlds) (Frauenfeld, 1911). A living token is the still extant "Old Evangelical (Ana)baptist Church of Emmental" in Langnau.† A.-T.

Emmental Mennonite Church in the Swiss canton of Bern (q.v.) is the oldest of the Mennonite churches existing in Switzerland, and probably the oldest anywhere. It originated in 1530. Its history is a story of suffering without equal (see Bern and Emmental). Only after 320 years did the severely tried congregation, which remained steadfast, receive full liberty of conscience. This occurred through the Bernese cantonal constitution of 1846 and the Swiss federal constitution of 1848. Now its religious life could develop undisturbed. Meetings were held in the various homes; for example, in Bädertschen, in Zollbrück, in Frittenbach, in Stock, in Raingut, in Hälenschwane, in Bowil, in Kurzenberg, and other places. Outstanding men of God, like Ulrich Steiner (1806-77, commonly called "Steiner Ulli," preacher 1825, elder 1835) and Ulrich Habegger in Bädertschen, Ulrich Kipfer in Raingut, Johann Gerber in Stock (1838-1918, commonly called "Stockhannes," preacher 1875, elder soon after), Christian Wüthrich in Lihnen, and others, led the congregation.

In 1882 a monthly periodical called the Zionspilger (q.v.) was founded by Samuel Bähler and others, which has continued to be published by the Emmental congregation, for a number of years jointly with the Free Church.

By about 1800 the consequences of the old Ammann-Reist schism had entirely disappeared. But soon after, a new schism arose in the Emmental congregation. Samuel Fröhlich (q.v.), a member of the Reformed Church who had been compelled to break off his theological studies at the University of Zürich because of his revivalistic principles and his aversion to infant baptism, and Georg Steiger, an adherent of Fröhlich's, introduced some pietistic and revivalistic ideas among the members of the Emmental Mennonite Church about 1832; finally many of the members, including the preachers Christen Baumgartner and Christen Gerber, were rebaptized by Steiger, left the Mennonite church, and with a number of Fröhlichianer who had been members of the Reformed Church in 1835 founded the "Neutäufer" (see Apostolic Christian Church). The ministerial body (Dienerkonferenz) of the Mennonites, who were now sometimes known as "Alttäufer," excommunicated Baumgartner and Gerber, who had withdrawn from the congregation. The Emmental church was greatly weakened by the loss of so many members, but soon recovered.

On Oct. 21, 1888, a meetinghouse built in Kehr near Langnau with a residence for the pastor, financed by a building association, was dedicated (Menn. Bl., 1888, 132). In 1898 it was decided to build another meetinghouse at Aebnit near Bowil. Also in Bomatt near Zollbrück the congregation has its own church with an apartment. Meetings are also held in Rüederswil, Rüttimatt near Aeschau, Gartegg, Hälenschwand, Gohl, Fahrn near Lauperswil. On April 3, 1898, the congregation elected a "board of nine members for the conduct of congregational affairs. Elders and ministers of the church have the right to vote and to take part in the council." The board was chosen because "new fields of work kept opening, greatly increasing the work of the ministers; in order to relieve this burden somewhat and to distribute the work through the entire congregation, and in order to rouse and preserve the interest of individual members in welfare of the whole congregation. For this reason the separate districts of the congregation are to be given the highest possible consideration in the choice of members of the board." This was done. The first board was composed of Peter Kipfer in Raingut, Ulrich Salzmann in Langnau, Friedrich Stettler in Langnau, Hans Luginbühl in Aebnit near Bowil, Ulrich Steiner in Rüttimatt near Aeschau, Hans Lutki in Brügglen, Hans Mosemann in Hälenschwand, Ulrich Wittwer in Rüederswil, and Ernst Spengler in Langnau. On Dec. 24, 1899, the new statutes of the "Altevangelische Taufgesinnten-Gemeinde Emmental, located in Langnau," were accepted; thereby the congregation acquired corporation rights. As organs of the church they name (1) the members' meeting; (2) the board of directors; (3) elders, preachers, and deacons. At a members' meeting on Jan. 7, 1903, women were given the right to vote. The chief occupation is farming; but other occupations are also represented.

For religious life the congregational statutes give the following directive: "Furtherance of the religious and moral life of the members. Exercise, conduct, and promotion of the worship services of the old-evangelical confession, the acquisition of suitable buildings; support and care of the poor and sick within and without the congregation, support and promotion of charitable work in home and foreign missions." Religious life is very active, church attendance and Christian unity are gratifying. Variety is given the religious services through annual celebrations, missionary meetings, song services, and services held in the woods. Since 1898 communion is observed on the second Sunday of every month. Discipline is exercised from exhortation to exclusion from the church. Members are received upon request through the believers' baptism. If it is requested, immersion may be used. The idea of admitting believers who have shown their affection for the church without believers' baptism is often presented and opposed.

Instruction of youth lasts two years; here the catechism of the Badischer Verband is used. Sunday schools receive full attention and are conducted with non-Mennonites. The number of children in the Sunday schools is over 600. Boys' clubs, girls' clubs, and song clubs are very active. Love feasts (Agapen) and teas are held.

Bible courses (formerly always conducted by Jakob Hege, the traveling evangelist of the Mennonites of Baden) and "evangelization weeks" are conducted regularly in the various places. The latter are usually led by brethren from the outside (from the Jura churches, from Chrischona, from the Evangelical Association or the Free Church).

In the care of the sick the church took the lead in the Langnau community. Much is done for the poor, for home missions, and particularly for the China Alliance Mission.

Religious life is in the charge of the elders, ministers, and deacons. These offices are considered important, responsible positions. Usually the ministers preach trial sermons before they are ordained. Preachers and deacons are chosen from the laity; elders from the ranks of preachers and deacons. In 1900 three ministers were chosen by lot; since then they are chosen by the vote, usually by ballot, of the congregation. The elders from 1920 were John Kipfer, Fritz Gerber, and Fritz Mosimann. The membership in 1922 was 286.

In addition to the services held in the three meetinghouses (weekly at Kehr near Langnau, monthly at Aebnit near Bowil and at Bomatt near Zollbrück), monthly meetings are held (1955) at the following places: Fahrn (Rüderswil), Moosbad (Emmenmatt), Hauetershaus in der Gohl, Erlenbach (Signau), Gartegg (Langnau), Häleschwand near Schüpbach (Signau), Margelhof near Hellbühl (Luzern). The meetinghouse at Kehr was much enlarged in 1947. Hans Rüfenacht, the present (1955) pastor, graduate of St. Chrischona, was called to be preacher at Kehr in 1943 and ordained elder in 1944, also serving as editor of the weekly Zionspilger, published by the congregation, as successor to Elder Johann Kipfer (q.v.). In 1955 the congregation had about 350-400 baptized members.

In 1947 the Emmental congregation officially joined the State Church of the Canton of Bern, without surrendering either its membership in the Swiss Mennonite Conference or its congregational autonomy. Although this connection has made little or no change in the life of the congregation except to free it from taxes, it was deeply opposed by the rest of the Swiss Mennonite congregations, who feared its impact.

In 1937 the Emmental congregation adopted as its confession of faith a doctrinal statement prepared by its elder, Johann Kipfer, Glaubensbekenntnis der Altevangelisch Taufgesinnten-Gemeinde im Emmental. Kipfer sought to have the other Swiss Mennonite congregations adopt the confession but they refused when he declined to revise the articles which appeared to tolerate infant baptism. Emmerich, a city (pop. 16,300) in the Prussian Rhine province, six miles from the Dutch border, in which there was a small Mennonite congregation for almost four centuries, going back to 1534. The radical Münsterites presumably also had a following in Emmerich. Bernhard Peters in 1574 printed here a book on polygamy for the "king" Johann Wilmsen, who had his headquarters in Wesel and was executed in Dinslaken in 1580. Nothing is known about the early history of the peaceful Anabaptists. From 1663 to 1717 Hendrik van Voorst preached there. During that time, in 1672, Emmerich was occupied by the French for a short period, who attempted to catholicize the town. To convert the Mennonites they sent Dr. Formantijn (q.v.) from Paris; but van Voorst's superior knowledge of Scripture blocked the attempt (DB 1873, 58). On Dec. 1, 1676, the magistrate of Emmerich granted freedom from taxation for a church they were planning. They purchased a large lot on Steinstrasse and on it built a church and parsonage. In the 17th century a number of members of the prominent Block and Leeuw families in this congregation emigrated to Amsterdam and Haarlem, Holland. Hendrik van Voorst was succeeded by Abraham Fortgens. During a later pulpit vacancy Cornelis van Braght preached here occasionally. From 1742 on, the congregation was served by Dutch-speaking ministers, mostly trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary: Klaas de Vries 1742-44, Hermanus Jaarsma 1744-83, Joannes Stijl 1786-89, Matthias Hesseling 1788-98, Anthoni de Vries 1798-1817, J. Kuiper 1819-20. In 1820-49 the congregation was served by H. W. van der Ploeg, the pastor of Goch. The last preachers were P. W. van Zutphen 1850-73 and D. Lodeesen 1873-83. The church was then served by preachers of the neighboring Mennonite churches, Nijmegen, Zutphen, and Winterswijk. In 1740 there was a baptized membership of 65. In 1825 there was no church board and only a few members. By 1836 the membership had declined to 18, 1870 to 16, 1898 to 7, and 1912 to 5. For more than a century the congregation was financially supported by the Amsterdam congregation. Neff, vdZ.

Emmittsburg (Md.) Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located 10 miles southwest of Gettysburg, Pa., had services every six weeks during the 1880's and earlier. The congregation was under the care of the Mummasburg ministers, Daniel Shenk, bishop; Martin Wisler, preacher, and John Boyer, deacon. Information concerning the exact place of worship, period of continuance, and who were served is lacking. I.D.L.

Emmius, Ubbo (1547-1625), a Frisian historiographer, professor of history and rector of the University of Groningen, Netherlands, whose most important work, Rerum frisicarum historia (1596-1615), is a valuable source for Mennonite history. He was a violent opponent of David Joris (q.v.), concerning whose life and family relationships he gives important information in Ein grundtlick Bericht Van der Lere und dem Geist des Ertzketters David Joris . . . (1597, Dutch edition, Middelburg, 1599). In 1600 a refutation of the book appeared in Wederlegginghe, vande grove onbeschaemde vnde tastelicke Logenen van Vbbo Emmen . . . tegen het leven vnde leere van Dauid Iorissoon, written by Andreas Huygelmumzoon (Bernardus Kirchen). Emmius prepared a detailed answer (442 pages) which he had translated from the "Saxensche sprake" (East Frisian literary language in which the first book against Joris appeared) into the Dutch language and published in 1603 under the title Den David-Jorischen Gheest in Leven ende Leere, breeder ende wijdtloopigher ontdect en grondlicken verklaert, tegens den vermomden schaemtloosen D. Andreas Huygelmumzoon (The Hague). According to Emmius, Huygelmumzoon was Bernardus Kirchen, a physician and son-in-law of David Joris. Emmius seems to have restricted his opposition to David Joris and his followers. Although he must have had contacts with the Mennonites he does not seem to have written against them. He himself, a native of Norden, East Friesland, where he became rector of the school, had to leave his country because as Reformed he was opposed by the Lutherans of the city. C.K.

Empens, Gillis, was the author of a book published in 1627, now lost, concerning events in 1555, "how Menno joined with five brethren." Several citations in Dooreslaer (q.v.) lead to the supposition that this is a valuable historical work, especially on the Flemish between 1568 and 1627. It would therefore be of great value if this book could be found. (ML I, 584.) K.V.

Emsiger-Land (Emderland), located between Reiderland and Broekmer-Land at the mouth of the Ems River, East Friesland, Germany (the region between Emden and Greetsiel, q.v.), was a government district at the time of the Reformation under Edzard I. Later this territory between Emden and Greetsiel was divided into Emden Amt, Pewsum Amt, and Greetmer Amt. During the Reformation this was the area in which the largest number of Anabaptists of East Friesland were located. Melchior Hofmann began his work in Emden and Leenaert Bouwens baptized more than 450 persons in this area, most of whom were living in Emden and 't Falder, a suburb. That the Mennonites were soon located all over the rural area can be seen from the lists of names of persons who paid a protection fee to the government during the 17th and 18th centuries. These lists have been preserved in the archives of Emden and Aurich and been partly published by Müller. Mennonites were located in and around the following places as renters of farms, farm hands, etc.: Suurhusen, Osterhusen, Canum, Canhusen, Wirdum, Eilsum, Jennelt, Hösingwehr, Schoonorth, Greetsiel, Pilsum, Manslagt, Grothusen, Upleward, etc. Uko Walles, for example, for many years rented the estate of Sielmönken, a former monastery.

Emsiger-Land is sometimes also referred to as "Emderland." Blaupot ten Cate (Groningen I, 225 f.) reports that there were two (Groningen) Old Flemish congregations in this area in 1715, one in Emden and the other in Hösingwehr, the latter usually known as the Emderland congregation. In 1746 the congregation at Emden had 70 members and in 1762 there were only "five or six brothers" left, while the one at Hösingwehr was a little larger. Today there are hardly any Mennonites located in the villages north of Emden. Whether they all moved to the cities or gradually joined the Reformed and Lutheran churches is not known. The spread of the Mennonites in the rural area of Emsiger-Land and East Friesland in general, the number of congregations found here and their gradual disintegration has not been studied. Enchiridion Oft Hantboecxken van de Christelijcke Leere ende Religion, in corte somma begrepen, ten dienste van alle Liefhebbers der waerheit wt der Heyliger Schrift ghemaect, nv nieus gecorrigeert ende vermeerdert Door D.P. . . . Ghedruckt int Jaer ons Heeren M.D. LXIII. The Enchiridion (Handbook) by Dirk Philips (q.v.) is a collection of writings which had previously appeared separately. Dirk Philips himself prepared this edition, which was published in 1564 and contains eleven writings and five letters. The following writings were systematically (not chronologically) arranged with a detailed index: "Confession of Our Faith," "The Incarnation of Christ," "The True Knowledge of Jesus Christ," "An Apologia, or a Response," "About the Calling of Preachers and Teachers," "Admonitions About How to Deal with Those Who Are Committing Carnal Deeds," "About the True Knowledge of God," "An Explanation of the Tabernacle . . . ," "Concerning Regeneration and the New Creature," "Concerning the Spiritual Restitution," "Concerning the Church of God . . . ."

Like the Fundament-Boek (Foundation Book) of Menno Simons, this was to be a guide or handbook for the Christian to furnish him with basic doctrinal and ethical instructions in a day of distress and persecution. Dirk presents basic Christian convictions with some characteristics of Anabaptism such as the separation of the church from the world, strict church discipline, practical and fruitful Christian living, regarding the Dutch Anabaptist view on the incarnation of Christ, etc. Although he reveals a good knowledge of the Bible, deep Christian convictions, some knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, he scarcely quotes writers of the past or the days of the Reformation, not even his co-worker Menno Simons. Luther, Sebastian Franck, and Erasmus are each referred to once. The many reprints of the Enchiridion, however, prove that it filled a great need and fulfilled its intended purpose of being a guide for the Christian. F. Pijper, who made a special study of Dirk Philips and prepared and edited all his writings, which appeared as Vol. X of the Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica, says, "What the Loci communes of Melanchthon was for the Lutherans, the Confession of Beza for the French Protestants, and the Leken wechwyser for the Dutch Reformed, the Enchiridion was for the Mennonites" (BRN X, 4).

The first edition of the Enchiridion of 1564 (of which there are at least two copies extant, at Amsterdam and at Goshen), was reprinted with no change in 1578, 1579, 1600, and 1627. The last contains also Dirk Philips' response to two letters of Sebastian Franck, who, as a spiritualist, minimized the significance of a visible church, which view is criticized and corrected by Dirk Philips. The only known French edition of the Enchiridion appeared in a volume with the writings of Menno Simons and others and was published in 1626. The first German edition, edited by C. J. Conert and printed at Haarlem, Holland, in 1715, the above-mentioned response to Franck's letters at the beginning. The next edition (Basel, 1802) places these letters in the back of the book and also "Von der Ehe des Christen . . ." and "Schrift und Handlung von dem Evangelischen Bann . . . ." The first two American German editions (Lancaster, 1811; Neu-Berlin, 1851) do not contain the latter two writings, while the Elkhart edition of 1872 and the Scottdale edition of 1917 included them. The first English edition, translated by A. B. Kolb, appeared in Elkhart in 1910. The final Dutch edition of the Enchiridion and the other writings of Dirk Philips, with a scholarly introduction and annotations by F. Pijper, appeared in Vol. X of BRN. Five previously unpublished letters and two songs were added. According to Vos (Menno Simons, p. 330) a writing concerning avoidance, to be found in the Mennonite Archives in Amsterdam, is missing in this edition. For the various editions of separate writings of Dirk Philips, see Catalogus Amst., pp. 92-96.† C.K.

Endress, an Anabaptist of Solm, Hesse, Germany, whom Philip of Hesse vainly tried to release after a nine-year imprisonment. (Archiv für hess. Gesch. und Altertumskunde X, 1864, 371 ff.)

Engagement, the term most commonly used among North American Mennonites for betrothal (q.v.).

Engel (Engle, Angle), a Swiss family name represented in Europe and America by a number of Mennonite families. One of the significant members for Mennonite history was Ulrich Engel, who emigrated from the Canton of Basel to Pennsylvania in 1754. His son Jacob (Yokeli) (q.v.) became the chief founder of the Brethren in Christ (River Brethren). Another immigrant, Paul Engel, was in Germantown, Pa., before 1698, and is believed to have been a Mennonite. As early as the 17th century (after 1664) the name Engel appears among the Mennonites in the Palatinate; in the 18th century there were four branches of the Engel family in Sembach, descended from four sons of the first Engel settler's son and his wife, who was a Würtz. In 1936 there was still one Engel left in the Sembach congregation. In the 18th century there was a minister named Klaus Engel at Montreux near Belfort in Alsace.

As early as 1831 an Alsatian named John Engel settled near Metamora, Ill., and he was in turn followed two years later by Bishop Christian Engel, his father, who had been ordained in Europe, whereupon the Partridge congregation (now Metamora) was organized. Christian died in 1838, but in 1835 his son Joseph Engel (d. 1852), also ordained a bishop in Europe, located in Illinois and served the Partridge congregation. Christian and Joseph Engel were respectively the first and second Amish Mennonite bishops west of Ohio. The Brethren in Christ Church has had a large number of bishops, ministers, and deacons by the name of Engel or Engle. J.C.W.

Engel Cornelisz of Bergen, Dutch province of North Holland, was beheaded at The Hague on May 11, 1534, because he had joined the Anabaptists. He was in the group seized at Bergklooster (q.v.) en route to Münster. No particulars are known. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 744, 745.) vdZ.

Engel, Jacob (Yokeli), a founder of the Brethren in Christ (River Brethren), born in Switzerland Nov. 5, 1753, son of Ulrich and Anna Brechbill Engel, emigrated with his parents to America the next year, arriving at Philadelphia Oct. 1, 1754, and settling in Donegal Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., not far from Marietta and the Susquehanna River. Ulrich died about 1764 and his wife a few years later. Young Jacob was placed under the guardianship of Jacob Schock, whose daughter Veronica (1750-1816) he married on May 3, 1773. He was apprenticed to a weaver at 14. About the same time he is said to have joined his mother's church, Mennonite.

According to a number of Engel descendants, Jacob experienced a spiritual awakening at 18 but was not baptized until about 1778 when he and a man named Witmer are said to have immersed each other in a river, pledging secrecy as to who performed the first baptism. But another seven years passed before Jacob ventured to baptize any converts; it was in 1785 when he is said to have immersed eleven persons, after which the group met in a second story room in Jacob's house for a love feast and the communion service. The group soon chose Jacob as its first overseer or bishop. He had an active ministry. Besides being a weaver he is also said to have taught "English and German in a country schoolhouse near Stackstown." He died Feb. 10, 1832. His body was first interred on the homestead near Stackstown but was later removed to the East Donegal Cemetery of the Reichs Church near Marietta. Many of his descendants have been active in the church he founded. J.C.W.

Engelen, Cornelis van, b. about 1722 at Utrecht, d. 1793 at Leiden, a Dutch Mennonite pastor. He studied philosophy at the University of Utrecht, where he obtained his doctor's degree in 1745. Then he studied theology at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary 1747-49. In 1749-58 he served the congregation of Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, as a pastor. In 1758 he resigned because of bad health, but in 1764 he again became an active minister, serving the small congregation of Huizen, Dutch province of North Holland until 1769. Then he retired again and lived at Leiden until his death, devoting himself to the study of philosophy and literature. He was editor of several scholarly and popular philosophical reviews like De Philosooph, De Denker, and De Rhapsodist, and contributed to the many cultural periodicals (Spectatoriale Geschriften) of his age.

In 1767 he founded the Maatschappij tot behoudenis der verdronkenen, now Maatschappij tot redding van drenkelingen (Society for Rescuing of Drowning Persons), through which thousands of lives have been saved. Van Engelen, who indisputably was more interested in cultural matters than theological problems, was a typical and influential representative of 18th-century Dutch Mennonitism. vdZ.

Engen, Fred, played an important role in 1919-29 in the original settlement of the Manitoba Old Colony Mennonites in Paraguay. Having been a millionaire, but having lost his fortune, he entered the service of Gen. Samuel McRoberts of New York (Corporacion Paraguaya) in connection with the latter's land interests in South America, about the same time that the Manitoba Mennonites made contacts with McRoberts. It was he who called McRoberts' attention to the Chaco, making explorations there in 1919, and thus he is probably chiefly responsible for the selection of this area for Mennonite settlement. He worked for the Corporacion Paraguaya, mostly in the Chaco, until his death in 1929. In his memory the Chaco station at Km. 145 on the Casado railway was named Fred Engen.

England. The name "Anabaptist" in England first occurs in references to the movement on the Continent by that name. As early as 1526 a list of proscribed books included a tract by Zwingli against the Anabaptists. In 1528 and later Erasmus and Sir Thomas More corresponded about the "Anabaptistarum haeresis." William Barlow, in the pamphlet Lutheran faccyons (1531), described at length the movement in Switzerland and Germany as "the thyrde faccyon" of the Reformation. More, in the second part of the Confutation (1533), accused William Tyndale of becoming party to "those abominable heresies . . . the Anabaptists have added." Beginning about 1535 the name was also given to both foreign and native adherents of the movement present in England. Henceforth "Anabaptist" became a common pejorative of the English Reformation and throughout the 16th and 17th centuries was used with specific as well as generic connotations. Almost invariably the Latin form was employed, while the vernacular "rebaptizer" (German, "Wiedertäufer"; Dutch, "Wederdooper") retained the sense it had in patristic literature (see Anabaptism).

The first Anabaptists in England, according to various polemical treatments written in the 17th century and later, came from Holland subsequent to the seditious uprising at Amsterdam on May 10, 1535 (A Short History of the Anabaptists, 1642, 48). The source of this information is Lambertus Hortensius, a Dutch ecclesiastic and chronicler, who lived contemporary with the events and whose Tumultuum Anabaptisticarum was first printed at Basel in 1548, but he nowhere holds that these Anabaptists were the original ones in England. The 25 Dutch Anabaptists arrested and brought to trial at St. Paul's on May 25, 1535, 14 of whom were condemned and burned at London and other English towns on June 4, 1535, may have been members of the party mentioned by Hortensius. Anabaptists were present in England before 1535. During the fall or early winter of 1534 Anabaptist ministers ("leraers") from England were at Amsterdam. Anneken Jans, a devout Dutch Anabaptist and later a martyr, with her husband Arent Jansz fled to England from Den Briel in Holland in the summer of 1534. Six English and two Flemish persons who held Anabaptist views were arrested in connection with the importation and distribution of "the booke of Anabaptist confession" sometime in 1532-34. They had a place of meeting in London, and their leader was a certain Fleming named Bastian, described as "the bishop & reder of the Anabaptists." (Reference to a 1534 proclamation against the Anabaptists, which is sometimes found in secondary sources, is due to the misdating of a 1538 proclamation in David Wilkins' Concilia.) The relationship between Anabaptists and Lollards during the early Reformation in England is obscure. The spiritualistic character of Lollardy provided a fertile soil for the Dutch-Flemish variety of Anabaptism, and it may be said, at least in a generic sense, that "new Anabaptist was but old Lollard writ Dutch" (E. G. Rupp). Nevertheless, in the 1530's Anabaptism supplanted Lollardy in name as well as in doctrine and became the left wing of the English Reformation.

Apart from the missionary intentions of a Bastian and his associates, the great number of Anabaptists who reached England were Dutch and Flemish refugees escaping from the severe persecution of the Hapsburg rulers in their homeland. This escape was facilitated by the flourishing commerce across the North Sea as a result of the textile trade. Many of the Anabaptists settled in London and port towns on the east coast, including Hull, where their foreign character and nonparticipation in English life made it possible for them to retain their religious beliefs. For reasons of trade and diplomacy these foreign communities were often exempt from English laws, but when they began to influence the native population drastic action was taken against them. Although Henry VIII repudiated papal authority by the Act of Supremacy (1534) he endeavored to keep the English church orthodox in doctrine and practice in the Roman sense. His treatment of the Anabaptists was mild compared with Hapsburg policy, but, as R. W. Dixon observes, "there were more Anabaptists burned by Henry the Eighth than Lollards in the whole of the previous century."

The Anabaptists from the Netherlands came to England for the most part in two waves: in 1535-36 as a result of the persecution which followed the rise and fall of seditious Anabaptism at Münster; in 1567-73 when the Duke of Alva was in the Low Countries and sought to exterminate them along with other Reformation parties, particularly in the southern Netherlands. In July 1535, shortly after the Münster debacle, the agents of Thomas Cromwell passed word on to London that many Anabaptists were fleeing across the North Sea. One of the leaders who escaped to England was Jan Mathijsz van Middelburg, an important figure in the early movement. In spite of the prevailing severe persecution, the leaders of radical Anabaptism held a conference at Bocholt in Westphalia during the summer of 1536. An Englishman named "Henry" is reported to have borne the expenses of this meeting in order to bring about some unity in the movement, especially in behalf of peaceful practices. Jan Mathijsz van Middelburg represented the English Anabaptists at Bocholt, and with others took a stand against the seditious Münsterites and Batenburgers. The attitude in England in 1536-37 appears to have been lenient, but a change occurred in the fall of 1538. In September of this year Henry VIII received a warning about the "Anabaptist pest" from Philipp of Hesse and John Frederick of Saxony in Germany. Their communication, composed by Melanchthon, was prompted by an Anabaptist letter seized in Hesse which revealed that Anabaptists in Germany were in touch with members of the movement in England, and that the latter, among other activities, had published a book on the doctrine of the incarnation. Possibly as a result of this letter, on Oct. 1 Henry VIII issued a commission to Archbishop Cranmer "to search for and examine Anabaptists . . . and destroy all books of that detestable sect." In November 1538 two proclamations went out against Anabaptists: the first prohibited the printing, importation, and possession of their books, and the second ordered all rebaptized persons to leave the realm. There are records of some Anabaptists who recanted; three, however, were executed. One of these was the leader, Jan Mathijsz van Middelburg; he was burned at Smithfield on Nov. 29, 1538. On the same day Peter Franke and his wife, Flemish Anabaptists, were burned, the husband at Colchester and the wife at Smithfield. In the controversial literature of the time Franke is described as a "godly and perfect" young man, whose piety and steadfastness converted many at Colchester. It was in December 1538 that Anneken Jans and her traveling companion, Christiana Michiel Barents, were taken while on a journey from England to Delft. They were drowned on Jan. 7, 1539, at Rotterdam. Christiana and her husband, originally from Louvain in Brabant, were like Anneken and her husband, Anabaptist refugees in England. At her trial Christiana referred to Lijnken, another Anabaptist from Louvain, who had died in England. On Feb. 26, 1539, Henry VIII issued a proclamation of pardon to all heretics in England except those from abroad. This appears to indicate that a considerable number of English subjects were affected by the new beliefs and that persecution had done more to spread than to counteract them. (The account in Mart. Mir. E 450, concerning the execution at Delft of 31 Anabaptist refugees from England, who had fled in the winter of 1538-39, is the result of faulty reading of the original documents. These Anabaptist martyrs were residents at Delft and were arrested and condemned upon information given by Anneken Jans, who had come from England. Van Braght had taken the incident from P. J. Twisck's earlier martyr book. See K. Vos, "De Delftsche martelaren van 1538 en 1539 ontward," DB 1917, 160-67.) In the Six Articles Act of July 1539 the aging king reaffirmed a strict advocacy of the mass and other cardinal tenets of Catholicism. Among the score or more persons executed in 1540-46 for violation of this Act several were condemned as Anabaptists. Two of these were Maundeveld, "a French groom of the Queen," and Collins, an Englishman, who died at the stake in April or May 1540. Another account mentions the burning of two Flemish Anabaptists in June 1540. Because the offending charge was a wrong view of the sacrament, distinction between Sacramentarians and Anabaptists is difficult. In July 1540 Henry VIII again offered his people a general pardon, but Anabaptists of all kinds were excepted. The pardon listed the specific heresies of the Anabaptists, among which were: baptism is for adults and not for infants, refusal to "beare office or rule in the Commen Welth," nonswearing of oaths, "that Christe toke no bodily substance of our blessed lady," and "that all things be common."

The government of Edward VI, 1547-53, while promoting a Reformation on the continental pattern and in close co-operation with the leaders at Zürich and Geneva, continued the suppression of the Anabaptists. In January 1550, as in the previous reign, a commission was issued to Cranmer to search out and examine Anabaptists. On the whole, however, the reign was characterized by more leniency and efforts to meet the Anabaptist influence on positive and ideological grounds. License to establish a congregation for foreigners at London was granted, the king recorded in his journal, for "the avoyding of al sectes of Anabaptistes and such like." Archbishop Cranmer was particularly forbearing in his treatment of the Anabaptists, and he yielded to the use of violence only when heavy pressure was brought to bear upon him by the King's Council. Cranmer's leniency became so flagrant during the latter part of Edward's reign that John Hooper and John Knox, both stanch supporters of the Reformed party, were called in by the government to combat the Anabaptist menace in London and Kent. Cranmer was active, however, in seeking to convert Anabaptists by methods of persuasion. In April 1549 he and other church officials debated with a party of Anabaptists in St. Paul's at London. As a result three gave up their views; one of the members who persisted was Joan (Jane) Boucher, who, in spite of Cranmer's continued efforts to win her, was burned at the stake on May 2, 1550. Joan was a lady of some social standing in London, probably of noble blood, and appeared to have some influence in court circles. The particular view to which she tenaciously held was the Melchiorite doctrine that Christ in His incarnation took no substance of Mary's body. In June 1549 Cranmer won Michael Tombe, a tailor of London, from his Anabaptist views. In the spring of 1549 John Hooper complained to Bullinger how "Anabaptists flock to the place [where he gave lectures in London] and give me much trouble with their opinions respecting the incarnation of the Lord." In June of the following year he said that the counties of Kent and Sussex were "troubled with the frenzy of the Anabaptists more than any other part of the kingdom." During Edward's reign four pamphlets by Bullinger and one by Calvin against the Anabaptists were translated into English. They were published as follows: H. Bullinger, An Holsome Antidotus or counterpoysen (1548); J. Calvin, A short instruction for to arme all good Christian people (1549); H. Bullinger, A treatise or sermon . . . concernyng magistrates (1549); H. Bullinger, A moste sure and strong defence of the baptisme of children (1551); H. Bullinger, A most necessary & frutefull Dialogue (1551). Jean Veron, a French Reformed minister, prebend at Worcester, was an active opponent of the Anabaptists. He translated many of the Bullinger tracts and added long prefaces to them. During Elizabeth's reign he had a controversy with Robert Cooche, an Anabaptist, and wrote two pamphlets in defense of election. William Turner, "doctor of physick" and dean of Wells, also engaged Cooche in debate, especially on the doctrines of original sin and infant baptism. Turner's pamphlet, A preeseruatiue or triacle (1551), is a reply to Cooche on the first of these questions. The book by John Knox, An answer to a great nomber of blasphemous cauillations written by an Anabaptist, first published at Geneva in 1560 and later at London in 1591, is a lengthy rejoinder to a controversial work from the pen of Cooche which is no longer extant. John Hooper wrote A Lesson of the Incarnation of Christe, a tract against the Anabaptist view of the doctrine; it went through at least three editions during 1549-50. Thomas Cole, who at one time had Anabaptist leanings, wrote A godly and frutefull sermon . . . againste dyuers erronious opinions of the Anabaptistes and others (1553). Probably more influential than Cooche as a leader among English Anabaptists was Henry Hart, who, we are told, was among the Kentish sectaries who "were the first that made separation from the reformed church of England." Hart was the author of two tracts of admonition, A Godly newe short treatyse (1548), and A Godlie exhortation (1549).

While in the reign of Henry VIII the Anabaptist movement had grown in secret, in Edward's reign it came out into the open. The movement had its inception at the time the Melchiorite wing was dominant in the Netherlands and hence the English phase was characterized by spiritualistic tendencies. The names of some leaders are known; there is evidence of secret meetings and congregations among native Anabaptists in Sussex and Kent; Anabaptist leaders debated both privately and publicly, orally and in writing, with the ecclesiastics of Edward's reign; yet a large part of what one finds designated as Anabaptism pertains to views held or promulgated by persons who never separated from the national church. The principal doctrinal views considered Anabaptist during the early English Reformation were believers' baptism; the freedom of the will; intentional sin after conversion is unpardonable, and Christ in the incarnation took no substance from the flesh of Mary. These are the identical issues controverted by Martin Bucer against Melchior Hofmann at the Strasbourg disputation of 1533, and are views which characterized the Melchiorite phase of Anabaptism in the Netherlands and elsewhere. That much of English Anabaptism in this early period was nonseparatist may be due to Lollard precedents as well as to the spiritualistic strain of the Anabaptists who came to England. It may have had more separatist manifestations than we are able to discover today, but from the evidence available it is clear that it did not become an organized movement of gathered churches comparable to the Swiss Brethren and the Mennonites on the Continent. Not until Elizabeth's reign and the period of the early Stuarts were the separatist bodies to be formed, and then more from the spiritual ferment within the national church than from a direct lineal descent from the Anabaptists of Edward's reign.

The separatist development of Anabaptism in England may have been cut short by the Marian persecution. During the reign of Mary, 1553-58, the persecution of Anabaptists can scarcely be distinguished from that of Protestants in general. Since the greater percentage of the martyrs came from eastern counties and from the artisan classes, some historians assume that up to as high as 80 per cent may have been professing or fellow-traveling Anabaptists. Records do not exist to examine this question more precisely. John Foxe, in The Acts and Monuments (1563), the chief source of information, is not specific enough to enable one to identify Anabaptists. The persons in Foxe, for example, who were indicated as lay ministers, were no doubt Anabaptists. Apart from Foxe it is known that two Anabaptist ministers, Henry Hart and Humphrey Middleton, were imprisoned in Mary's reign. Middleton died as a martyr in July 1555. Hart and other Anabaptists in prison had running debates, evidently in writing, with prisoners in other parts of the prison. John Bradford, prebendary at St. Paul's and a martyr in January 1555, devoted much time in the last months of his confinement to an attempt to convert Hart to Reformed views regarding election. Hart's circle, to which Bradford was warmly attached, included a number of ministers from the counties of Kent and Essex.

When Elizabeth ascended the throne in 1558 she soon came into conflict with both native and foreign Anabaptists. Bishop Jewel, writing to Peter Martyr in November 1560, reported: "We found at the beginning of the reign of Elizabeth a large and inauspicious crop of Arians, anabaptists, and other pests, which I know not how, but as mushrooms spring up in the night and in darkness, so these spring up in that darkness and unhappy night of the Marian times." In 1559 Bishop Parker told Bullinger that the realm was full of Anabaptists and other heretics. In 1560 Elizabeth issued a decree ordering Anabaptists to conform or leave the country upon pain of imprisonment and confiscation of goods. The decree specifically mentioned "the Anabaptists and such Hereticks, which had flocked to the Coast-Towns of England from the parts beyond the Seas, under colour of shunning Persecution." An ecclesiastical commission was appointed to make registers and bring to trial all those who were tainted with the Anabaptist heresy. With the coming of Alva into the Netherlands and the institution of a policy of inquisition and persecution, thousands fled across the North Sea to England. The commission was slow in proceeding, but in 1562, Grindal, then Bishop of London, pushed the case of Adrian van Haemstede, a Flemish minister of the foreign Dutch Reformed congregation (Austin Friars), on a charge of encouraging Anabaptism by recognizing "the Anabaptists as his brethren and as weak members of Christ," to whom eternal life was also granted. When van Haemstede refused to recant he was excommunicated in 1562 and banished from England by royal decree. That there were Anabaptists among the Dutch and Flemish refugees is also affirmed by the Queen's proclamation of 1568, which states that they met in secret conventicles and had influenced the English populace. A later regulation ordered that investigation be made among both foreigners and native subjects who had adopted of the heretical principles of the Anabaptists. Refusal to conform meant leaving the country within 20 days. Richard Heath, as well as other historians, considers the secret conventicles of this period to be the germ cells of the Baptist Church.

In 1575 a number of incidents occurred pertaining to the arrest, trial, and persecution of Dutch Anabaptists in England. At London and Ely meetings were discovered by the authorities. Van Braght devotes 16 pages (Mart. Mir. E 1008-24) to accounts and letters concerning the experiences of the London group (not all details agree). On April 3, Easter Day, about 20 persons were apprehended at a gathering "beyond the Aldgate." In May they were cross-examined by the Bishop of London, with three preachers from the Austin Friars church serving as interpreters, on four points: the incarnation, infant baptism, the oath, and the office of the magistrate. Under threat and exposure to public disgrace some of the group recanted. One account states that 14 women were banished from the city and one youth was "scourged behind a cart." Some were released under bail and two escaped from prison. Two of the group, Jan Piers Wagemaker (also called Jan Pietersz) and Hendrick Terwoort, were burned at Smithfield on July 22, "in great terror, weeping and crying," according to one account. Members of the Austin Friars church, as well as the martyrologist John Foxe, interceded before the Queen and her Council in behalf of the imprisoned men, and Foxe obtained a reprieve to stay the execution for a month. Van Braght published a letter from the prisoners to Foxe, in which they reject his admonition to recant, and a confession of faith in which they elucidate their stand on the four points raised in their trial before the Bishop of London. A martyr ballad, "The Two Friends," is extant, and depicts in detail the death of Wagemaker and Terwoort. Van Braght also recorded the case of Hans Bret, apparently an English Anabaptist living at Antwerp, who was burned at the stake there in 1577 (Mart. Mir. D 1037-54). Bret wrote a letter to his brother in England who "had not yet come to the knowledge of the truth," and during the cross-examination replied that he himself had been in England. When asked, "What sort of people were those put to death (in England)?" he replied, "I believe they were Menno's."

About 1580 Anabaptism in England entered a new chapter. As a movement it was embraced and succeeded by the Separatist movement of the Brownists and Barrowists, culminating in the formation of the Congregationalist and Baptist denominations in the 17th century. Burrage has shown how congregations of Separatists formed at scattered places in England in 1588-1641, but the movement found its principal centers in the areas where Anabaptism had been strongest, in London and in the southeast and middle-east counties. The earliest leaders, Robert Browne and Robert Harrison, organized a congregation at Norwich in 1580 which fled to Middelburg in the Netherlands during the following year. Separatism in London found its leaders in Henry Barrow, John Greenwood, and John Penry, all three martyrs by 1593. The same year the congregation migrated to Amsterdam with Francis Johnson as pastor. It is to these origins that the Congregationalists owe the inception of their church. A Separatist congregation on the same pattern formed at Gainsborough about 1606, of which John Smyth was one of the pastors. In 1608 this group escaped to Holland and organized two congregations there, one under Smyth at Amsterdam, the other at Leyden with John Robinson as pastor. To the Smyth congregation, which accepted adult baptism as a result of contact with Dutch Mennonites, the General Baptists owe their origin, especially to the segment which Thomas Helwys and John Murton led back to England in 1612. A number of members from Robinson's church were among the Pilgrim Fathers when they sailed for the new world in 1620.

All of the Separatist groups were at various times labeled "Anabaptist" by their enemies, as the prolific anti-Anabaptist literature of the first half of the 17th century testifies. It is necessary to distinguish between the generic and the specific use of "Anabaptist" during this period as well as in the 16th century. Robert Bailie, for example, wrote a work against all left-wing groups, entitled Anabaptism, the True Fountaine of Independency, Antinomy, Brownisme, Familisme, and the most of the other Errours (1647). Bailie succeeds to his own satisfaction in finding certain doctrinal similarities and historical connections among these groups which justify, for him, placing them all in one family. Actually, he followed a precedent common in his own time and earlier of using the term "Anabaptist" to label all kinds of nonconformity. "Anabaptist" became synonymous with "heresy" or "fanaticism." In the 16th century the term was used to refer to contemporary Pelagians ("free-willers"), to Antinomians, to Familists, and to other groups which had no relationship to the historic Anabaptist movement. Archbishop Whitgift accused T. Cartwright of being an Anabaptist. In the 17th century the term sometimes refers to Socinians, Ranters, Quakers, and other groups, as well as to the Independents and Baptists. This indiscriminate usage calls for great caution and discernment on the part of anyone making use of English Anabaptist sources. "Anabaptist" however did also have a specific use. In the 16th century it meant the English wing of the Dutch movement begun by Melchior Hofmann, as the official records assume. In the 17th century, from the 1630's onward, it was applied specifically to the Baptists, although it never lost its connotation of "fanaticism" or "enthusiasm." The name "Baptist" was first used in 1641. The literature on the Anabaptists, together with the subject of baptism, is enormous in quantity throughout the 17th century in England. Henry Martyn Dexter, whose bibliography, Collections toward a Bibliography of the First two Generations of the Baptist Controversy in England, is not complete, lists no less than 401 separate works published from 1618 to 1700.

The connections between Anabaptism and Separatism do not submit to exact statement. It has been pointed out that the strongholds of both movements were located in the same geographical areas. As for historical connections, the most plausible were those between Robert Browne and Anabaptists in London and Norwich, but conclusive evidence has never been presented. It is on theological and spiritual grounds that the evidence is more convincing. The Separatist doctrine of the church and to a certain extent its attitude toward the state are characteristically Anabaptist. Both groups believed in a visible church of true believers, and that the civil magistrate had no authority in ecclesiastical matters. The biographer of Henry Barrow, F. J. Powicke, has pointed out that he was an Anabaptist in every respect except in regard to the concept and practice of adult baptism, yet Barrow strenuously denied any connection with the Anabaptists. One may not overlook the strong Calvinistic spirit and position of the Separatist movement, owing to the influence of Thomas Cartwright and others at Cambridge where most of its leaders were educated. Only in the case of Smyth and his colleagues was there a departure from the predestination doctrines, with the result that the General Baptists became Arminian in their theology. It is possible that this was a result of their sojourn in Holland. But the Anabaptists in England in the 16th century contended strongly for the doctrine of free will and were frequently labeled Pelagian.

Relationships between Anabaptism and Quakerism have also not been clearly established. Quakerism, which arose about 1644 around the prophetic and missionary leadership of George Fox, was in many respects more akin to historic Anabaptism than any of the segments within Separatism, especially in regard to the doctrine and practice of nonresistance. The English historian, G. P. Gooch, states that a large number of "Baptists" went over to the Quaker movement during the Puritan Revolution when no stand was taken by their leaders against participation in Cromwell's army.

The presence of Anabaptism in England is reflected in the confessional literature of both the Anglican and Presbyterian churches. The earliest formularies, the Ten Articles (1536) and The Bishop's Book (1537), as well as The King's Book (1543), name the Anabaptists and oppose their view of baptism. In a much more inclusive way the views of the Anabaptists are rejected in the Forty-Two Articles of 1553. E. J. Bicknell observes that, although the Anabaptists are mentioned but twice (in regard to original sin and the community of goods), they are opposed in at least half of the articles. The Articles "are a double-edged weapon" designed to smite medieval teaching and abuses on the one hand, but "even more keenly the teaching of the Anabaptists" on the other hand (The Thirty-Nine Articles, London, 1955, pp. 11-12). This Edwardian confession is reflected in the better-known Thirty-Nine Articles, first agreed upon in 1562 although in general the latter reflect a greater latitude of opinion. Article 38 states that "the riches and goods of Christians are not common . . . as certain Anabaptists do falsely boast," while Anabaptist views on war, the oath, and the magistracy are reflected in other articles. The Westminster Confession (Presbyterian) of 1647 also opposes several Anabapist doctrines, and the Scottish confession of 1560, in article 23, rejects "the error of Anabaptists who deny baptism to appertain to children."

English literature, particularly of the 16th and 17th centuries, also bears evidence of the Anabaptist movement in England. The name "Anabaptist" does not occur anywhere in Shakespeare (1564-1616), although "Brownist" does, but at least one Elizabethan scholar, J. F. Danby, has suggested Anabaptism as one of the sources of Shakespeare's equalitarian ideas, especially in King Lear. In Edmund Spenser's (ca. 1552-99) The Faerie Queene, the virtuous Artegall debates with and destroys the "mighty Gyant" of communistic Anabaptism. The allegorical encounter is related in 26 stanzas (Book V, Canto II, stanzas xxix-liv). Some commentators see here in Spenser "a mind which was at once conservative, aristocratic, and influenced by Calvinistic theology," opposing "the general restlessness of the times and growth of democratic ideals." At any rate, the subject was of current interest to Spenser's readers, and contemporary pamphleteers such as Robert Crowley (d. 1588) kept it fermenting in the public mind. Thomas Nashe (1567-1601), in contrast to the decorous Spenser, relates in a racy manner the story of the Anabaptists at Frankenhausen and Münster in The Unfortunate Traveller (1594). Although he confuses the two events, he appears to follow Sleidanus faithfully enough to arrive at the traditional interpretation. Nashe is interested chiefly in telling a story, but he does betray a sympathy with the victims, the account of which no doubt reminded him and his readers of the current executions in London. Nashe's polemical tracts also contain references to Anabaptists, and John Greenwood and other Barrowist leaders are often mentioned.

The 17th-century literature relating to Anabaptism, as already indicated, is enormous in quantity. Most of the upwards of 400 pamphlets and books are of primary interest from a theological point of view, but some have literary merit, such as those by John Taylor, Thomas Hooker, and Richard Baxter, to mention only a few. One finds references to Anabaptists in both Milton and Bunyan, but more important is their spiritual affinity to the Anabaptist way of life, a discovery which has led more than one Baptist historian to adopt them into the brotherhood. In more secular literature, especially in the drama, one finds a satirical and even farcical treatment of the Anabaptists and their views. This can be seen already in the comedy of the Jacobean satirists, where with topical Puritanism it becomes a special object of ridicule. One sees a similar treatment in the "character," a type of literature which was exceptionally popular in the 17th century. In the early collections of "characters," such as those of Overbury and Earle, where the type is treated in a short, concise essay in imitation of the classic models of Theophrastus, the Anabaptist and Brownist do not occur. But in the later imitations, particularly those of Francis Wortley and Samuel Butler, there is a riotous castigation of the sects in both prose and verse. One of Butler's rhyming "characters," in the manner of Hudibras, begins as follows:

Among these rank rebellious Weeds,
The Anabaptist next succeeds;
These Saints derive their way of fooling
From Sutor, Humor, Knipperdoling,
Hut, Hetzer, Hofman, and a Crew
Of frantick Fools, the Lord knows who . . . .

Satirical references to Anabaptists appeared also in the 18th century, chiefly in the drama and the periodical essay, but soon declined. The name "Baptist" replaced the older label, which remained, however, as a term to denote religious fanaticism or "enthusiasm."

If one surveys the results of current research regarding Anabaptism in England one might make the following observations. For the 16th century we have available only scanty information concerning a movement which for the most part was an underground one. What is known comes chiefly from the sources which sought to suppress it. How deeply and extensively the movement penetrated into English life, who its leaders were, where its congregations were located, what its literature was, and how its theology was taught and practiced—these are all questions concerning which we know very little. In the absence of such detailed information possibly the best way to estimate the scope of the movement and the importance of its achievement is to note its impact on the times. This can only be hinted at here, and a few tentative conclusions stated. One way to view it is to hold that, as a distinct movement, Anabaptism came to an end about 1580 when its message and genius gained acceptance and was linked with other elements in the Separatist movement, and that it probably reached its highest peak of life and activity during the reigns of Edward VI and Mary (1547-58). It is also possible to view the movement as one which was effectively crushed and whose spiritual potency was suppressed until it was granted a better opportunity to develop within the Separatist groups of the 17th century. Whichever view one may adopt, it is clear that the Anabaptist views of the church and state were embraced by the Separatists. One may not claim that Anabaptism was the exclusive source of these insights, but the evidence is overwhelming that it was a major influence. Ernest A. Payne quotes H. N. Brailsford as saying in 1948, "The English Puritan Left can be understood only when we realise that it drew much of its inspiration directly from the Swiss, German, and Dutch Anabaptists." The influence of Anabaptism on Independency and the later Congregational movement can be traced especially on the form of church government and on the character of church worship and life. Much more radical was its influence on the movement which bore the name "Anabaptist" the longest, the General Baptists, who were the closest English counterpart to the main-line Anabaptists on the Continent (Mennonites, Täufer). In another sense, however, especially in reference to the practice of nonresistance and a radical nonconformity, the purest expression of the Anabaptist spirit is to be sought in Quakerism, which dates from the year 1644. Thus we see that Anabaptism in England was no spiritual backwater, not merely a fanaticism held by Dutch refugees whose influence on English Protestantism was only peripheral, but that it deposited a ferment of religious ideas which were finally absorbed into both English and American church and secular history. English Language. All the Mennonite immigrants to North America, except a very few from France in the late 19th century, were German-speaking when they came, and accordingly established their worship in the German language. The English edition of the Dordrecht Confession (q.v.), published in 1712 in Amsterdam and in 1727 at Philadelphia by the Pennsylvania Mennonites, is no exception to this, for it was published for the sake of the English-speaking public of the region in which they settled. German hymnbooks, prayer books, catechisms, and devotional books were used exclusively until well into the 19th century. In the Mennonite congregations and groups established before the 1874-80 immigration from Russia the definite change-over from German to English did not begin until the last quarter of the 19th century. The change came first in Virginia, where the Dordrecht Confession in English was published in 1810, and the first English Mennonite hymnbook in 1847, the latter antedating the next one, published at Elkhart in 1880, by 33 years. The small Reformed Mennonite group also issued an English hymnbook in 1847 at Lancaster and apparently shifted early into English; Herr's first book appeared in an English translation as early as 1816. The first English church paper was the Herald of Truth (MC) at Chicago (1864), later Elkhart, but the German counterpart, Herold der Wahrheit, continued publication until 1902. The next English church organ was the Gospel Banner (MBC) 1878, followed by the Mennonite (GCM) 1885. The Words of Cheer (MC), a children's Sunday-school paper, appeared only in English, beginning in 1876.

The first English catechism edition was that of 1849, published by the Oberholtzer (GCM) group, but not reprinted until 1874 (Elkhart, MC). The popular Gemüthsgespräch did not come out in English until 1857 at Lancaster. Both of these catechisms are still being printed in German. The prayer book Ernsthafte Christenpflicht has never been translated into English. English editions of other European Mennonite works appeared as follows: Martyrs' Mirror 1837 at Lancaster, 1886 at Elkhart; Dordrecht Confession 1811 at Niagara, Ont., 1814 at Doylestown, Pa.; Schabalie's Wandering Soul 1834 at Carlisle, Pa.; Menno Simons' Foundation Book (John Herr edition) 1835 at Lancaster; Menno's Complete Works 1881 at Elkhart. All of these had prior German editions in America. The first original book or pamphlet publication in English was A. Gottschall's Description of the New Creature of 1838, which appeared simultaneously in both languages at Doylestown. The next such work was an English edition of Heinrich Funk's Spiegel der Taufe in Virginia in 1851, reprinted in 1853 at Skippack, Pa. The Lancaster meeting calendar appeared in English as early as 1854. Only scattered English pamphlets appeared before 1880. In that year John F. Funk began the publication of Sunday-school helps in English (also German); the Sunday school no doubt contributed greatly to the use of English. The real change to English came with authors who wrote only in that language, the first of these being Daniel Kauffman (MC), with his first book in 1898, A Manual of Bible Doctrines. J. S. Coffman, then president of the Elkhart Institute board, stated in his dedication address for the Institute building at Elkhart in 1896: "Here we are at an epoch that marks a transition period in our beloved brotherhood. It is really a final crossing over a large body of our people, the way having been gradually prepared, from the German language into the language of the country." The turn of the century was the pivot of the language change, although the use of German tapered off gradually. In many congregations some German preaching continued until World War I. In the transition period 1875-1900 preachers were often ordained specifically to preach English alongside of the regular German preaching of the older ministers. German Sunday-school classes have persisted longer particularly in those congregations with an Amish background. The Church and S.S. Hymnal (MC) of 1902 had a German appendix, and a special edition of the Church Hymnal, Mennonite, of 1927, with a German appendix, was prepared for the Franconia Conference, where the use of German has persisted longer than in any other section of the Mennonite Church (MC). The priority of German in the General Conference Mennonite Church in the third quarter of the 19th century is evidenced by the fact that the Wadsworth School (q.v.) for the training of ministers (1868-78), in existence six years before the Russian immigration, imported its chief teacher from Germany and conducted all its work in German.

In the communities established by the immigrants from Russia 1874-80 the change to the English language came a generation later. World War I forced the change in many places because of the severe stigma placed upon the German language; even the label "pro-German" and "traitors" was tagged on its users. In some communities the use of German in public was even forbidden. Some congregations hastily shifted to English for their main worship services. By 1920-25 the change was relatively complete in the United States except for the Old Order Amish and Hutterites. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ used English primarily from the beginning in 1874, although some German was also used, as is evident from the fact that their organ, the Gospel Banner, had a German edition 1880-95, and a few disciplines were printed in German in the early days.

In Canada the matter is quite different. To this day all the Russian immigrant communities maintain German as the primary language in church life, both in worship and in official conference proceedings. The arrival of 20,000 immigrants from Russia in 1922-25, and 7,000 again in 1948-52, has further fastened the German and delayed the change to English. The only exception to the above is the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, which has moved far into English. There is scarcely a congregation in any other group of Russian background, except the Bethel Mission (GCM) in Winnipeg, and certain of the Kleine Gemeinde (EM), which uses English in its main worship service in 1954. The two Bible Colleges in Winnipeg still use German as the major language of instruction. The fear, however, of the loss of German has led to the organization of a special intergroup Mennonite organization in Manitoba for the retention of the German language, a sign that the forces working for the change to English are more powerful than appears on the surface. The Mennonite Church (MC) in Canada has followed the pattern of that group in the U.S.A.

The difficulties for a religious group in a language transition are many and complicated. The older generation has real difficulty in providing religious literature with its own emphasis in the new language. It is difficult to man schools in what is a foreign language. For a time the use of the former or mother language is almost inevitable. Deep feeling of reality and loyalty attach to old vocabularies, and the prestige of the older generation is at stake, so that there is danger of real loss of religious values.

On the other hand the German-English problem has been the cause of serious damage to the Mennonite brotherhood in North America. Many young people have been alienated from the church because of the delay in the change, while others who have remained in the church have often been denied adequate spiritual resources in their own working language, whether in worship and preaching or in available literature. Also the retention of the German language in an English-speaking culture without any real attachment to a German culture has at times led to group and personal impoverishment both culturally and spiritually. The worst forms of this impoverishment have occurred in those groups which have not had adequate German schools of their own, such as the Old Order Amish and other Pennsylvania-Dutch-speaking groups, but also the Old Colony Mennonites with their inadequate elementary German schools and no literary production. The continued exclusive use of dialect in the home, whether Pennsylvania-Dutch or Low German, has been a further handicap. Finally the barrier of a different language has seriously inhibited evangelism and outreach, has at times alienated the group from the national culture, and has intensified the phenomena of ingrowth and inferiority feeling. The struggle over the introduction of English has also contributed to schismatic tendencies at times, particularly in the mid-19th century in such cases as the Old Order Amish and Old Order Mennonite divisions. Enid, Okla., is a city (pop. 36,000) in the state's wheat belt, built on an economy of agriculture, petroleum, and industry. Enid's trade territory, extending especially to the west and north, covers Mennonite communities with 15 separate congregations: 8 G.C.M., 5 M.B., and 2 Church of God in Christ, Mennonite, their membership totaling more than 2,000. The city has many churches, including 3 Mennonite churches: 1 M.B., and 2 G.C.M., Bethel and Grace. More Mennonites continue to move to Enid. Some come to retire and others to make a living. A number of Mennonite students generally attend Philips University, a church-related college of more than 1,000 students. H.T.N.

Enid Bible School and Academy (Enid Bibel- und Akademie-Schule), Enid, Okla., was founded in 1921 by the local Mennonite Brethren and administered by a committee of five. The emphasis of the school was on Bible and German. In 1925 a school building was erected and in 1938 the school was discontinued. Among its teachers were P. E. Nikkel and A. J. Dick. C.K.

Enid (Okla.) Mennonite Brethren Church, sometimes known as the Enid City Church, was organized in 1925 under the direction of the Home Mission Committee of the M.B. Southern District Conference. P. C. Grunau shepherded this congregation for 18 years. Services were at first held in a mission building at 300 East Maple. When this proved to be too small, a church building was purchased at Sixth and East Broadway in 1926. The 1955 membership was 189. Abraham Wiens, A. A. Steinle, A. F. Vogt, and Menno Flaming have served the church as deacons. Lando Hiebert and Jack Adrian served the church recently as pastors. The pastor in 1955 was C. E. Fast. Besides these the following have assisted in the ministry: H. P. Dyck, J. E. Schmidt, H. H. Bartel, and A. P. Koop. A.F.V.

Enkenbach, Palatinate, Germany, a small village about six miles northeast of Kaiserslautern, the location of a new Mennonite Home for the Aged, Friedenshort (q.v.), established in 1949, and a resettlement project for Mennonite refugees from Danzig and West Prussia. The Enkenbach settlement, begun in 1953, was planned to provide for 60 refugee families in apartment houses each containing 4 four-room dwellings. Each refugee family received a government loan for 80 per cent of the cost. Since the refugees did not have any capital at all for the remaining 20 per cent, the MCC furnishes the equivalent through the free labor of young American Mennonite conscientious objectors, who assisted in building the houses as their alternative service to meet the requirements of the United States law for a two-year term of work (I-W service). The MCC unit which performed this work in Germany is called PAX. Fifteen PAX boys began to work at Enkenbach in the summer of 1953. The PAX service constitutes a testimony of Christian love in sacrificial service "in the Name of Christ" and for peace. The administration of the Enkenbach resettlement project is in the hands of a German Mennonite organization setup for this purpose known as Mennonitische Siedlungshilfe e.V., with headquarters at Ludwigshafen, Richard Hertzler, director. It was planned to build a meetinghouse with PAX help and organize a congregation.

In recent years numerous large Mennonite meetings with up to 1,000 participants have been held in Enkenbach, using the facilities of the Home for the Aged.† H.S.B.

Enkhuizen, a town in the Dutch province of North Holland, formerly on the Zuiderzee (pop. 10,000), has since the middle of the 16th century been the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 36 persons here. During the days of the persecution the government was favorably inclined to them. When the mayor Sievert Meinertszoon Bokgeest was informed (1558) that the Mennonites were holding secret meetings, which the government was obliged to prevent, he sent them warning, so that they could escape arrest. The magistrate likewise showed no great interest in persecuting them. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror lists the following martyrs executed in Enkhuizen: Dirk Pietersz Krood, Pieter Trijnes, Claes Roders, and Pieter Claes Jansz. The year of the execution is not known. None of them were citizens of Enkhuizen. Whereas the membership was large in the 16th century, it declined sharply according to the report of the Reformed preacher Bogerman in 1603. The division into various factions had a deterrent influence.

Little is known concerning the history of the various congregations. There were at least two Mennonite congregations in Enkhuizen. The larger of these belonged to the Waterlander branch; the other, which was always small and in 1733 had only 22 members, belonged to the Groningen Old Flemish. The Waterlander congregation sent a representative to the conference of this branch meeting at Amsterdam in 1647. In 1760 difficulties with the magistrates arose in the ordination of Reinhard Rahusen (q.v.) and in 1765 in the ordination of Hendrik van Gelder, since the mayors of the city claimed the right of confirming the ordination. The church council did not yield, and both ordinations proceeded without disturbance. In 1765 the union between the (Groningen) Old Flemish and the Waterlander congregations took place, the small congregation in near-by Venhuizen (q.v.) having merged with the Waterlander congregation of Enkhuizen in 1735. Evidence of a willingness to sacrifice is shown in the contributions of this congregation to the relief fund for foreign needs: 117 guilders in 1727; 112 in 1733; 203 in 1736. From 1840 until his retirement in 1888, the pastor was D. Harting (q.v.), a man of great learning, especially in the Greek. He was the founder of the Doopsgezinde Bijdragen. During his pastorship in 1860, the church, parsonage, and custodians' residence were restored. From 1888 to 1900 this church was united with Medemblik. From 1901 to 1907 the minister was H. Bakels (q.v.). He was followed by S. Spaans 1907-17, F. F. Milatz 1918-29; after a vacant pulpit for four years, the congregation joined with Hoorn (q.v.) to provide ministerial care (1933).

In 1847 the membership was 40 (90 souls). At present (1953) it numbers 112 baptized members. The congregation has a youth club and a choir. K.V., vdZ.

Enno I, Count of East Friesland, 1528-40, the son of Edzard I (q.v.), at first attempted to direct the Reformation into Lutheran channels in his realm. Unpleasant experiences with Lutheran clergy and a letter from Prince Philip of Hesse deterred him. External wars kept his attention from religious matters. His measures against the Anabaptists were not adequately enforced. On Jan. 19, 1530, he and his brother Johann issued an edict sternly ordering the Anabaptists to leave the realm before Shrovetide on penalty of loss of life and goods. But nothing happened; Melchior Hofmann could venture to preach in the vestibule (Geerkammer) of the Emden church and publicly baptize several hundred adherents. But Obbe Philips' statement that Enno was favorably inclined toward Hofmann's doctrine and had been moved to tears in a conversation with him is surely erroneous. On May 12, 1534, Enno sent a letter to Emden, urging that a close watch be kept on the Anabaptists and that definite steps be taken against them. In 1535 he issued a stern edict against them, not only commanding the baptism of infants, but also threatening to punish rebaptism with severe penalties. Nevertheless the Anabaptist movement grew rapidly in his reign. When he died, his widow Anna (q.v.) of Oldenburg took over the government. She favored the Anabaptists, and only imperial pressure induced her to expel them. NEFF.

Enno III, Count of East Friesland, 1599-1625, though not favorable to the Mennonites, apparently did not institute proceedings against them until 1612, when the complaints of the Protestant clergy in the city of Norden caused him to do so. On Nov. 23, 1612, he issued an order to the bailiff of Norden to keep close watch on the Mennonites and to require a list of the houses where they lived and where they held their meetings, and who their pastor was. Apparently little was done, for the Protestant preachers complained again, and on Nov. 20, 1613, a second order was issued to the bailiff: with several councilors he should break up a Mennonite meeting where a wedding was to be performed and arrest the preacher. This he did, and four days later received a letter of praise from the count, which also instructed him to release the preacher (bishop) with the warning that if, contrary to the mandates, he continued to hold their meetings, a fine of 5,000 talers would be required of them and the house in which they met would be confiscated. This decree was to be announced in the pulpits and posted in the customary places.

For eight years the Mennonites were unmolested.

On New Year's Eve in 1621 an order was issued to the mayor and council of Norden to make a list of all Mennonites and all others who did not adhere to the Reformed or Lutheran creed and send it to the count. The last decree Enno III issued against the Mennonites, Sept. 25, 1622, was unusually harsh. No matter what complaints any Mennonite made, he was not to receive justice; anyone making a complaint against them was to have it speedily satisfied. Both audience and preacher were to be arrested if they continued to hold their meetings. Any laxity in enforcement would meet with the count's disfavor. But this mandate, like the others, was little or not at all enforced. NEFF.

Enno Ludwig, Count of East Friesland 1647-60, was elevated to the rank of prince April 22, 1654. In 1654 he sent a letter to the emperor protesting against his confusing the Mennonites with revolutionary Anabaptists, and to the imperial court he vouched for their loyalty as subjects and their love of order and peace. Nevertheless he obstinately refused to grant them full recognition in his realm. Using his elevation of rank as a pretext he denied them their former protection. It was without doubt a question of money with him; he hoped to extort from them the 6,000 talers of debt his predecessor had made with the Mennonites. They declared themselves ready to pay the sum if he would release them from the annual protection fee for a definite period, and from the obligation to render the oath by raising their fingers; they requested instead the "Mennonite oath," as it had been granted them by Count Ulrich II (q.v.). The negotiations dragged on until 1658.

On March 9, 1658, a new letter of protection was prepared for the Mennonites. It recognized the separation of the Uckowallists (q.v.) from the Mennonites, who were known as "Flemish, Frisians, and Huiskoopers" (q.v.). This differentiation is made in all the later letters of protection, the last of which was issued by King Frederick II. Only the latter group received this letter. It ruled that the Mennonites were to hold their services quietly, but without interference, and that visiting preachers might instruct them in God's Word. This was a definite step forward. The very poor were excused from paying the protection fee, and those without capital should pay "according to our findings." The Mennonites were obligated to report marriages to the local pastor, but the fee was to be determined alone by those to be married. Of great importance is the order to the military authorities at Norden, Leer, and Aurich, forbidding them to draft Mennonites or punish them for refusing to serve. Finally the Mennonites were specifically told that the additional tax required at this time should never again be levied against them or their descendants. At the same time instructions were issued to the courts that the Mennonites—not the Uckowallists—should use an expressly stated formula in place of the oath.

On May 29, 1658, a letter of protection was also given to the Uckowallists. Its content was almost identical with that granted to the Mennonites, except that the Uckowallists were not required to be married in the church or be registered in the church books. They were thus treated more like an independent brotherhood. This favorable treatment, the reason for which is not known, was, however, of short duration. NEFF.

Enns, a town in Upper Austria, on the Enns near its junction with the Danube. In the late 1520's it was one of the Anabaptist centers of Austria. (ML I, 639, 255.)

Enns (Entz, Ensz, Enss, Ens, Enz, Enten), a Mennonite name in the rural Flemish congregations of West Prussia. Fifty-eight families of this name were counted in 1776, 275 persons in 1910, and 197 persons in 1935. Members of this family migrated to Russia and America. In South Russia they mostly adopted the form Enns. Mennonite ministers carrying the family name are now located in Kansas, California, Arkansas, Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Ontario. Important members of the family included Abraham Ensz, son of a Heubuden farmer, with rationalistic and socialistic tendencies, who offered subscriptions in 1873 for a book on his grandfather (Das Vermächtniss des Mennoniten-Aeltesten Abraham Regier in Gurken-Heubuden. Ein Beitrag zur Klärung und Versöhnung der Mennoniten-Gemeinden unter sich und mit anderen Confessionen) which, however, never appeared (see Menn. Friedensbote, June 1, 1873). Jakob Enns (q.v.) was the first elder of the Flemish congregation in the Molotschna settlement in South Russia, 1805-18. Cornelius Enten (Entz) was a preacher of the Old Flemish congregation of the Gross-Werder, Berwaldsche Quartier, after 1800. Gerhard Enns (Entz) was one of the first preachers of the Old Flemish congregation of Chortitza (q.v.), serving 1794-ca. 1820. Daniel P. Enns (q.v.) served as secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization. John E. Entz (b. 1875) served 1917-46 as pastor of the First Mennonite Church, Newton, Kan. J. H. Enns (b. 1889) has been serving as elder of the Schönwiese Mennonite Church, Winnipeg, since 1939. G.R.

Enns, Daniel Peter, the son of Peter and Katharina Toews Enns, was born at Wasserreich, Don Province, Russia, July 17, 1877, and emigrated to Canada in July 1924, where he died June 4, 1946. He was married to Katharina Janzen, May 6, 1907, at Gnadenfeld, Taurida, Russia. To them were born three children: Alice, Anna, and Theodore. He attended the teacher-training school at Halbstadt, Taurida, 1894-96, and the Commercial Institute at St. Petersburg, 1911-13. He obtained his high-school teacher's certificate at Simferopol in 1907 and his commercial teacher's degree at St. Petersburg in 1913. He was baptized in 1897 at the Mennonite Church in Halbstadt, and was elected to the ministry in the Alexanderkrone congregation in 1916, but did not accept the office.

He served in the following offices: chairman, Mennonite Teacher's District Conference, Schönau, Taurida, Russia, 1896-1906; chairman, Mennonite Teacher's Conference, Davlekanovo, Ufa, Russia, 1909-11; chairman, Electoral District, Alexanderkrone, 1917; member Molotschna Teachers' Association, 1917-19; member Molotschna Mennonite Board of Education, 1917-19; member Central Bureau, All Russian Mennonite Organization, 1919; chairman, Sanitation District Committee, Seven Villages, 1922; chairman, Ontario Mennonite Immigrant Committee, 1924; member Central Mennonite Immigrant Committee of Canada, 1925-34, and secretary 1925-27; secretary, Board of Directors, German-English Academy at Rosthern, Sask., 1931-36; and chairman, German Cultural Society, Rosthern, 1933-36.

He was a teacher in Mennonite schools in Russia for 28 years; founder of Landwirtschaftliche Schule at Gnadenfeld in 1922; member of the original Studienkommission (Commission for the study of possibilities for mass emigration); at Rosthern accountant of the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization 1924-26 and secretary-treasurer of the same, 1926-46.

During his years of residence in Russia he held the following positions as teacher: elementary school teacher, Schönau, Molotschna, 1896-1906; high-school teacher, Spat, Crimea, 1906-9; high-school teacher, Davlekanovo, Ufa, 1909-11; private teacher-student St. Petersburg, 1911-13; commercial school teacher, Alexanderkrone, Molotschna, 1913-22; principal-inspector, Commercial School, Alexanderkrone, 1920-22; high-school teacher, Gnadenfeld, Molotschna, 1922-23; principal Agro. School, high school, and elementary school, Gnadenfeld, 1923-24. A.En.

J. G. Rempel, "D. P. Enns," in Der Bote, Sept. 27, 1950.

Enns, Franz F., a minister of the Terek (q.v.) Mennonite congregation, was born in Alexandertal, Molotschna, South Russia, on Oct. 25, 1871, the son of Franz F. and Elisabeth Franz Enns. He was baptized in Gnadenfeld in 1891 and married Anna Dürksen of Alexandertal on May 27, 1893. Six children were born to them. One of the two sons is Dr. G. F. Enns of Chilliwack, B.C.

He was one of the pioneers of the newly opened Terek settlement and was elected a minister of the Mennonite congregation there in 1903. In 1906 he was ordained elder. After the flight from the Terek in 1918 he served as elder of the Mennonite church in the Memrik settlement, 1920-23, and at Suvorovskaya, 1923-25. He moved back to Memrik (village of Waldeck) in 1925, and emigrated with his family to Canada in 1926, arriving at Winkler, Man., in May. In July Franz Enns took over the work of itinerating minister for the Board of Home Missions (GCM). He remained in this work until incapacitated by ill health early in 1939.

In November 1926 Franz Enns with his family and sons-in-law moved to a farm near Lena, Man., where he organized the newly settled immigrants as the Whitewater Mennonite Church, of which he was elder until 1938. In 1931, in order to be better able to follow his ministerial duties, he left the farm and moved to a small home in the town of Whitewater, close to daily mail and railroad services. He died in Winnipeg on March 2, 1940. During the years in Canada he did an invaluable work in looking up and serving the immigrants who had settled in scattered groups and families far from organized congregations throughout Manitoba. F.F.E.

Enns, Jakob, the first elder of the Flemish congregation in the Molotschna settlement, South Russia. He was probably one of the small group of immigrants from Neuenhuben near Danzig who settled in Russia on Aug. 23, 1804. He had been made preacher in Prussia, and was ordained an elder in Russia in 1805 and served as such until 1818. P. M. Friesen describes him as a man of great zeal but without spiritual life. As a result of his violent character serious strife arose concerning civil punishment and inadequate church discipline, which finally led to division and the organization of the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.). (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 74 f., 106 ff.; ML I, 593.) A.B.

Ens, Gerhard (1864-1952), is usually considered the founder of the town of Rosthern, Sask. (in 1892). In 1905-13 he was a member of the Legislative Assembly of Saskatchewan. For many years he also was an immigration agent of the Canadian government. As such he made a number of trips to Mennonite settlements in the United States and successfully enlisted settlers for the Canadian West from Minnesota, the Dakotas, Nebraska, and Kansas. He also went to Russia to promote Mennonite immigration to Canada. Though he joined the Church of the New Jerusalem (Swedenborgian), thus breaking with Mennonitism congregationally, traditionally he remained a part of the Mennonite community. As a descendant of the Russian Mennonites he was deeply concerned with the fate of these Mennonites after World War I, when revolution and famine struck. When the great immigration of Mennonites from Russia to Canada in the early 1920's was about to begin there was an Order-in-Council in Ottawa forbidding all Mennonite immigration to Canada as a result of the nonresistant stand taken by the Mennonites of Canada during World War I. Through his influence in political circles in Ottawa and his friendly relations with such leaders as W. L. Mackenzie-King, Gerhard Ens was instrumental in helping to remove these seemingly insurmountable obstacles. J.G.R.

Ens, Maria, daughter of the Dutch Mennonite pastor Hendrik Ens, b. Feb. 6, 1882, at Gorredijk, d. Aug. 21, 1936, at Deventer, Holland. She was teacher of German at Deventer, but in the secretaryship of the Vereniging voor Gemeentedagen (q.v.) she found her real lifework. From June 1923 to June 1936 she gave much time and devotion to the stimulation of this spiritual movement with its many activities. In 1932 she initiated conferences for unemployed at the Elspeet Brotherhood Home, which have proved to be of blessing for a large number of men and women. Miss Ens was very active also in lending assistance to the Mennonite emigrants from Russia to North and South America, especially in 1931, when she organized a large collection of clothing for the Russian Mennonites, whom she visited repeatedly in their temporary camps at Prenzlau and Mölln, Germany. Enschede, a town in the district of Twenthe, Dutch province of Overijssel. This industrial town (textiles, ironworks) with its rapidly growing population (12,000 in 1910; 102,000 with 809 Mennonites in 1947) is the seat of a Mennonite congregation, of whose origin and history not much is known, because in 1862 the archives were destroyed with the church by fire.

The idea that the Mennonite congregation was founded about 1530 by Waldensian weavers, who had moved from Flanders to Twenthe (J. Beets, Aanteekeningen in Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 757), has been proved to be false. Probably it was founded by Mennonite immigrants from Westphalia. It really arose some decades after most of the congregations in the Netherlands had been founded; nothing is known of it before 1580. The most prominent families in this congregation, all of Westphalian descent—van Lochem, Blijdenstein (q.v.), Paschen, Stenvers (i.e., Steinfurters), were among the founders of the present large textile industry in Enschede. In 1620 some well-to-do members of the Burgsteinfurt congregation in Westphalia settled in Enschede, among them Hendrick Gerritsz and Everwijn Franken. For a long time meetings were held in a private house, the membership being very small. In 1698, when Isaac Paschen was a preacher, a room in the van Lochem house was enlarged and adapted for church meetings; it was not until 1769 that a church was built, dedicated on Dec. 17 of this year with a sermon held by the minister Cornelis de Vries, which was published: Inwijdingsreden over de tempels . . . (Amsterdam, 1769). In 1786 an organ was placed in this church.

In the second half of the 17th century and the 18th century the congregation belonged to the conservative Zonist wing of the Dutch Mennonites. By the end of the 18th century much had changed. The prominent members were Patriots (q.v.) and were politically liberal. In 1795 the Mennonites in the Netherlands were recognized on an equal basis with the Reformed. Jacob H. Floh (q.v.), minister of the congregation, became (in 1796) a delegate of Twenthe to the lower house of the States-General, as was Jan B. Blijdenstein, a member of the congregation. In 1810 this Jan Blijdenstein was appointed burgomaster of Enschede.

The first trained minister here was Cornelis de Vries, mentioned above, 1763-71. He gave his considerable library of Mennonite and other books to the congregation (Blaupot t. C., Groningen I, 222). This library also perished with the church, when a fire devastated a large part of the city on May 7, 1862. The church, which was completely destroyed, was rebuilt on the same spot and dedicated May 2, 1864. This building was enlarged in 1952.

Among the ministers of this congregation was S. Cramer (q.v.), later professor at the University and the Mennonite Seminary of Amsterdam; he served at Enschede 1872-85 and was followed by C. N. Wybrands 1886-98, P. B. Westerdijk 1899-1912, E. Pekema 1912-42, S. M. A. Daalder 1942-45, and since 1945 J. P. Keuning. From 1864 to 1923 the congregation of Gronau, Germany, was a branch of Enschede, served by its preachers. As to the number of baptized members, the following figures were available: 1698, about 60; 1771, 83; 1781, 55; 1840, 65; 1864, 94; 1900, 180; 1916, about 300; 1930, 479; 1940, 520; 1953, 600. The congregation has a Sunday school for children, two women's circles, a youth group, and a choir. vdZ.

Ensisheim, a town (pop. 3,212) in Upper Alsace, Gebwiller district, was in the 16th century the seat of the Austrian government in Alsace, which ruthlessly stamped out the Anabaptist movement. Six hundred Anabaptists are said (by Sebastian Franck) to have been executed here.

Eberhard Hofmann, the city clerk of Ensisheim, participated in the trial of Michael Sattler (q.v.) in Rottenburg, Württemberg, Germany, and with his venomously hostile attitude contributed to the injustice of the trial. (See Basel and Alsace.) NEFF.

Entfelder (Endtfelder), Christian, a pupil of Hans Denk (q.v.), a friend of Hubmaier (q.v.), probably the preacher of an Anabaptist congregation in Eibenschitz (q.v.) in 1526-27. Having been expelled from Eibenschitz, he came to Strasbourg in 1529, after which nothing more is heard of him until 1544, when he was at Königsberg, Prussia, in a position of some influence in the Prussian court. Probably he was one of those intellectuals who were for a time close to the Anabaptists, and then broke the connections with them, either from fear of suffering or inner dissatisfaction, and then spent their lives alone in various positions. He wrote the following three books:

(1) Von den manigfaltigen im glauben zerspaltungen, dise jar entstanden. In sonderheit von der Taufspaltung unn jrem urtail. Ain bedacht (Strasbourg, 1530).

(2) Von warer Gottseligkeyt wie der mensch allhie in diser zeyt dartzu kommen mag, ain kurtze (aber gar nutzliche) betrachtung. Apocal. 14. Fürchtend Gott und gebt jme die eer (Strasbourg, 1530).

(3) Von Gottes vnnd Christi Jesu vnnseres Herren erkändtnuss, ain bedacht, Allen schülern des hailigen gaysts weiter zu bedencken aufgezaichnet, mit freyem vrthayl (1533).

All three books were also printed by Philipp Ulhart (q.v.) at Augsburg about 1530 (Schottenloher).

The first book, "a dark and confused" (Veesenmeyer, 312) writing, falls into two parts; in the first he seeks to discover the source of religious division; in the second he takes up the dispute on baptism and communion. The content of the first part he treats in five statements, as follows:

(1) That many people think they have what has not been given them, and presume to give what they do not have; this is a source of great error.

(2) That many pretend to be learned and attend the true Master's school very little, from which follows that divine and human art are confused, divine and human word are not distinguished, and many concern themselves with more things than are committed to them, and this is a source of much error.

(3) That nobody believes that he does not have what he after all really has, and that nobody sincerely seeks or desires that without which he cannot be saved; this is a cause of many divisions.

(4) He who could properly judge divisions causes none, but creates unity in the midst of division.

(5) As the understanding zeal nourishes the spirit and consumes the flesh, likewise the zeal without understanding consumes unity and nourishes all divisions wherein the spirit disappears and the flesh struggles with the creature.

In this book Entfelder attacks the dead letter of the law. He speaks very unclearly about the voice of God and of men. The treatise on baptism he wrote upon the request of some Anabaptists, from whom he seems to have detached himself. He says it is a divine counsel, Christian command, and elementary ceremony. Von den manigfaltigen im glauben zerspaltungen was translated into Dutch by Petrus Serrarius, and under the title Bedenckinge over de veelderley Scheuringen ende Dwalingen added as an appendix to Serrarius' book, De Vertredinge des Heyligen Stadts (Amsterdam, 1659). It had some influence in Dutch Collegiant (q.v.) circles.

The second booklet (17 pages) deals with generally mystical ideas. Blessedness is nothing but a rest in which the Spirit of God works in man through Christ, to rid him of all creature including himself, so that he hears only what God speaks to him. Man can acquire this rest by the rebirth, in which Christ is formed in him. It takes place in six stages. Only then is man able to take his outer senses captive and to activate his inner senses in the power of Him who indwells him, so that he performs perfectly that which God commands him. His faith puts him into this position, as is illustrated in Abraham and Peter. It is a matter of not only accepting the Word outwardly, but of making it one's own with a complete loss of himself. Because man does not want to lose himself, he can never come to rest. . . . It is very reprehensible that one wishes to pay for Christ with mere words. Man will not find rest until he is one with God. Then the true Sabbath dawns with peace, joy, love, gentleness, comfort, and all pleasure. . . . But such unity cannot take place unless man tolerates the will of his God, which has been revealed to him in Christ Jesus, the first fruits of all. . . . To take up one's cross (without the cross it cannot take place, the servant is not above the Master), with Christ committed to a simple, poor life, as the seed grain must first die, grow and become fruitful, be threshed out and crushed in true submission, then one becomes the true food from God the heavenly Father. . . . The one who so sincerely loves us can be recognized only through the suffering of His Son through the Holy Spirit. . . . If one comes to Him like the prodigal son one learns to love Him ardently; one finds in Him peace, rest, salvation, and all sufficiency, so that one disregards the whole world and without Him is so poor that one would not wish to be poorer even if the whole world were ours; "for here is nought but love and love, the peace of the Lord Jesus Christ in the rest of the Holy Spirit, in whom man may cry with the joy of the free princely spirit: who shall separate us from the love of God? shall tribulation or peril, persecution, hunger, thirst, danger, want, or the sword: I am certain that neither death nor life, angels, principalities nor powers, neither the present nor the future nor height nor depth nor any other creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. And this is true blessedness, to which may God, the heavenly Father, help us with grace. Watch, pray, be sober, for ye know neither the day nor the hour." This booklet was republished by Friedrich Nicolai, Lessing's friend, in 1781.

The third book contains an obscure treatise on the nature of the Trinity, which we follow with difficulty. In the foreword the author assures us that only love to the truth has moved him to publish this work and to add his mite to the removal of aberrations on the doctrine of the person of Jesus Christ, without any pretension of infallibility and with the solemn conviction that he would be very sorry if he should cause offense to anyone with this writing. He makes three assertions, on the basis of which he deals with the questions:

(1) How the one God from the single reason of His love, has in threefold power, known as the three Persons, revealed Himself.

(2) How the manifold human beings are reminded of the revealed knowledge of God by means of manifold causes and oppositions.

(3) Concerning the knowledge of the true Mediator, concluded with the introduction of several afore-mentioned things (Veesenmeyer, 321-28, where is found the letter written in March 1544 by Entfelder to Johann a Lasco, q.v.). Krollmann (p. 247) says that Entfelder returned to the service of Duke Albrecht of Prussia. NEFF.

Enthusiasts, a term little used in modern English or German, though much used in both English and German, in the 16th-18th centuries, with a meaning similar to though not quite so intense as "fanatics" or "zealots." In German the more common term is Schwärmer or Verzückte. The third edition of the HRE titles its article on the subject Verzückung, Enthusiasmus, Schwärmerei. The latest book making much use of the term is that by the Roman Catholic Oxford don R. A. Knox, Enthusiasm, A Chapter in the History of Religion with Special Reference to the XVII and XVIII Centuries (Oxford, 1950).

Knox includes in his survey the following groups: Montanists, Donatists, Joachim of Fiore, Albigenses, Waldenses, Anabaptists, Hendrik Niclaes and the Familists, George Fox and the Quakers, Jansenists, Quietists, Moravians, and John Wesley and the Methodists. He labels the symptoms of enthusiasm as "ascetic legalism, millenarianism, antinomianism, ecstasy." In the Elizabethan Age the term "Enthusiasts" became almost a technical term as used by leaders of the Church of England in referring first to Anabaptists and then to Puritans. At times the term seems almost to mean any group of sectarians who depart from the historic church; i.e., who generate sufficient conviction and courage (=enthusiasm?) to break away from the main line of historic Christendom as expressed in the state churches, whether Catholic or Protestants, and to make a fresh start. The assumption behind the term is that such breakaways are due to an overemphasis on immediate guidance by the Holy Spirit or an "inner light," a relaxing of normal controls and restraints, permitting either excessive emotionalism or undue self-exaltation to overbalance common sense and respect for history and tradition. Knox even calls enthusiasm an "ultra-supernaturalism."

The term and concept of Schwärmer and Schwärmertum as used chiefly by the Lutheran theologians and historians from Luther on down to the present day, best translated by "fanatics," has proved more serviceable than "enthusiasts," and is a far more dynamic term in church historiography. Conservative modern Lutherans are still very conscious of the Schwärmer, both historically and currently, and of opposition to them—far more than is Anglo-Saxon Christendom. The difference may be due to the fact that the ideals of the free churches, who are in a sense the spiritual heirs of the Schwärmer (Anabaptists) of the Reformation time, are now dominant in the Christendom of the United States, and very influential in English Christendom in general, whereas the Lutheran countries have never developed vigorous or large free churches (although Anglo-Saxon importations like the Baptists and Methodists have become significant). The Lutheran state churches, having remained dominant in the Christendom of their countries, have continued throughout their history in effect to view all divergent (sectarian) movements, from the Anabaptists on down, as dangerous and inexcusable aberrations and threats to the life of "the church." One of the weapons in their fight against these groups has been the derogatory designation of Schwärmer. The term carries both the sense of "sectarian" and somewhat of "fanatical" and "unbalanced." It is the product of a sincere state-church mind, which has difficulty in conceding the validity of the free church concept. The typical Lutheran sees, perhaps correctly, not just isolated individuals or groups of Schwärmer but a whole front of opposition, another type of Christianity, of which the Anabaptists were the leading exponents in Reformation times. In this understanding, the Anabaptists-Mennonites and their historians would in effect agree, with reversed evaluation, however. They would rate the Anabaptist front as nearer to the true intent of Christ and the New Testament than the state church type. Such historians, and of course modern Mennonites, would not agree to classify the extremist and fringe groups or cults of today such as, for instance, the Jehovah's Witnesses, in the same category with the Anabaptists at all. Thus in reality the Anabaptist-Mennonite and free churchman will take a position on the concept of Enthusiast-Schwärmer diametrically opposed to that held by the Lutheran state church side. For him the term is intolerable as applied to the main line of his own and related groups through history. The early Anabaptists rejected and resented the term as it was applied to them by the Reformers. Their spiritual descendants can do no less.

The use and prevalence of the term "Schwärmer" (Enthusiast) has a varying value through the centuries. From Luther and Melanchthon to Gottfried Arnold (1666-1714) it was an accepted term, most commonly a term of contempt applied to the Anabaptists and similar heretics. Beginning with Gottfried Arnold a change gradually came in, particularly among the more advanced and liberal thinkers; the heretics of the Reformation were now held to be the true Christians and forerunners of Pietism and the Enlightenment. Through the 18th and 19th centuries this view was held alongside of the older view. The continental liberals of the 19th-20th centuries interpreted the Reformation Schwärmer to be the pioneers and forerunners of the modern religious spirit and gave them much recognition in the development of modern toleration and freedom of conscience. Alfred Hegler of Tübingen with his book Geist und Schrift bei Sebastian Franck (1893) was the brilliant beginner, and Ernst Troeltsch with his Soziallehren (1912) was the climax of this trend, followed by Walther Köhler (d. 1942), with many other historians in agreement. In Anglo-Saxondom it was Rufus Jones (d. 1950) with his Spiritual Reformers (1905) and other writings. Karl Holl, however, the noted Berlin scholar, reversed the trend to some extent with his brilliant and powerful essay, Luther und die Schwärmer (1922), reviving the older evaluation. Since then a still undecided battle has in effect been raging in modern Lutheran scholarship. The evangelical trend, coupled with the Luther renaissance, in general glorifying Luther, has largely taken Luther's position against the Schwärmer. The most recent publication of this view has been Heft 6 of Schriften des Theologischen Konvents Augsburgischen Bekenntnisses (Berlin, 1952) containing the following three essays: W. Maurer, "Luther und die Schwärmer"; H. Wendland, "Gesetz und Geist des Schwärmertums bei Paulus"; and F. Schumann, "Schwärmerei als gegenwärtige Versuchung der Kirche." These essays were papers read at the sixth meeting of the Theologischer Konvent Augsburgischen Bekenntnisses in Fulda, Germany, March 25-28, 1952. The report of the discussion at the meeting as published in the same Heft clearly indicates the position taken toward the Schwärmer by the group attending the session. A few extracts (in translation) will suffice to indicate it. "How is the phenomenon Schwärmertum to be conceived? Is it not a significant symptom, that although it professes to depend on the Word of God, actually it delivers the dynamis of the Word to the devil? The Schwärmer contend that man, as pious man, remains free before God. Here the essence of Anabaptism must be sought. The approach of God to man in the incarnation is for the Schwärmer the stumbling block (skandalon). The Schwärmer uproots the word of God not in the form of rejection but acceptance; therefore Schwärmertum is the most pious and deceptive (verlogenste) form of self-assertion before God." These and similar astonishing assertions are quite in the spirit of Luther's attack on the Schwärmer (Anabaptists). It is true the report does not identify the Anabaptists as specifically mentioned in the discussion, and claims that the writers are concerned about the general theory of Schwärmertum, not concrete cases, but the implications are there, and the first essay was on the Anabaptists.

Fritz Heyer's Der Kirchenbegriff der Schwärmer (Leipzig, 1939) is written in the same general spirit of Lutheran evaluation of all Anabaptism as a dangerous "Schwärmertum." Christian Neff's reply to Heyer should be noted in his review in Mennonitische Geschichtsblätter V (1940) 48-52. A far more objective and valuable discussion is Karl Steck's Luther und die Schwärmer (Zollikon-Zürich, 1955), No. 44 of Theologische Studien herausgegeben von Karl Barth. An adequate historical and theological valid answer to this age-old concept of Anabaptist-Enthusiast-Schwärmertum has not yet been rendered. It cannot be done by modern Mennonites who follow either the liberal or the Lutheran position, or who have no clear historical knowledge or a Biblical Anabaptist-Mennonite theological line of their own. Meanwhile the misconception of the Anabaptist-Mennonites as Schwärmer-Enthusiasts persists in far too many circles and requires correction. Anabaptism is a sober, Biblical, realistic theology of regeneration and discipleship, subject to the Word, constitutive of a true New Testament church, and not "Enthusiasm." H.S.B.

Entz, Johann, was chosen preacher of the Hutterian Brethren, July 24, 1892, and confirmed by Elder Peter Hofer on May 30, 1897. A 1916 list of Hutterite preachers names him as the leader of the Old Elmspring colony in South Dakota. D.D.

Ephrata, Pa., a borough (pop. 7,000) in Lancaster County, 12 miles northeast of Lancaster, the site of the famous Ephrata Cloister (q.v.). At these cloisters was located a Seventh-day Baptist colony, claiming a thousand acres, famous for mills and the printing press, where the German Martyrs' Mirror (1748 imprint) and 42 other books were printed. It developed first through the industry and prominence of the Cloister group, and then later their decline added materially to the growth of the town. It is a business center for a large Mennonite community. The Ephrata Mennonite (MC) congregation (q.v.) of 362 worships in the town. The principal Mennonite Central Committee clothing center is also located here. I.D.L.

Ephrata Cloister, established by the Seventh-day Baptists at Ephrata, Lancaster Co., Pa., a group which separated from the Dunkards (Church of the Brethren) in 1735, headed by Johann Conrad Beissel. They were a mystical group who organized a communal life, separating the sexes and binding themselves to a simple life, in effect establishing a Protestant monastery. Rudolph Naegle, a Groffdale (Lancaster County) Mennonite preacher, and other Mennonites with names of Landis, Lang, Meylin, Graff, Weber, Greybill, Funk, Eicher, Hildebrand, Hoehn, and Martin joined them. Soon the group owned all lands within a radius of three or four miles, farmed the lands of Cocalico, and built an industrial center with a gristmill, sawmill, paper mill, oil mill, and fulling mill, a tannery, and weaving and pottery factories. They were musicians, teachers, did excellent fraktur work and embroidery, painted on walls and canvas, were spinners, quilters, and makers of household remedies, sulphur matches, and waxed paper. They established one of the earliest German printing establishments in the New World in 1745.

As friends of mercy Ephrata cared for soldiers after Braddock's defeat and the Battle of Brandywine. The Mennonite preacher John Baer and his wife, who had come to help in the care of soldiers who were sick with typhus, died with the 150 soldier victims of the disease. With the best press and the only good paper in America they produced 43 books, the largest of which was the German Martyrs' Mirror (in 1748) for American Mennonites. Their Ludwig Hacker had a Sunday school here 40 years before Robert Raikes's in England. Peter Miller, the talented prior 1743-96, founded the Ephrata Classical Academy, translated the Martyrs' Mirror from Dutch to German, and translated the Declaration of Independence into seven languages. In 1789 he interceded for the First Amendment to the Constitution of the United States which guarantees religious liberty, and freed a Tory, his worst enemy, walking barefooted to West Chester via Valley Forge, to appeal to General Washington. The State of Pennsylvania has established the Ephrata Cloister as a shrine, and is restoring all buildings to their original form.

The Ephrata Cloister press was of much service to the early Pennsylvania Mennonites, particularly in the first half of the 18th century. The following Mennonite books were printed here: 1745 Güldene Aepffel; 1745 Das Andenken einiger heiligen Märtyrer; 1745 (also 1770, 1785) Die Ernsthafte Christenpflicht; 1748-51 Märtyrer-Spiegel; 1769 (also 1770) Christliches Gemüthsgespräch; 1787 Das Ganz Neue Testament (Froschauer). The translation service of Peter Miller for the Märtyrer-Spiegel was of very great value. This tremendous folio volume of 1,482 pages in fine calf binding was an extraordinary achievement in those pioneer days in a frontier wilderness village. It was the largest book published in the American colonies before the Revolutionary War.† I.D.L.

Ephrata Mennonite Christian Day School was opened one mile northeast of Ephrata, Pa., in September 1946, to provide a more Biblical emphasis than was possible in the public schools. With the very substantial help of those interested, including several Mennonite groups beyond the borders of the sponsoring congregations, a two-room building was constructed. The 1953-54 enrollment was 97, including one year of high school, with Michael N. Wenger serving as principal and Gideon S. Eberly and Anna Ruth Hess completing the faculty. M.N.W.

Ephrata (Pa.) Mennonite Church (MC), Lancaster County, is a member of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference. After the city of Ephrata became a center for Mennonite families from the Metzler and Hammer Creek districts of Lancaster County, a meetinghouse was built on West Fulton Street in 1901. The above-named districts supplied bishop and ministerial oversight until Amos S. Horst was ordained to the ministry in 1918. The 1901 building was the location of the Winter Bible School of Lancaster Conference, 1939-43. It now serves as a clothing center for the Mennonite Central Committee. On May 6, 1937, a large new meetinghouse on Sunset Avenue was dedicated. In 1953 the bishops were Amos S. Horst and Mahlon Zimmerman; the ministers were Eugene Landis and J. Elvin Martin; and the deacon was Elam S. Stoner. The 1953 membership was 383. I.D.L.

Epistles, Anabaptist. (A) Hutterite. These are among the most unusual literary documents of Anabaptism, in type, style, and spirit reminiscent of the epistles of the New Testament. Though single epistles by other Anabaptist groups have been preserved (see section B), we know of no other group which so systematically collected all of their epistles and made them available to the brotherhood. In their totality the epistles represent one of the richest sources for our understanding of the Anabaptists, and a moving testimony of the courage, strength, and genuineness of their faith. No other group of Anabaptists has produced such an amazing amount of devotional literature as have the Hutterites, who enjoyed writing and copying their literature almost up to recent times. European archives and libraries as well as the colonies of the Brethren in the United States and Canada hold an astonishing number of handwritten devotional and other books. Joseph Beck (Geschichts-Bücher, q.v.) describes a great number of these European codices (as does also Lydia Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse . . . , 1938) which once belonged to Hutterite colonies in Slovakia but were confiscated, mainly by Jesuits during the 18th century and stored away (Beck, 563-642). About 300 such codices are known but many more must once have existed which were lost in times of persecution and wandering, or were destroyed by fire or plunder. They represent a complete Hutterite devotional library which was, to be sure, never printed and was hardly known to the outside world until rather recent times. In these books (Sammelbände) are found also all the epistles to be discussed in this article.

Moravia was the main center of Hutterite activities during the 16th century. Here were their large Bruderhofs with a Vorsteher or elder at the helm, and here were also their scriptoria (Schreibstuben) where all the incoming and outgoing epistles were collected and copied. The Brethren developed an extraordinary literary activity: the largest of these codices comprises 700 to 800 leaves quarto (of solid, strong paper), written in excellent penmanship, and beautifully bound in leather with clasps. The number of epistles known is likewise amazing; 400 to 500 have been counted. But it is fairly safe to say that once the number must have been still greater. Many of these epistles are of unusual length, covering in print occasionally as much as 20 pages folio size. Only about one fifth of all derive from the 17th century; all the rest belong to the great era of the 16th century; the time of writing stretches from 1527 to 1662.

Apparently most of the brethren were passionate letter writers; their strong inner life and their complete devotion to their new way found no better expression than in such epistles. Their topics were brotherhood, community of goods, a working faith in God and Christ, martyrdom as the inevitable lot of an earnest Christian, victory over flesh and world, absolute certainty in their way of resignation and nonconformity, love to everyone. Theological speculations were rare and less popular since they lack the actuality of a given situation. All these letters were read and reread by the Brethren, who thus learned the genius of their own tradition as well as the right behavior of earnest Christians living like sheep among wolves. It was their sacred legacy.

The epistles may be classified into different types: missionary letters to and from those who were working for God in all countries of German tongue, martyr letters to and from those who were in prison or just about to give the highest testimony of their faith, letters of admonition and encouragement, and finally also a few personal letters to friends, and so on. The elders or the entire community also sent many letters to the Brethren abroad.

About 80 personal letter writers have been counted, half of whom died sooner or later as martyrs. Some of these writers were very prolific, in some cases writing as many as 20 or more letters to the church at home, while others wrote just one or two letters in a long while but then often very long ones. Not all writers were leaders, ministers, or other functionaries. Often simple and very humble brethren produced true gems of epistolary literature. Many of these letter writers name Tirol as their home country. Four of them (of the earliest period) had formerly been Catholic priests. Only one writer is known to have been a schoolmaster; others were millers, blacksmiths, cabinetmakers, etc. About one third of all the epistles have no individual author; they are, as so many other documents of the Anabaptists, anonymous.

Most prominent of all these letters are those written in prison and dungeon (about 130 in number). It was the very joy of the Brethren who suffered for conscience' sake to write home to the community as a whole. The consciousness of belonging to the brotherhood gave them strength, firmness, and courage to stand all of these unbelievable hardships and tortures. Only 30 of all letters studied are addressed to the "marital sister," i.e., wife, containing farewell greetings and exhortations to remain steadfast in their faith. Perhaps not all letters of this sort were filed in the scriptorium, though that is not likely in a group as closely knit as this. One epistle which has become particularly well known, even famous, is the long letter which Jakob Hutter, the great first leader, wrote to the governor of Moravia on behalf of the entire brotherhood when this group was about to be expelled from Moravia in 1535. This letter has been reprinted seven times in different connections, and has been used as a major source. More than 200 epistles have a collective address (e.g., "To the brethren on the Rhine," or "To the brethren wherever they are," etc.). In some epistles an imprisoned brother comforts his comrade in bonds who lies in a nearby prison (Trostbrief an einen mitgefangenen Bruder). Many epistles were written by the elder or Vorsteher of the community to the distant workers for God in tribulations and need. It was particularly during the "Golden Era" in Moravia (1565-78), the period of the elder Peter Walpot (q.v.), that a great number of missioners (Sendboten) went out into many lands. Hence many epistles arrived and were answered by busy writing-hands.

The high standard of most of these epistles is truly amazing; simple tradesmen and husbandmen wrote letters of great perfection in expression and effectiveness. In the Hutterite colonies they learned reading and writing and of course the spiritual foundations of their life. They also studied the writings of those who lived and suffered before them. Equipped in this way, they were eager to write under any situation. In jail and dungeon they somehow procured paper, ink, and quill, and there were always messenger-brethren for the contact back and forth with Moravia. At home all letters were carefully preserved, copied, collected in separate codices, and also inserted into the text of the Great Chronicle (Geschicht-Buch) which was so carefully carried on through the centuries. One fifth of the entire Chronicle consists of such inserted epistles, while the great part of the text is made up of excerpts from such records. It was the real life of the Brethren which was thus mirrored in these writings.

Only the epistles of the New Testament offer an adequate comparison to this unique literature which has the same spirit and in many cases even the same style as the apostolic models. Their genuineness and immediacy make them outstanding. It was, of course, inevitable that occasionally stereotyped forms crept in. But most of the letters written in prison—and they are the majority—in face of a supreme test, show a spontaneity of expression not too often met in religious literature. Distress and tribulation, but at the same time hope and trust in God, thus became verbal; likewise the assurance to have lived up to God's commands. There was no room for great excitement. Simplicity is combined with deep spirituality, and an emotional warmth with healthy restraint and dignity in expression. Occasionally a folksy note comes to the fore, but surprisingly it is not the rule. The Pauline style is often imitated as the Brethren felt a kinship to the spirit and life of the early apostles. Sometimes a natural rudeness and wittiness shows up, which enhance the attractiveness of these letters. An example from 1568 might illustrate this side. A brother in prison reports of his conversations with a Catholic priest who wants to persuade him to give up his way, "Then I spoke, 'Since you want to derive infant baptism from circumcision which so obviously is straight against infant baptism, I must speak about it. Now, you tell me: did Abraham invent circumcision by himself?' Upon which he said, 'It was ordered to him by God.' Then I answered, 'Then wait until infant baptism will be ordered to you by God.' Then he said, 'You are a rude straw-cutter and do not understand the Scriptures, and yet you want to teach me; you should rather believe me and follow me; I am a highly learned man and well versed in many languages.' Upon which I said, 'A long time ago there was not one swine-herd all around Rome who would not have known Latin since it was a common language then, as ancient history clearly makes out. Nowadays it is a secular art and not at all divine piety or discipline.' "

Freshness of style, and always a witness to their faith make these epistles stimulating reading. True, there were not many new ideas to be propagated, since Anabaptism is a simple Biblical faith. Yet there is almost in every line of this literature a concreteness and existentiality of a faith which was less meditated than lived out. That explains why there is no unctiousness in their speech and no empty talk. As one brother wrote in 1561, "For that reason, beloved brethren, accept my little writing in love and good spirit, not as a work of the pen or the ink, but as truth and living word. All that I have taught you I am set to seal with my blood through the grace of God. . . . My letter is not in pleasant words of human wisdom but in the testimony of the Spirit and of power (in der Beweisung des Geistes und der Kraft)."

There is little wonder that these human documents were so highly esteemed; they were studied and copied and represent the source of strength for everyone in the colony. Here the Brethren learned the right demeanor in facing the world, and the right spirit of suffering. This reading gave them strength in the martyrdom which threatened them in almost every corner of the country. All that explains why these epistle-codices became such a precious heritage and why they were preserved and carried along throughout all the long history and wandering of the brethren.

(B) Non-Hutterite. The Hutterites were not the only passionate letter writers; it seems as if such activities were particularly appealing to all Anabaptists, who thus testified to their faith, expressing their uncompromising stand, and above all leaving a legacy for those who came after them. These letters were in most cases written by martyrs who wanted to send a last farewell to their beloved ones or to the entire group, together with some admonitions and exhortations to keep loyal to the faith. In the same way as the great Hutterite Chronicle was built upon such epistles (either inserted or else used as main sources for the narrative), so were also all the martyrbooks, which originated in the Netherlands and found their climax in van Braght's great Martyrs' Mirror of 1660 (q.v.). Even a superficial perusal of this book will demonstrate this fact; nearly half of its second part is made up of such letters written by martyrs in many lands in prison, on the eve of their execution, and addressed to wife, husband, child, or the brethren wherever they were. No special study has yet been undertaken in this direction, but the similarity in spirit, form, and style with the Hutterite letters is striking. Only in one point is a significant difference observable; while the Hutterites have not one single letter written by a woman (though they had female martyrs), van Braght presents a great number of epistles written by women who were about to face the supreme sacrifice. J. C. Wenger (Glimpses, 177-78) prints the translation of such a most moving letter by Janneken von Munstdorp to her child, which was born in prison and now had to be abandoned (1573). This is a real gem of Anabaptist epistolary literature. Other great letters were written by Anneken of Rotterdam 1538, and many other women who were ready to seal their faith by martyrdom and death.

The sources of van Braght or the earlier martyrbooks are little known. No central office existed in the Netherlands or in the Lower Rhine district as was the case with the Hutterites in Moravia, and no central body could take care of these precious legacies. And yet they were preserved. The Amsterdam Mennonite Library has the original of a letter written by the martyr Maeyken Wens, who was executed at Antwerp on Oct. 6, 1573. This letter is written on the back of a letter which her husband had written to her while she was in prison. This is the only autograph letter of a Dutch martyr that has been preserved. It was later included in the Dutch martyrbooks, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. It was, most likely, done by way of small printed pamphlets (Flugschriften) published soon after the tragic event and circulated among fellow believers. Today several libraries in America and Europe hold collections of such pamphlets (q.v.). These anonymous booklets, containing epistles together with introductions of admonition and exhortation, must once have been very popular. Large collections (Sammelbände) of later centuries impressively demonstrate this fact. The oldest printed copy of a letter by a Dutch martyr seems to be one written by Anneken Jans, who was executed in 1539 at Rotterdam, published in the very year of her execution with a song, also written by Anneken. Beginning about 1577 a large number of booklets containing letters by Dutch martyrs appeared. They were published (at first anonymously) by Gillis Rooman at Haarlem, Nicolaas Biestkens at Amsterdam, and others. The following volumes are known: letters of Jacob de Keersmaecker 1577, Hendrick Alewijnsz 1577, Thys Joriaensz 1577, Joost Verkindert 1577, Reytse Ayseszoon n.d., Jan Woutersz van Cuyck 1579, Christiaen Rijcen (Christiaen de Rijcke) 1582, and Joose de Tollenaer 1599. Of some of these volumes there may have been older editions; some of them have been reprinted. A considerable collection of letters was already published in the oldest martyrbook, the Dutch Offer des Heeren (q.v.) of 1562, of which a number of reprints have appeared of each successive enlarged edition. The most outstanding of these collections is Güldene Aepffel in Silbern Schalen (q.v.), most likely of Swiss origin, published 1702 and 1742 in Europe and 1745 in Pennsylvania. It contains altogether 24 epistles: (1) First the Sendbrief an die Gemeinde zu Horb (1527) by Michael Sattler (q.v.). In this case the source, a pamphlet with all the Sattler material, published right after his execution, is known and found in Mennonite libraries. (2) Eight epistles by Thomas Imbroich (q.v., executed 1558), including his famous Confessio, sent to his wife and the brethren. In this case also we know the pamphlet serving as a source (see MQR XVI, 1942, 99-107). (3) Two epistles by Soetge van der Houte (q.v., martyred 1560), one a Sendbrief an ihre Brüder und Schwestern und auch Kinder, and one a testament (legacy) to her children. (4) Eleven epistles by Michael Servaes (q.v., died 1563), called Sendbriefe welche er vor und in seinem Gefängnis zu Köln an seine Verwandten nach dem Geist und Fleisch geschrieben. (5) Two epistles from prison by Konrad Koch (q.v.), who died as a martyr in 1565. Of the Houte, Servaes, and Koch epistles we do not know the original sources; yet there is little doubt that printed booklets existed also in these cases. As to the contents of these epistles and their skillful form of expression the same can be said as of the Hutterite letters: they are certainly superior documents.

It is surprising that one more such pamphlet of the 18th century has preserved almost the same spirit and form. That is the Sendbrief von einem Liebhaber Gottes Worts (q.v.), written by an unknown brother in the darkness of prison in Bern, Switzerland, about 1715, and published most likely in Basel as an anonymous tract (copies in Mennonite historical libraries). This brother sends his admonitions to his "fellow members of the household of faith" as a call to steadfastness and loyalty and as a reminder to stay in the true fear of God, which befits earnest believers. It has 40 pages in print, and strikingly continues the old tradition of Anabaptist epistles.

Many more such epistles have been found in archives where trial records are stored away. The great Täuferakten publication in Germany (Bossert, Schornbaum) contains a number of such epistles though all too often in excerpts only. More such source publications are scheduled and will no doubt increase our knowledge of Anabaptist letter writing. But one particular letter still deserves our special attention because of its historical significance. That is Conrad Grebel's famous writing to Thomas Müntzer, from Zürich, Sept. 5, 1524 (see Bender, Conrad Grebel). Strictly speaking this is not yet an Anabaptist letter since Grebel was at that time not yet baptized on confession of faith. Still it might be called the very first Anabaptist statement in existence. It is not a martyr's epistle, but a friendly admonition together with a brief exposition of the new Anabaptist faith and attitude toward life. As such it does not quite fall into the scope of the present article, but represents rather an introduction to this entire field.

In July 1955, a remarkable find of Anabaptist epistles was made in the Bürgerbibliothek in Bern, Switzerland, where a bound manuscript volume of 42 letters and documents of 1527-61 was found. The letters are largely by Pilgram Marpeck and his associates, collected by Jörg Maler in a volume together with a few other documents, to which he gave the title Kunstbuch. R.F.

Epp (Eppe, Ep, Epps), a Mennonite family name in the Old Flemish congregations of West Prussia, mainly rural, mentioned (Danzig Archives) in 1584. In 1586 an Epp, born at Losendorff, Dutch province of Groningen, lived at Langgarten near Danzig. Forty-six families were counted in 1776 (without Danzig), 131 persons in 1910, and 121 persons in 1935. Members of the family emigrated to Russia and America. They are numerous in Kansas, Nebraska, and Canada.

In the Dutch Naamlijst the name Epp is first found among the ministers in 1766, Peter Epp (q.v., 1725-89) and Cornelis Epp being preachers of the Flemish congregation of Danzig. Peter served from 1758 as a preacher and became elder in 1779, serving until about 1790; Cornelius was a preacher until at least 1810. Hendrick Epp was a preacher of the Old Flemish congregation of the Grosse Werder in the Bärwalde district of West Prussia 1765-ca. 80. Leading later members of the family include David Epp (q.v.), elder of the Chortitza (Russia) Flemish congregation 1793-1802, one of the delegates to St. Petersburg 1798-1800, who obtained the Gnadenprivilegium from the Czar; Bernhard Epp (q.v., 1854-1926), elder of the Lichtenau congregation; David Epp (q.v.) and his son David Epp, author of Geistliche Lieder (Marienburg, 1841); Claasz Epp, Jr. (q.v., d. 1913), chiliastic leader of the ill-fated migration to Central Asia; Heinrich Epp (q.v., 1827-96), a teacher and elder of the Chortitza Zentralschule; Heinrich H. Epp (q.v., b. 1873), a son of the above, a teacher in the same school; David H. Epp (q.v., 1861-1934), also a son of Heinrich Epp, a teacher at various schools and elder of the Chortitza Mennonite Church; Dietrich Heinrich Epp (q.v., 1875-1955), editor of the Bote 1924-55; Abraham P. Epp (q.v., 1871-1941), minister in the M.B. Church at Fairview, Okla.; Jacob B. Epp (1874-1945), a missionary to the Hopi Indians, and his son Theodore H. Epp (b. 1907), who conducts the outstanding radio program, "Back to the Bible Hour"; Peter G. Epp (q.v., 1888-1955), professor at Bluffton College and the University of Ohio; Gerhard G. Epp (b. 1895), minister at Rosthern, Sask.; Johann P. Epp (1854-1917), long-time minister and for years elder of the church at Henderson, Neb.; John H. Epp (b. 1877), long-time pastor of the Hillsboro (Kan.) Mennonite church; Peter P. Epp (b. 1861), long-time minister of the M.B. Church at Henderson, Neb.; Kornelius P. Epp (q.v., 1863-1944), leading minister of the E.M.B. Church at Henderson, Neb. G.R.

Epp, Abraham P., minister of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born at Evanecke, South Russia, Nov. 19, 1871, the seventh of the ten children of Peter and Katharina Klassen Epp. In 1876 the family emigrated to America, settling on a farm near Hillsboro, Kan., where Abraham grew up and joined the M.B. Church in 1891. In 1893 he took a homestead on the Cherokee Strip, southeast of what is today Fairview, Okla., and established his home, marrying Carolina Bekker on Dec. 27, 1894. They had a family of three children. He was very active in the South Fairview M.B. Church from its very beginning, serving as Sunday-school superintendent and deacon for many years. In 1925 the congregation elected him to the ministry, and for some time he was its pastor. In 1928 he retired and moved to Fairview.

Abraham Epp was an active worker in the Southern District Conference and served as its treasurer in 1924-39. He died at his home in Fairview on Oct. 8, 1941, and was buried in the South Fairview M.B. Cemetery. J.H.L.

Epp, Bernhard (1854-1926), elder of the Lichtenau-Petershagen congregation, Molotschna, Russia, was born in 1854 at Rosenort, Molotschna. In 1875 he married Anna Wiens; their family consisted of 13 children. In 1889 Epp was elected minister and 1908 elder of his congregation. Although he had only an elementary education, he served with wisdom and devotion through all the troubled years of the War and the Revolution. During his years of service he preached 641 times at funerals and 271 times at weddings, not to speak of the many Sunday services he conducted. He instructed and baptized around 1,200 persons. He died at Lindenau, Molotschna, in 1926. H.G.

Epp, Claasz, Jr., was born in Fürstenwerder (q.v.) in West Prussia. His father, Claasz Epp, was the mayor of this village and played a prominent role in the last (1853 f.) Mennonite emigration from Prussia to Russia; he was deputized to lead it, and authorized by the government of Russia to supervise it. He traveled over the country to select a site for settlement, and was one of the first who emigrated in 1853. In the founding and laying out of Hahnsau, the first and oldest Mennonite colony in the Volga region, he took a leading part, and settled here with four sons, of whom Claasz Epp, Jr., was (probably) the oldest.

Like his father, Claasz had a pronounced gift for leadership and was in many respects an attractive personality, although at times he showed ruthless severity. But at first he did not succeed in acquiring a leading position. In agriculture he was successful. When he emigrated to Central Asia he owned, in addition to his land in Hahnsau, three farms in the village of Orlov.

In the 1870's Claasz Epp began to stress in private circles the imminent end of the age, the return of Christ, and the particular calling of the Mennonites, to whom God had promised an open door (Rev. 3:8-10), in order to prepare a place of refuge (Rev. 12:14) for the other believers in the Christian church fleeing the Tribulation. When the Russian Mennonites faced the decision of their government (1870) to cancel the special privileges of the Mennonites, including military exemption, and most of them considered emigration to America in the West, Epp proclaimed that deliverance would be found in the East, an idea not original with him but coming from Jung-Stilling and others.

In his booklet published in 1877, Die entsiegelte Weissagung des Propheten Daniel und die Deutung der Offenbarung Johannis, which appeared in three editions and was distributed free at his own expense, in which he incorporated the ideas of Jung-Stilling, Ernst Mühes, and Peter Christoph Clöter, Epp ventured to set dates so definitely that he could not help becoming discredited. Here a new epoch opened for Claas Epp: lacking the humility necessary to admit his error, but rather trying to retain his adherents by a series of new interpretations, he became a false leader instead of merely a man in error. He claimed for instance that his own little flock of followers was the "Philadelphia" church of the Revelation, before which the open door was set. Finally in 1880, at the close of the period of transition to the new regime in Russia when compulsory alternative service was to be inaugurated he led a small group from the Trakt settlement on one of the most visionary and tragic adventures in all Mennonite history, an exodus to the wild, unknown, barren land of Turkestan in the heart of a Mohammedan population to meet the Lord and inaugurate the Millennium. Another group led by Elder Peters of the Molotschna undertook a similar move at the same time. The result was the establishment of the Mennonite settlement at Aulie Ata (q.v.) in Turkestan. In Aulie Ata the group divided, most remaining under the saner leadership of Elder Peters, while Epp took a smaller group in 1881 farther on, first to Bokhara, and finally to Ak-Mechet in the Khanate of Khiva, where they settled in 1882.

Epp's fanaticism grew constantly, guided by dreams and visions. He now claimed to be one of the two witnesses to the ushering in of the Lord's appearance on earth. A fellow minister, excommunicated by him, now became the Red Dragon of Revelation, whose expulsion was celebrated annually by the church. Soon Epp was to meet Elijah in the skies and with him ascend to heaven bodily. The time was actually set for the event, and the faithful gathered to bid Epp farewell as he stood behind an altar dressed in ascension robes. The day set for Christ's appearance was March 8, 1889, later changed to 1891. The climax came when Epp claimed to be the Son of Christ, the fourth person of the Trinity.

By this time most of Epp's followers, disillusioned, had left him, but a handful remained steadfast almost to the end. Finally the remnant excommunicated Epp. He died Feb. 3, 1913. (See Asiatic Russia.) F.B.

Epp, David, immigrated in August 1789 from Danzig to Russia (Menn. Bl., 1856, 20), was chosen as elder in 1793, and ordained in the following year by C. Warkentin, who had come from Prussia for the purpose of ordaining him. He was sent with Gerhard Willms to St. Petersburg, June 29, 1798, and after waiting there over two years procured the charter of privileges from Emperor Paul I on Sept. 6, 1800. He died Sept. 29, 1802. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 98, 700; ML I, 596.) NEFF.

Epp, David (1779-1863), brother of Claas Epp, Sr. and minister of the Heubuden congregation 1817-62. He was very influential in the first decades of his ministry, successfully promoting mission interests. He emigrated from Prussia to Russia in 1862. G.R.

Epp, David, according to the Katalog der Kirchenbibliothek der Mennonitengemeinde zu Danzig (Danzig, 1869), was the son of the Heubuden (West Prussia) preacher D. Epp (? David Epp, q.v., preacher 1817-62), and author of Geistliche Lieder. Herausgegeben nach dem Tode des Verfassers (Marienburg, 1841). Only copy known was in the Danzig library. H.S.B.

Epp, David Heinrich, the son of Heinrich Epp (q.v.), teacher, minister, and writer, copublisher of the Botschafter (q.v.), b. May 30 (Old Calendar), 1861, in Chortitza, South Russia, taught at Osterwick and Rosental 1878-99. In 1886 he was chosen minister of the Chortitza Mennonite congregation, and in 1899 accepted a call to the Ekaterinoslav congregation. At the same time he taught in the elementary school at that place and also gave religious instruction in the local business college. In 1912 he moved to Berdyansk and devoted all his time to the Botschafter and to church work. For many years he served as chairman of the Kommission für kirchliche Angelegenheiten (KfK, q.v.), which was organized in 1910 to represent the Mennonites in dealing with the government. In this office he performed a very valuable service. He made repeated trips to the capital and secured more favorable conditions which made it possible for the Allgemeine Mennonitische Bundeskonferenz to continue to meet.

In 1914 at the outbreak of World War I the Botschafter, like all other German periodicals, was compelled to cease publication. He was thus deprived of his livelihood, and he became impoverished. In 1923 the Lichtenau Mennonite congregation (Taurida) invited him to serve as chief minister to re-establish the torn congregation. With clear vision, great skill, and much charity, he succeeded in this undertaking. In 1927 he was called to his home congregation of Chortitza and served it as elder until 1931 with marked blessing, in spite of the most unfavorable conditions imaginable, for the Communists hindered his every step. As one without any legal rights, as were all the preachers, he was so heavily taxed that neither he nor the congregation was able to raise the funds. He therefore resigned in 1931. He nevertheless continued his pastoral care privately, and was able to strengthen and revive many an oppressed heart in that difficult time. He died in 1934. D. H. Epp was the last ordained elder of the Chortitza Mennonite Church.

Through his pastoral care of the mentally disturbed in the insane asylum at Ekaterinoslav, he became aware of the need for a Mennonite mental hospital to give better spiritual and physical care to patients in the brotherhood. By means of energetic appeals and propaganda in the Botschafter, lectures and pamphlets, he succeeded in interesting the congregations in the idea, and thus Bethania (q.v.) came into being, which was supported by all the Mennonites of Russia. He also saw the need of a better education for girls and became a cofounder of the Chortitza Mädchenschule (Girls' School).

As an author David Epp also accomplished much. He wrote of himself, "My inmost feeling urged me to serve wider circles with a pen in my hand." By private study he acquired a good knowledge of Mennonite history, and as the first fruits of this study he published in 1889 (for the centennial celebration of the founding of the Chortitza colony) Die Chortitzer Mennoniten. In 1896 he wrote Kurze Erklärungen und Erläuterungen zum Katechismus. . . . This book was intended for the "young men and women who are preparing for baptism, that it may be a good friend to them, in which they may be able to find inspiration and instruction, to bring to the sacred act a consecrated heart." The book was well received, and was published in a second edition in 1898. The third edition (1941) appeared after his death at Rosthern, Sask. In 1909 appeared his valuable biography, J. Cornies, Züge aus seinem Leben und Wirken, the second edition of which was published in 1949 at Rosthern. In 1910 appeared his centennial booklet, Die Memriker Ansiedlung.

Before the founding of the Botschafter, David Epp was an active contributor to the Mennonitische Blätter, and also to the Odessaer Zeitung. Many of his articles appeared in the Mennonitisches Jahrbuch (H. Dirks) and in Unser Blatt. In the last years of his life he sent many contributions to the Bote (q.v.) of Rosthern. (ML I, 597.)† D.E.

Epp, Dietrich H. (1875-1955), an outstanding educator, publisher-editor, and civic leader of the Mennonite Church in Russia and Canada, was born March 29, 1875, Chortitza, Russia, the son of Heinrich Epp (q.v.), educator and minister of Chortitza. On June 27, 1898, he married Marie Thiessen, who died in May 1906. On July 27, 1909, he married her sister, Malvine, who died March 4, 1942. They adopted John Heese as their child.

Epp attended the elementary school, the Zentralschule and the Normal School of Chortitza (1881-92), and the Teachers' Institute of St. Petersburg (1892-95). From 1895 to 1923 he taught at the Chortitza Zentralschule and Normal School, serving also as director during the last four years. He organized the Chortitza Public Library and functioned as its director in 1902-14. He was the secretary of the Chortitza Life Insurance Company (Sterbekasse) 1901-10, and of the Chortitza Mädchenschule 1906-23.

In 1923 Epp went from Russia to Rosthern, Sask., where he established a print shop the same year. He founded Der Bote (q.v.), and served as its editor continuously from its beginning in 1923 until his death in 1955. He also published and edited the Saskatchewan Valley News and numerous books in the interest of the Canadian Mennonite constituency. He served as chairman of the Central Mennonite Immigration Committee (q.v.) 1923-34, on the Board of Directors of Rosthern Junior College, and as member of the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization. In 1944, when the Echo-Verlag (q.v.) was founded by former students of the Chortitza Zentralschule, he was elected chairman of this organization. D. H. Epp made a significant contribution to the cultural life of the Mennonites of Russia and Canada. He died on March 31, 1955, at Rosthern. (Der Bote, March 30, 1955, pp. 3-7; April 13, 1955, pp. 1-2.)† C.K.

Epp, Heinrich, b. Dec. 18, 1827, at Chortitza, province of Ekaterinoslav, d. April 11, 1896. In 1854 he taught a school with seven children in Neu-Petersdorf. Two years later he taught in the Mennonite private school in Ekaterinoslav. In 1858 he was called to the Zentralschule to succeed Heinrich Franz, and served there 19 years. During this period, which D. A. Neufeld (q.v.) calls a "new bright period," the school made an appreciable growth. The church likewise had complete confidence in him.

When the Mennonites were alarmed by the introduction of general military duty and sent a delegation to St. Petersburg to be released, Heinrich Epp was one of the delegates, and was the spokesman in St. Petersburg. Repeatedly he visited St. Petersburg to represent the Mennonites in this matter.

The confidence of the church was also shown in the fact that in 1864 they called him to preach to the Chortitza congregation. For 13 years he energetically and successfully filled his double vocation. For seven and one-half years he was chairman of the board of the Zentralschule. But because his office of preaching for the Chortitza church demanded more and more of his energy, he resigned his teaching position and devoted all his time to his church. In 1885, when Elder Gerhard Dyck resigned his office on account of his advanced age, Epp was elected by a large majority. He accepted the office reluctantly. "Will I be able to lead the church aright? Will it be built up by me?" he asked. But then he faced the congregation with the text, "Here am I. Thou hast called me!" (I Sam. 3:8). His service, lasting until his death, was attended with great blessing. A.B.

Epp, Heinrich D., the tenth child of Dietrich and Katharina Siemens Epp, was born Jan. 26, 1861, in Novopodolsk, South Russia, where his father was for about 48 years the superintendent of the "Jewish colonies" (see Judenplan). The family belonged to the Mennonite Church of Chortitza. Heinrich D. Epp attended the elementary school of his native village and then the school at Burwalde, where his teacher was Peter Penner. Then he attended the Zentralschule in Chortitza, and upon completing his study in 1878 he was appointed to teach in Peter Penner's school in Burwalde. In 1880 he moved to Michaelsburg in Fürstenlande, Taurida, and taught the village school there for 15 years. In 1883 he married Sarah Redekop. This marriage was blessed with five sons. On Oct. 30, 1886, he was ordained to the ministry by his uncle, Heinrich Epp, the elder of the Chortitza congregation.

In 1895 Heinrich D. Epp was made principal of the school in Burwalde (Chortitza volost), and also served as preacher. In 1906 he was called to teach religion and German in the Nikolaipol Zentralschule. He retired in 1921, having been a teacher for 43 years.

On Dec. 5, 1920, he was ordained as an elder of the Nikolaipol Mennonite Church (q.v.) by Isaak Dyck, the elder of the Chortitza church, and served in this capacity until 1935, when the church was confiscated by the Russian communistic authorities; Heinrich D. Epp then moved to Adelsheim (Nikolaipol volost), where he died on June 18, 1941, at the age of 80 years. H.H.E.

Epp, Heinrich H., the son of Elder Heinrich Epp (q.v.), was born in 1873 in Chortitza, a village in South Russia. Upon completion of the Zentralschule he attended the Gymnasium in Ekaterinoslav for two years, and completed the work for his A.B. degree in history and philology at the University of Moscow in 1900. He then became a teacher in the Chortitza Zentralschule (q.v.) and devoted his entire life and work to it. In 1905, when A. A. Neufeld withdrew, he became the principal of the school and gave instruction in the field of education in the teacher-training program operated in connection with the Zentralschule. These courses were taught much better here than in the corresponding Russian schools, for Epp kept himself informed on the new pedagogical currents. He equipped the Zentralschule library, which had been begun by Neufeld, with all the newer books. He stimulated in his students a desire for further education, thus producing a stream of ambitious young teachers for the Mennonite elementary schools. He used to say that good elementary schools were of greater value than good secondary schools or universities. He therefore declined the proposal made to him by some prominent persons to establish an intermediate school. His ideal was a three-year normal school in addition to the Zentralschule to offer all the courses of value to elementary teachers. Thanks to his efforts, such a school was opened in 1913. But the curriculum he had planned was reduced by the government, since it surpassed that of the government-operated schools. After the Revolution, persistent unrest made it impossible to introduce these courses.

As chairman of the Chortitza Teacher's Association Epp conducted the monthly and annual meetings; his influence was the more deeply felt since most of the teachers had once been his students. He was appointed inspector of the final examinations of the elementary schools, thus acquiring direct influence on their instruction. And since he was also chairman of the committee in charge of the final examination of the Zentralschule, he was able to unify the system from the elementary schools through the Zentralschule and the educational courses.

In 1920, when the new government tried to remodel the Russian educational system on the Western plan, the Russian teachers were frustrated. But Epp, aware of Western currents, was able to lecture at home and in other German colonies and to reconstruct his curriculum along the new lines. The commissariat for elementary education recognized Epp's contribution and gave him the title of "professor," which was ordinarily reserved for teachers at the universities, with a suitable salary.

Epp participated in all movements for the common welfare. Like his father, he was authorized by the Chortitza Mennonites to represent their causes to the governments. In 1919 he resigned from the leadership of the school and representation to the government in favor of his younger brother and colleague, Dietrich H. Epp (q.v.). But he remained as a teacher and the soul of the institution. When the Soviet government approached him with the question: Do you believe in God? and he replied affirmatively, he had to withdraw from the school in 1929. After 29 years of devoted and fruitful service, he left this Mennonite school, which was then fitted into the communistic pattern.

In 1925 Epp's students and colleagues celebrated the 25th anniversary of his successful work. His wish and hope to spend the closing years of his life in peace was not to be fulfilled. In the mass evacuation of intellectuals from the Ukraine in 1937, Heinrich Epp was also arrested and without benefit of trial sent away. Since these exiles were not permitted contact with their families, nothing more has been heard of him. D.E.

Epp, Johann P., oldest son of Peter and Barbara Isaak Epp, was born July 20, 1854, at Pastva in the Molotschna settlement of South Russia. With his parents and their four other children, he emigrated to America in 1875, settling near Henderson, Neb. Here he lived the remainder of his life on a farm, excepting the last four years, when he resided in Henderson.

He was married to Kornelia Franz, Feb. 1, 1877. To this union were born two daughters and five sons, one daughter dying in infancy. All his children were active in church work and all prosperous farmers. His son John has served for many years as minister and elder.

Johann P. Epp was a charter member of the Ebenezer (q.v.) Mennonite Church (EMB) at Henderson. He served about 34 years as minister, including 4 years as elder of the church. For about 15 years he served as secretary of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Mission Board, and 2 years as conference chairman. He died Jan. 25, 1917, at his home in Henderson, and was buried in the Ebenezer Mennonite cemetery near this town. H.F.E.

Epp, Kornelius P., b. Oct. 28, 1863, at Pastva in the Molotschna settlement, South Russia, the seventh child of Peter and Barbara Isaak Epp. With his parents and the rest of the family he came to America in 1875, settling near Henderson, Neb., in which community he lived the rest of his life. His education he received at Pastva and a private Bible school in America. He taught in an elementary Bible school near Henderson.

He married Aganetha Schierling Nov. 26, 1886. To this union were born two daughters and three sons. He farmed for many years. He was a charter member of the Ebenezer (q.v.) Mennonite Church (EMB), and served for many years as Sunday-school superintendent and as chorister. In 1895 he was chosen as deacon, and in 1917-31 he was the leading minister of the church. He had a great interest in missions and served for about 14 years on the Board of Home and Foreign Missions of the E.M.B. Conference, the greater part of the time as treasurer and the remainder as secretary. He died April 30, 1944, and is buried in the Ebenezer Mennonite cemetery. H.F.E.

Epp, Peter, Elder of the Flemish Mennonite congregation in Danzig 1779-89. He was born Jan. 23, 1725, lived as a farmer in Neunhuben near Danzig, was chosen as deacon April 3, 1757, as minister Feb. 5, 1758, and as elder Sept. 26, 1779. He went through the difficult period of the transfer of West Prussia from Polish to Prussian sovereignty, when the Danzig congregation was for a while divided between the two realms. In this period the emigration to Russia also began, in which Epp took an active part. He died in the midst of preparations for a trip to South Russia, Nov. 12, 1789. H.G.M.

Epp, Peter (1862-1922), Elder of the Pordenau Mennonite Church, Molotschna, Russia, was born in 1862 at Prangenau, Molotschna, and married Sara Klassen in 1885. His family consisted of seven children. One son, Jacob Epp, at present is minister and leader of the Mennonite Brethren congregation at Steinbach, Man. Epp received his elementary education at his native village, then attended the Zentralschule at Gnadenfeld. In 1893 he became minister and in 1910 was ordained elder of the Pordenau church. From the very beginning he did pioneer work in his congregation, which when he took charge of it was backward in many ways. In its life and worship many forms and customs dominated which had outlived their usefulness and kept religious life at a standstill. Epp changed all this gradually and brought a new spirit into the congregation. He also reorganized the singing in his church and for the first time introduced choir singing. Epp died in 1922 during the great typhoid epidemic after exposure to the disease when visiting the many sick and dying of his congregation. H.G.

Epp, Peter G. (1888-1954), Mennonite author and teacher, was born Aug. 13, 1888, at Petershagen in the Molotschna settlement in South Russia, the fifth of the seven children of Gerhard and Elisabeth (Fast) Epp. He was married twice. His first wife was Helene Matthies, whom he married in 1912; they had two sons. On June 6, 1926, he married Justina Dyck; they had one son. Epp was educated at the Teachers' Institute at Halbstadt, Russia, the Predigerschule (1906-8) at Basel, Switzerland, the University of Heidelberg (1908 ff.), Germany, and received his Ph.D. at the University of Basel (1912). After this he taught at the Barvenkovo School of Commerce, Russia (1912-18), and the Teachers' Institute at Halbstadt, Russia (1918-24).

In 1924 Epp immigrated to the United States; he lived at Bluffton, Ohio, serving on the faculty of Bluffton College until 1934. In that year he joined the faculty of the Ohio State University at Columbus, Ohio, teaching German and Russian. In 1946 he became ill with tuberculosis, after which he never completely regained his health, though he still taught some courses. He died on Jan. 9, 1954, and is buried in Union Cemetery, Columbus.

Peter Epp was an outstanding Mennonite author. His published works were Die Erlösung, Eine Mutter (q.v.), Johanna, and Das Geisslein. His largest work, "An der Molotschna," a manuscript, on which he made some entries four days before his death, is being prepared for publication by his wife. Other manuscripts, "Eros Multiformis" and "De Homine," have been accepted by the University of Basel for safekeeping until the year 2000. J.D.E.

Who's Who Among the Mennonites (North Newton, 1943).

Epp Mennonite Church, Rosthern, Sask., appears in H. P. Krehbiel's Mennonite Churches of North America (Newton, 1911) as an unaffiliated congregation of 60 members, with Cornelius Epp as pastor.

Eppenhof, a former Mennonite family, now extinct. Members of this family came from Burgsteinfurt (q.v.) in Westphalia, Germany, to Enschede, Dutch province of Overijssel, and especially to Winterswijk, Dutch province of Gelderland, where this family was found in the 17th century. Harmen Eppenhof, b. about 1620, d. 1693, and married to Henrica Willink (1614-81), was the last unsalaried and untrained minister of the Winterswijk congregation. In the 17th and 18th centuries members of this family are also found in Amsterdam, where some of them were deacons of the Lamist congregation. Laurens Hendriksz Eppenhof, formerly also a deacon and a Collegiant (q.v.), wrote two booklets against Galenus Abrahamsz: Nieuwe Jaars-geschenck, of Twalef Bedencklijcke Vragen (Amsterdam, 1682) and Ses-en-dertigh Grontstellingen aangaande de Reformatie der Protestanten (n.p., 1697). vdZ.

Eppstein, a village near Frankenthal in the Palatinate, Germany, in which Anabaptism found entry in its earliest period. Anabaptists living here perhaps belonged to the congregation at Lambsheim (q.v.), who signed the Concept of Cologne in May 1591 (Hege, 152). Their leader, Heinrich Gramm, belonged to a Mennonite family that lived in Eppstein through the upheavals of the Thirty Years' War, until the end of the 19th century. It is assumed that Anabaptists from Eppstein also took part in the Frankenthal (q.v.) disputation in 1571. And when the Palatine church council at Heidelberg reported July 4, 1603, that the number of Mennonites in the vicinity of Ruchheim had increased to 300, those of Eppstein may have been included.

But it is not until after the Thirty Years' War that there is definite information concerning the presence of Mennonites in Eppstein. The barons of Hundheim, to whom the village belonged, apparently received Mennonite refugees from Switzerland and protected them. In the register of Mennonites in the Palatinate (Karlsruher Generallandesarchiv-Akten) the place is mentioned first in 1685; a Peter Kintzi was living there. At the close of 1699 two families had settled there, and had to pay a protection fee. In the following years they were probably excused from the payment of this fee through the intervention of the von Hundheims, for they are not mentioned in the lists until 1752, when 14 families were recorded as having been accepted by the barons von Hundheim. Their names are as follows: Heinrich Pletscher with a family of 6; Christian Kaegy, 7; Heinrich Rohr(er), 6; Christian Jotter, 6; Johannes Hertzler, 4; Jakob Blickensdörfer, 5; Christian Stauffer, 5; Christian Neukumet, 7; Christian Hirschberger (Hirschler?), 7; Jost Krehbiel, 7; Christian Göbels, 6; Jakob Rohrer's widow, 6; Neukumet's widow, 3; and Christian Kaegy, 3. In the register of 1759 the following are listed: Christian Göbels, Christian Stauffer, Christian Kaegy, Jakob Heer, Jakob and Heinrich Rohr's widow, Samuel Kaegy, Christian Jotter, Jakob Hirschberger, Jakob Jotter, Johannes Hertzler, Johannes Blum, Jost Krehbiel. In 1773, 12 families with 33 sons are briefly mentioned. In near-by Lambsheim the 1717 list mentions Bernhard Schowalter, Friedrich Steiner, Emanuel Balzel; in 1738, Christian Hirschberger, a weaver, and Jakob Eschelmann, widower and day laborer with many children. In Flomersheim, only a few minutes from Eppstein, the 1738 list mentions Johannes Steiner and Jakob Baer, and in 1752 Heinrich Becker. In Oggersheim there are in 1717 Hans Weber; in 1742, Jost Jotter, Michael Bechtel, and Valentin Schmutz, all of whom no doubt belonged to the Eppstein congregation.

Nearly all of these families came from the Emmental (q.v.), Switzerland, as their names show. They formed a single congregation with the Mennonites in Friesenheim (q.v.) and Ruchheim (q.v.). The preachers in 1732 were Christian Neukomm, Melchior Everlein, Hans Jakob Hiestand, deacon of Friesenheim, and Ludwig Gross of Ruchheim. Elders of the Friesenheim-Eppstein congregation were Ulrich Hirschler 1738-68, and Johannes Möllinger 1768-80. In 1779, when Eppstein built a church, it chose as its elder Johannes Stauffer, after which Möllinger was elder only of Friesenheim. The center of church activity was Eppstein; but services were held in all three villages. In 1734 the congregation began an alms book, which was continued until the middle of the 19th century. When this record was begun, Jakob Rohrer took over the alms fund in place of Benedikt Balzel (Menn. Bl., 1879, 51).

In 1777 the Eppstein congregation purchased a plot of land for a cemetery from Johannes Blüm and Ludwig Strub. Services were at first held in various private homes, then regularly in the home of Elder Christian Stauffer. According to a notation in the alms book he was paid eight guilders in 1779 for the use of a room for two years for their meetings. In that year they built a small church with room for 120 persons, probably on the cemetery plot; it was dedicated on Sept. 5, 1779 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, 1545). On each side of the entry a vestibule was built, one to be used for meetings of the preachers, the other for funeral purposes. Both were later sacrificed for space in the auditorium. Instead of a pulpit there was a plain table; there were no seats for the preachers. In 1828 and again in 1914 the church was enlarged.

The Ibersheim resolutions of 1803 were signed by Heinrich Rohrer as preacher of the Eppstein church. He was followed by Heinrich Jotter, who died in 1824. Heinrich Ellenberger, a tailor from Gönnheim, took his place, and was the first preacher in Eppstein to receive remuneration. He also served the Friesenheim congregation until he emigrated to America in 1850. During the next four years Jakob Ellenberger (q.v.) looked after the church. In 1854 the congregations of Eppstein and Friesenheim chose the one-armed Christian Krehbiel of Wartenburg as their preacher. He had completed his theological studies at Erlangen, and was ordained in 1855. But he soon emigrated to America, too, where he died in 1878. Then Eppstein and Friesenheim were served by Heinrich Neufeld, the preacher of the Ibersheim church; since that time the three congregations have joined in supporting a preacher. When Neufeld took over the office of preaching in Friedrichstadt a.d.E., Jakob Ellenberger, nephew of the above Ellenberger, took his place for a short time. Hinrich van der Smissen preached for them in 1872-82, Thomas Löwenberg 1883-1917, E. Händiges 1917-23, Erich Göttner 1923-27, Abraham Braun 1928- , Daniel Habegger, assistant pastor, 1953- .

According to Frey's statistics there were in 1802, 68 Mennonites in Eppstein, 7 in Flomersheim; in 1834, 117 in Eppstein, 11 in Flomersheim, 4 in Heuchelheim, 2 in Lambsheim, and 2 in Hessheim. In 1953 the church numbered ca. 120 souls. The church is a member of the Vereinigung, the Palatine-Hessian Conference, and the Conference of the South German Mennonites. The Palatine-Hessian Conference has met repeatedly at Eppstein.

The Eppstein congregation was repeatedly assisted by the Dutch Mennonites (Committee for Foreign Needs). In 1714 some Swiss refugee settlers received aid. In 1781 they asked and obtained assistance because they had to pay a double poll tax to the "lord of Eppstein," and had built a new church. In 1828-43 they again received gifts from the Amsterdam congregation. NEFF.

Erasmus, Desiderius, b. 1466 at Rotterdam, Holland, d. 1536 at Freiburg, Germany, known as Erasmus of Rotterdam, the greatest humanist of the 16th century, was the son of a priest, Rogerius Gerardus. Erasmus attended the public school at Gouda, and continued his education at Deventer. In 1487 he became an Augustinian canon in the monastery of St. Gregory's at Steyn. He was ordained to the priesthood in 1495. He was released from the intolerable restrictions of monastic life by Henri Bergen, bishop of Cambrai, who made him his secretary, and aided him in his further studies and travels. In the succeeding years he found a number of generous patrons.

In 1500 appeared the first edition of his Adagia, a collection of short sayings with witty interpretations. He lived in a number of different countries, but was apparently happiest in England. Here, in the home of Sir Thomas More, he wrote his Encomium Moriae (In Praise of Folly) (1526), which was translated into many languages. He was involved in disputes with many scholars in Europe on various aspects of intellectual and academic liberty as opposed to the stereotyped practice of the day. He remained Catholic, though his sympathies were at least equally on the Protestant side. He wrote a vast amount; the most significant of his works were his theological studies and commentaries.

The services rendered by Erasmus for the Reformation are very great. (1) In his work to improve the scholarly editions of the Greek and Latin New Testament he laid the foundation for the Bible translations of the Reformation. (2) His merciless mockery of stupidity undermined for a large part of the laity the authority of the clergy. It was due to his idea that I John 5:7 (the text on the Trinity) was spurious, that this verse was omitted from the older Anabaptist translations and was enclosed in parentheses in the later Biestkens Bible (q.v.).

Furthermore, F. Pijper has demonstrated that the great difference between the Lutheran Reformation and the early Dutch Reformation was due to the influence of the writings of Erasmus on the Dutch clergy. This fact is sufficient to understand that the Dutch Anabaptists were deeply influenced by Erasmus, an influence that is evident in two respects: (1) The large number of citations from Erasmus found in the works of Menno Simons, shows his thorough acquaintance with the works of Erasmus. This is also true of the writings of Adam Pastor and Dirk Philips, who may have been somewhat influenced by him. (2) The Dutch Anabaptists of the 16th century were in the great majority of cases believers in the freedom of the will as defended by Erasmus against Luther.

It is not very likely that the Dutch Anabaptists derived their principle of nonresistance from the treatise on war by Erasmus, entitled Dulce Bellum inexpertis, of 1525, for Erasmus' ideas are more humanistic and negative, those of the Anabaptists more Biblical and positive. Besides, the Dutch translation of the treatise from the original Latin did not appear before 1560. K.V., vdZ.

German Anabaptism also shows no small degree of influence by Erasmus, especially among the leaders on the Lower Rhine. Campanus (q.v.) and Thomas von Imbroich (q.v.) often quote him in their writings and speak of him in terms of great appreciation. On baptism and communion, the Trinity, and freedom of the will Erasmus offered so much that was in accord with Anabaptist teaching, that he was suspected not only of promoting their cause, but even of being one of them (Rembert, 26). In designating the Bible as the sole source of Christian truth, in promoting the use of the Bible in the vernacular, in stressing that "Christianity is essentially a life of discipleship of Christ," he expressed common Anabaptist demands. His Enchiridion militis christiani (1502), "a fine devotional book of the educated world," in which he promoted a Christianity interpreted by the Sermon on the Mount, was read in Anabaptist circles, especially after it was available in a Dutch translation (about 1550). The extent of Erasmus' influence on Hans Denk is still to be investigated. Some personal contact while they were both living in Basel can be assumed. But their agreement on points of doctrine is probably caused by the common source of their concepts, viz., German Mysticism. Erasmus' Dulce bellum inexpertis (War Is Sweet to Those Who Have Not Experienced It) of 1525 and other pamphlets in which he showed the evils and the misery of war and satirized those who glorified warfare may also have influenced the Anabaptists and Mennonites to strengthen their peace principles. H. S. Bender has discussed Erasmus as a possible source for the pacifism of the early Swiss Brethren, particularly Conrad Grebel in Zürich, in his Grebel biography (201 ff.) but concludes that the Erasmian pacifism was humanitarian whereas that of Grebel and his associates was Biblical. He says, "Between the opportunism of an Erasmus who would be willing to let a ruler decide whether a war was just or not, and the absolutism of a Grebel who would dare to say that 'among believing Christians killing is done away with altogether' there is a world of difference. It is unthinkable that Grebel derived his deep conviction on this point from his humanist background."

Erasmus' judgment of Anabaptism is worthy of note. Though he sharply rejects and condemns their consistency, he also notes their pious conduct which sets them apart. They are to be commended above others for the blamelessness of their lives (Rembert, 566). In 1534 he also wrote to Guido Morillon, "The Anabaptists have flooded the Low Countries just as the frogs and locusts flooded Egypt, a mad generation, doomed to die. They slipped in under the appearance of piety, but their end will be public robbery. And what is like a miracle, although they teach absurdities, not to say impossibilities, and although they spread unlovely things, the populace is attracted as if by a fateful mood or rather the impulse of an evil spirit in this sect" (Erasmus, Op. III, 1186). In their spirit of sacrifice unto death and their faithfulness to conviction the Anabaptists far surpassed the learned but vacillating scholar. Walther Köhler said significantly: "The Anabaptists were closer to Erasmus than to Luther, but they popularized and hence spiritualized him" (Flugschriften II, No. 3).

The degree of influence of humanism upon the early Anabaptists or even the very rise of Anabaptism and its theology is still debated. Recently Köhler and others have pressed strongly their belief that Anabaptism owes much to humanism, and particularly to Erasmus. At the same time Köhler stresses, and rightly so, their essential Biblicism, and it is evident that many Anabaptists came directly out of Lutheran and Zwinglian circles. In Zürich the first Anabaptists were all Zwinglians, not Erasmians. The difficulty in answering the question is due in part to the variation among those outwardly belonging to the movement in the earlier days. If one makes the very necessary discrimination between spiritualists and Anabaptists and assigns such as Denk and Campanus to the fringes rather than to the heart of Anabaptism, the answer becomes easier; the Anabaptists were far more Biblical-evangelical than humanistic. Nevertheless the question is not yet fully cleared up; the final answer is still to be given and awaits a more thorough study of Anabaptist theology. NEFF, H.S.B.

Erb, a Mennonite family name first represented in America by Nicholas Erb (1679-1740), who came to Lancaster Co., Pa., from the Emmental, Switzerland, via the Palatinate, Germany, before 1722, and settled on the Cocalico Creek in Warwick Township. He was a Mennonite pioneer farmer and is buried on the present Garman farm, his home. His family included John, Nicholas, Christian, Jacob, and Magdalena (Johns). Of Christian's line, Abraham founded Waterloo, Ont., John built the mills at the center of Preston, Ont., and Christian Erb and his sister Susanna, wife of Jacob Brubacher, with Jacob, Daniel, and Peter, gave the impetus to establish the Mennonite church in Kitchener. John Erb in Cumberland Co., Pa., donated land for Erb's church three miles east of Carlisle (q.v.). This John was the father of John (1840-1913), a preacher of Strickler's church, Dauphin Co., Pa. Jacob Erb (1804-83), the tenth bishop of the United Brethren Church, was reared in a Mennonite home. Tillman M. Erb (1865-1929), bishop of the Pennsylvania church, Hesston, Kan., and his sons Bishop Allen Erb of Lebanon, Ore., and Paul Erb, editor of the Gospel Herald, and Paul's son, Delbert Erb, Mennonite missionary to Argentina, are part of the numerous Nicholas progeny. Bishop J. Frederick Erb of the Detroit, Mich., Mennonite Church comes from this line. There is also an Amish Erb line chiefly located in Waterloo Co., Ont. I.D.L.

Erb, Tillman M., only son of Jacob B. and Leah Miller Erb, was born Nov. 3, 1865, near Mt. Joy, Lancaster Co., Pa. He was descended from a Swiss-German family who had immigrated in the early 18th century. On Nov. 18, 1886, he was married to Lizzie Ann Hess at Ephrata, Pa. Four sons and seven daughters were born to them, two dying in childhood. Allen, the oldest son, became a minister and bishop in the Mennonite Church (MC) and is active in the hospital work of the church. Paul, the second son, also a minister, has taught at Hesston and Goshen colleges and became editor of the Gospel Herald in 1944. Erb's formal education was interrupted after one year of high school. He and his wife joined the Pennsylvania Mennonite Church (MC) near Newton, Kan., on July 31, 1887. He was ordained minister in 1893 and bishop in 1898. He was at various times moderator of the district conference. He was for many years a member of the Mennonite Board of Education and business manager of Hesston College and Bible School 1908-29. He helped to establish missions in Kansas City and Wichita. His residences were Mt. Joy, 1865-85; Newton, 1885-89, 1894-95, 1900-10; Hesston, 1889-94, 1910-24; Harper, Kan., 1895-1900. He was a businessman (creamery) and farmer (dairy) in addition to engaging in church and school work. As a community builder he served on the city councils in Harper and Hesston. His chief contribution was as an organizer of churches and institutions, particularly as the chief promoter of a church school in the West. He was severely burned in 1912, which was the indirect cause of his death on Jan. 25, 1929. He is buried in the Pennsylvania Cemetery, Harvey Co., Kan.† P.E.

Erb Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, was located in Cumberland Co., Pa. John Erb, David Martin, Benjamin Ebersole, and others had moved into the Cumberland Valley, 10 miles west of Slate Hill and 3 miles east of Carlisle. In 1834 John Erb was ordained to the ministry, and the following year he donated ground for the erection of a meetinghouse. This was transferred in 1843 to Abraham Hertzler and Jacob Nissley as trustees, and therefore it is also called "Hertzler." This building and Herr's, six miles south, provided worship facilities for years in these communities. The cemetery remains, but the building has been razed. The bishop oversight was supplied from Lancaster Mennonite Conference, of which this congregation was always a member. I.D.L.

Erb Mennonite Church (MC) in the Lancaster Mennonite Conference, midway between Manheim and Lititz, Lancaster Co., Pa. Previous to its organization about 1794, it was a part of the Rapho Township congregation. The first meetinghouse was built in 1794. At that time the minister and probably bishop of the congregation was Peter Lehman of Rapho Township. The 1955 membership was 243. The bishops were Henry E. Lutz and Homer D. Bomberger; ministers, Joseph A. Boll and Joseph W. Boll; deacon, Harold G. Holdeman. N.W.N.

Erb Street Mennonite Church (MC), located in Waterloo, Ont., a member of the Ontario Conference, was organized by settlers who came from Pennsylvania in 1810-25—David Eby, Jonas Bingeman, and Samuel Schantz. The meetinghouse was built about two miles west of Waterloo and was known as the David Eby Church. In 1902 a new church was built in town, which was rebuilt and enlarged in 1950. Among the earlier leaders were the ministers Elias Schneider, Jonas Snider, and Noah Hunsberger, and the deacons Abram Hunsberger and Noah Weber. In more recent years the leaders have been Newton Weber, Jesse B. Martin, and Clare Shantz. It was within the Waterloo congregation that the first evangelistic meetings were held in private homes, about 1885. In 1886 a Sunday school was held in a schoolhouse, and later in the David Eby Church. Also in 1890 "Edification meetings" began in private homes. Foreign missionaries from the congregation were L. S. Weber and his wife, and Edna Good, in South America. The present minister and bishop of the congregation is Jesse B. Martin, and the membership is 281. J.B.M.

L. J. Burkholder, A Brief History of the Mennonites in Ontario (Toronto, 1935).

Erbe, Fritz, an Anabaptist of Thuringia, who suffered a tedious martyrdom in chains with steadfast loyalty. He owned a large farm in Herda, a village in the Eisenach district. Early in October 1531 he was arrested because he had been baptized on his faith, and taken to Eisenach. At the end of January 1532 he was released by Philip of Hesse, perhaps as a result of recanting (Wappler, 210). When he took the Anabaptist Margarethe Koch, die alte Garköchin, into his house and refused to have his child baptized on the ground that baptism would not benefit it as long as it could not desire it, he was again arrested in January 1533. John Frederick, the elector of Saxony, insisted that he be put to death, basing his verdict on an opinion of the Wittenberg theologians and jurists recommending death by the sword for rebaptized persons. But Philip, who had joint jurisdiction over Hausbreitenbach, to which Herda belonged, did not give his consent. He hesitated to execute a man for his faith, since faith is a gift of God; and if it is an erring faith it is accepted out of ignorance, not malice. He favored expulsion from the country. A long correspondence between the two rulers followed, as well as lengthy negotiations with courts and officials.

Meanwhile Fritz Erbe lay in his dungeon in a remote tower of the city wall. His friends and the Anabaptists were moved by deep sympathy and honored him as a martyr. In the depth of night they came to him to talk to him and to give and receive strength of faith. Two visitors were seized and executed in November 1537. In 1539 three other Anabaptist visitors were arrested; after cruel torture they recanted and were released. When people approached the tower by day and requested to be imprisoned with Erbe, he was taken to a tower in the Wartburg. His unhappy lot stirred the sympathy of the bailiff, Eberhard von Tann. Though Tann was a decided opponent of the Anabaptists he brought it about that an attempt was made to convert Erbe. To this end Erbe was taken to the monastery in Eisenach and kept there in chains for four weeks (1541). His long imprisonment ruined his health, but his spirit remained firm. At the close of the fruitless attempt at conversion he was returned to a back tower in the Wartburg. On June 8, 1544, lightning struck there, setting the tower afire. Erbe's cries of alarm summoned the men of the castle and the town to extinguish the flames. After an imprisonment of 16 consecutive years, the sorely tried martyr was released by merciful death in 1548. He was buried in the Wartburg near the chapel of St. Elisabeth. NEFF.

Erbesbüdesheim, a village in Rhenish Hesse near Alzey, where there was a Mennonite church in the 18th century, since 1829 the Uffhofen (q.v.) congregation. The Martyrs' Mirror reports that in 1529, 350 Anabaptists were put to death at Alzey (Hege, 53 ff.); this figure is questioned by Krebs. About 1550 Hutterites settled in the region of Kreuznach (q.v.) and Sprendlingen (q.v.), near Erbesbüdesheim (Hege, 80). In 1568 there were still some Anabaptists in prison at Alzey, who received a letter of consolation from Peter Walpot (q.v.) in Moravia (Hege, 110). The congregation at Kreuznach is listed among the signatures of the Concept of Cologne (Rembert, 618). A list compiled at the end of 1610 counts 41 families in the region of Kreuznach, whose farms were confiscated because they were Anabaptists. Apparently during the next 30 or 40 years the congregation became extinct. The villages are unfortunately not named. After the Thirty Years' War (1618-48) this region was one of the first to receive Mennonite refugees from Switzerland.

In 1738 Mennonites are mentioned for the first time in the official lists drawn up in the Palatinate (Karlsruher Generallandesarchiv); seven families were living near Erbesbüdesheim on the von Rohan and Laroche estates, where they were received during the reign of Karl Ludwig (Karlsruher Akten, Rechtsverhältnisse). They were Jost (elder and younger) and Christian Eicher, Oswald Neff, Ulrich Leonhard, Hans Jakob Boxler, and Anna Andres, widow. Evidently the families living at Kriegsfeld, Michael Lichte and the widows of Michael Andres and Christian Fischer, also belonged to the Erbesbüdesheim congregation. The list of 1743 names a Johannes Schowalter family, and those of 1752 and 1753 the families of Valentine Dahlem (1749), at Nack (the castle) Jakob Stauffer and Christian Eymann (1751), at Schniftenbergerhof Jakob Heer (1747), and in 1759 a Jakob Neukumet family.

In the Dutch Naamlijsten (first mentioned in 1766, when the congregation is called Rheingrafenstein-Erbesbüdesheim-Weierhof) the following elders and preachers are listed for Erbesbüdesheim: Elder, Ulrich Ellenberger, 1743-67; Johannes Möllinger; Christian Stauffer; Christian Göbel; Heinrich Plätscher; Jakob Gally (Galle), preacher 1762, elder 1767; Jacob Heer (no dates); David Hüthwohl, 1769-86; Christian Eicher, preacher 1786, elder 1798; and Jacob Galle, 1801-?

At first they held their services in the Nack castle, later at the Erbesbüdesheim castle. Until 1748 this congregation and the Weierhof (q.v.) congregation had the same preacher and a common alms fund. In the second half of the 18th century the Erbesbüdesheim congregation met at the Schniftenbergerhof. It is listed by this name in the records of the Ibersheim conference of 1803, which were signed by Christian Eicher for this church. When the Schniftenbergerhof was leased to a Protestant in 1824, Eicher offered the Mennonites the use of his house for their meetings. In 1829 the seat of the congregation was moved to Uffhofen (q.v.). At present there are no Mennonites in Nack and Erbesbüdesheim. NEFF, VDZ.

Erbkam, Wilhelm Heinrich (1810-84), professor of theology at the University of Königsberg, author of Geschichte der protestantischen Sekten im Zeitalter der Reformation (Hamburg and Gotha, 1848), a book that "is a valuable contribution to the history of the Reformation, based on most thorough study" (HRE V, 449). Later research has, of course, overtaken it. Its value lies in the author's laudable attempt to present an independent, objective account, rare among Protestant theologians, of the history of the Anabaptists. He found the roots of this great movement in Christian Mysticism, and to it he devoted a lengthy study, which presents much that is noteworthy. In this connection he presented at great length Carlstadt, Sebastian Franck, and Caspar Schwenckfeld as representatives of Christian Mysticism, and in the second part of his book a brief summary of Anabaptist history. He exploited the sources available to him; but since he approached them with a bias, and, for example, regarded Bullinger's statements as unassailable truth, and furthermore since many sources now available were unknown to him, he was unable to present a true picture of Anabaptist history. Hans Denk he handled with a few words; Michael Sattler he did not even mention. His book has a purely antiquarian value for Anabaptist history. (ML I, 602.) NEFF.

Erfordter, Antoni, was the most outstanding of the Anabaptists in Carinthia. Nothing is known of his youth, nor how or when he was won to the Anabaptist movement. In 1538 he was in Klagenfurt, where he owned a house. There he wrote his Urlaubsbrief, viz., a severe sermon against the immorality and lack of faith of his contemporaries, especially the rich and those clergymen "who practice idolatry and lie on cushions." He aims his blows at the followers of the pope as well as those of Luther, and in plainness of language he surpasses even Luther. His censure is meant for a clergy that praises the Law of God with lofty words, but never in the least translates it into action; for rulers and subjects "who know the rascality of the clergy, and yet roar with them." They all continue to sin against God's mercy "and remain in their old shoes." King Ferdinand fares very badly, "who persecute Christ in His members. Today your mandates are proclaimed that one may no longer speak, write, nor sing the name of Jesus." Concerning governments he says, "If they are no good, how can the subjects be good?" The gentlemen on the council and court fare equally badly.

It is a type of eloquence that the common man understood. It is not different from the speeches of the Estates in the Carinthian diets. Klagenfurt had an unusually bad reputation: "A pigeon could carry all the Christians away on its back," he wrote. Erfordter then attacked the superstitions of the time, citing some striking examples which offer a good picture of moral conditions. In such company he did not care to live. He adhered to the Anabaptists Donner (q.v.) and Brandl. Thrown into prison for this he was "so violently threatened by his ruffian jailors to wall him up alive, that he was compelled to call the confession of faith of the two men of God a sect and a seduction." This declaration now grieved him, and so "he wanted to retract it now, and loudly confess that the teaching of these men is the real truth." To his fellow citizens he said, "Do not be surprised that there are here in Klagenfurt, Villach, St. Veit, and Völkermarkt, indeed perhaps in all Carinthia scarcely one or two pious Christians to be found; and there you have the reason for my departure from you."

Erfordter went to Moravia and was there ordained as a preacher (Diener des Wortes). When the Anabaptist meeting at Steinabrunn, Lower Austria, December 1539, was surprised and 136 members taken prisoner to the castle at Falkenstein, he wrote them (in 1540) an epistle and a moving poem of consolation. "Would to God," he wrote, "that I could serve you and die for you."

Erfordter was one of the best poets among the Brethren. He is the author of several fine songs, which praise the deeds of the Hutterite martyrs and describe the sorrows of the prisoners. The song "Ach Gott, wem soll ichs klagen?" pictures their suffering under constant persecution. His most famous song is "Ich armes Brüderlein klag mich sehr," which describes his own distress. It was written at the time when he bade farewell to his wife and his people in Klagenfurt. Two other songs should also be mentioned. "Susanne war in Aengsten gross," and "Wol auf, wol auf, von hinnen, im Kampf, ihr Brüder wert."

Erfordter died in 1541 on the Bruderhof either of Pausram or of Schackwitz (near Austerlitz), where the largest Hutterite settlements were located. His songs are published in Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 107-15, and Wolkan, Lieder, 173-78 and 248. LOSERTH.

J. Loserth, "The Anabaptists in Carinthia in the 16th Century," MQR XXI (1947) 235-47; the Urlaubsbrief is printed in extenso in J. v. Beck, "Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Kärnten," Archiv des Hist. Vereins f. Kärnten XI (1867) and in excerpts in L. Erhard, Christoph, an Austrian Catholic theologian of the second half of the 16th century, aggressive champion of the Counter Reformation (q.v.), and polemical writer against the Hutterites. Around 1582-83 Adam von Dietrichstein (q.v.) called him to Nikolsburg, Moravia (q.v.), as parish priest with the special assignment to promote the recatholization of this noble estate and by all means to suppress the Anabaptist "heresy" of that area. For the next six years he worked vigorously in this direction, after which he was called to Salzburg to become a counselor of the archbishop. While in Nikolsburg he naturally came into closest contact also with the Hutterites. Since they resisted his attempts toward conversion to Catholicism, he had nothing but contempt for them, pouring his vitriolic invectives against them into his books. It is these books which attract our interest to this otherwise not very important man.

Four titles have become known: (1) Zwelff wichtige und starcke Ursachen Hansen Jedelshausers von Ulm seines Handwercks ein Nadler, Warumb er mit seinem ehelichen Weib und vier Kindern von den Widertauffern, so man Hutterische Brüder nennt, sey abgetretten (Ingolstadt, 1587; allegedly Erhard was only the editor of this small pamphlet and wrote the preface); (2) Gründliche kurtz verfaste Historia von Münsterischen Widertauffern: und wie die Hutterischen Brüder so auch billich Widertauffer genent werden (Munich, 1589. The title page has an interesting woodcut showing a Hutterite house with a Hutterite man, woman, and child in front. Copy in Goshen College Library); (3) Catholische Brief(e) und Sendschreiben, darinnen vermeldet wie es eine Beschaffenheit um das Religionswesen in der Herrschaft Nikolsburg in Mähren, sampt angedrucktem Gespräch (Ingolstadt, 1586); (4) Salus ex inimicis. Goliaths Schwerdt. Augenscheinliche Erweysung, was wir Catholische unnd alte Christen für klare unnd kräfftige Argumenta und Zeugnussen haben. . . . Mit angehängten Ursachen, warumb all jetzt schwebende Sectierer und Ketzer, als da seynd Zwinglianer . . . und Widertauffer, ihrer Communion halben, von den Catholischen gestraffet werden (Ingolstadt, 1586, copy in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library). Of these only the second-named book is of any significance for Anabaptist studies. The first book, claiming to be a genuine recantation and confession of a former Anabaptist who had turned Catholic, hardly deserves more than passing mention. It abounds in stark lies in order to bring the Hutterites into disrepute (for instance, it is claimed that Jakob Hutter was executed for adultery). The Gründliche Kurz Verfasste Historia of 1589, a book of about 130 pages, is more important as a polemical pamphlet, as one learns from it some of the material which the opponents used to incite hatred against the Brethren. It is a very poor performance in this regard, and outdoes in untruth the first-named pamphlet. There is no vice which "after the example of the Münsterites" could not also be found with the Hutterites. They have the same goal as the Münsterites and commit the same horrible deeds. They are drunkards and brawlers, thieves and adulterers; they are arrogant and puffed up, even insolent. Hutter is an ignorant ass, a robber and rebel, etc. The Chronicle he calls a book of lies. He also quotes the "new song" of Johann Eysvogel (q.v.) of Cologne (1583), in which the fraud of the Anabaptists is "unmasked." The book ends with a warning against these "miserable confused heretics."

The third book (1586) is more or less a boasting about Erhard's great achievements in Nikolsburg, formerly a stronghold of heretics and now again Catholic. It is a eulogy of the Dietrichsteins who have promoted this new movement of the Roman Church. Actually he had little reason to boast about his work. It was not until 1619-22 that the Hutterites had to leave the place and the Counter Reformation could record a full victory. The polemics of Erhard, however, were soon taken up by another Catholic priest, the bellicose Christoph A. Fischer (q.v.) of the same area, whose attacks were much more subtle and matter-of-fact than those of the Gründliche Historia. But all these pamphlets brought about much hardship for the Brethren, hard pressed and slandered as they were already. LOSERTH, R.F.

These pamphlets were used as source materials by V. A. Winter, for his historical work, Geschichte der bayrischen Wiedertäufer im 16. Jahrhundert (Munich, 1809), as he notes on page 126; J. Loserth, Communismus; ML I, 606.

Erie County in western New York, located at the eastern end of Lake Erie. Mennonites live chiefly in the northeastern part. Approximately 400 Mennonites in the county represent three branches, Mennonites (MC) constituting about one half, Conservative Amish Mennonites about 45 per cent, and Reformed Mennonites about 5 per cent of the total. The Mennonite settlement extends north into Niagara County, and east into Genesee County. The first Mennonite settlers arrived here from eastern Pennsylvania in the early part of the 19th century, but their descendants became inactive in their relation to the Mennonite church in the last part of that century and the first part of the 20th. Another settlement made between 1920 and 1930 represents the present M.C. and C.A.M. churches. (See Clarence.) D.E.D.

Eriksz, Jan, was for a certain time a leader of the Dutch Waterlander Mennonites in Friesland, but left this group in 1613. Nothing more is known about him. (DB 1876, 37.) vdZ.

Erisman Mennonite Church (MC) formerly met in a meetinghouse built in 1798 on lands of Abraham Erisman in Rapho Township on the Mt. Joy-Manheim Road, in Lancaster Co., Pa. In 1891 the present brick church was built. The congregation of 214 (1953), belonging to the Lancaster Mennonite Conference, is a conservative growing fellowship which still bears the impress of the work of Bishop Jacob N. Brubacher (d. 1913). In 1953 Henry E. Lutz and Homer D. Bomberger were the bishops, Martin G. Metzler and John S. Eby the ministers, and Harvey E. Metzler the deacon. Missionaries Elam and Grace Metzler Stauffer in Africa and the Elam Hollingers in Alabama are from this congregation. I.D.L.

Ernest (German, Ernst) (1497-1546), Duke of Brunswick-Lüneburg in 1521-46, called "the Confessor." He introduced Lutheranism into his realm (1527). When he was asked by Philip of Hesse for an opinion on the punishment of Anabaptists, he sent one drawn up by Urban Rhegius in 1536 with the remark that a more detailed statement would require exact information on the activities of the Anabaptists; this he lacked, as the movement had not found entry into his realm. Ernsthafte Christenpflicht, the first complete and self-contained German prayer book for Mennonites, most likely of Palatine origin. In general, Mennonites practiced free, extemporaneous prayer at church and at home. Soon after 1600, however, Dutch Mennonites seem to have felt a need also for printed prayers, mainly for home devotions, and a few short collections of such prayers were published. Yet it was not until the early 18th century that the "Swiss" Mennonites in South Germany (Palatinate) took the decisive step of producing a complete prayer book of their own, a modest but independent publication of far-reaching influence. Its full title (first edition) is Die Ernsthaffte Christenpflicht, Darinnen Schöne Geistliche Gebäter, Darmit sich fromme Christen-Herzen zu allen Zeiten und in allen Nöhten trösten können. Gedruckt im Jar 1739, Zu finden in Kayserslautern bei dem Buchbinder (only known copy in Goshen College Library). It is a small book of 323 pages of prayers, with appended index and the "Haslibacher-Lied" (q.v.). It contains a total of 36 prayers; namely, 2 prayers for every day, 5 prayers in temptation and anxiety, and 29 "general" prayers. Later 19th-century editions increased the number of prayers to 50, including also prayers for church services and other occasions, thus changing the character of the book. The book went through many editions; Europe saw 13 editions between 1739 and 1852, printed in Kaiserslautern, Saarburg, Zweybrücken, Herborn in Nassau, Reinach, Basel (Mechel pub., q.v.), Regensburg; in America 32 editions, all in the German language, were produced between 1745 and 1955. The oldest American edition was printed at the Ephrata Cloister, Pa. (q.v.), surprisingly as early as six years after the first (known) European edition. The book is still today in demand by the Amish congregations (last edition was produced for the Amish in Lancaster Co., Pa.), who have preserved their German worship. The book has never been translated and hence came into disuse when the congregations shifted to the English. Today most Mennonites are completely ignorant of the existence of any prayer book of Mennonite origin.

As is the case with nearly all prayer books in existence, this one represents but a compilation of older models, Mennonite and non-Mennonite, partly rephrased and extended, and partly simply copied from other prayer books. It is an attractive task to trace all these models and forerunners, and to study their gradual changes. The main Mennonite source seems to have been a collection of 18 prayers by the well-known hymn writer Leenaerdt Clock (q.v.), first published as a "formulary" in Holland in 1625. It was later reprinted by T. T. van Sittert (q.v.) in his church manual, Glaubensbekenntnis, etc., 1664, in a German translation. This rather modest collection (Formulier etlicher Gebete) unexpectedly became the prayer model of the Mennonites for centuries to come, much changed, of course, in form and spirit during this period of borrowing. In Switzerland one particularly extensive "general" prayer of this Formulier became strangely popular and was twice printed previous to the Christenpflicht though in paraphrased form (Reist, q.v., Sendbrief, q.v.). The Christenpflicht then brings still another version of this same prayer, adjusted to the new needs and conditions, and also breaks it up into 16 shorter prayer passages, in vielen Anliegen und Nöten zu sprechen, amplifying the different paragraphs of the former prayer, without, however, adding any new thought. Worth noticing is an ever-recurring passage in all these prayers on behalf of "those goodhearted people who love us and do good unto us and prove mercy with food and drink . . . but who have little strength to come into the obedience of God." It alludes to the "Half-Anabaptists" (q.v.) in Switzerland who were sympathizers with the Brethren, yet never joined the brotherhood.

Among the non-Mennonite sources of the Christenpflicht, two major prayer collections could be identified from which prayers were lifted verbatim without any change: Johannes Arndt's Paradies-Gärtlein (1612), from which three prayers were taken, and Caspar Schwenckfeld's Deutsches Passional, 1539 (many anonymous editions since), from which at least five prayers were adopted, of course, without knowing that they come from a man who in his lifetime had opposed their Anabaptist forefathers. In fairness it must be said that it had always been the usage in producing new prayer books to borrow from older models. That was true with Cranmer's Book of Common Prayers in England, and it was also true with Schwenckfeld or Arndt or with the Dutch Reformed prayer book which Clock might have used as a model for his short Formulier. In spite of all these transfers, however, the Ernsthafte Christenpflicht should be viewed as a completely new and original work, produced by and for Mennonites in the Palatinate. It was originally intended for private devotion only, not for use in church services (as the later editions might suggest). Its spirit, to be sure, is rather remote from that of the great beginning, it being nearer to the spirit of Arndt (or even of Schwenckfeld) than to that of the Ausbund or of Menno Simons. It most likely contributed to shaping the new, 18th-century pattern of Mennonite piety which came so close to that of the German pietists. (See Prayer and Prayerbooks.)† R.F.

Ernstige Aenporringhe tot Gemeenschap der Heyligen, a Dutch Mennonite pamphlet, which appeared after the Frisian and High German Mennonites in Holland had resolved to unite. It is a peaceful and moderate writing, condemning discord and schism among the brethren, and first published in Amsterdam in 1630 together with Jan Cents' confession, which was to be the basis of the union of the Frisian and High German groups in 1639. Some extracts of it were reprinted together with other documents by Geleyn Jansz at Vlissingen in 1666. (H. W. Meihuizen, Galenus Abrahamsz, Haarlem, 1954.) vdZ.

Ernstweiler, a village near Zweibrücken in the Palatinate, Germany, where a Mennonite congregation has been meeting since about 1770, which had its origin about 1680. It was formerly called the Gemeinde bei Zweibrücken. Its members are descendants of refugees from the canton of Bern in Switzerland who settled in Alsace and the Palatinate at the end of the 17th century and the beginning of the 18th, whence they gradually made their way to the duchy of Zweibrücken. They lived scattered on farms and mills or singly in villages as renters or owners of farms. At first they met in rotation on the Heidelbingerhof, Ernstweilerhof, Kahlenbergerhof, Freishauserhof, Hornbacherhof, Neuhof, and Kirchheimerhof. Early preachers were Johannes Schöny 1749, Johannes Lehmann 1745, Johann Schmidt 1755, Peter Böhn 1757, Joseph Schnebele 1762, Christian Lehmann 1813 (elder 1819), Jakob Schnebele 1829. The Ibersheim resolutions of 1803 were signed for the "congregation near Zweibrücken" by Ulrich Lehmann. Other later preachers were Jakob Finger of Bamsterhof, Christian Lehmann, Jr., of Waldhausen, Joseph Dahlem of Hunackerhof, Weber of Hornbacherhof, Böhr of Unterhof. In 1843 the congregation built a church in Ernstweiler. In 1876 the Ernstweiler congregation united with Kühbörncheshof (q.v.) and Neudorferhof (q.v.) in maintaining a preacher. They were served 1876-79 by S. Blickensdörfer of the Kohlhof, a teacher at the school at Weierhof (q.v.), and previously a student at the missionary school in Basel (Menn. Bl., 1877, 15), the first trained and salaried minister. When he was called to Sembach (q.v.) his place was filled by A. Hirschler of Kaiserslautern (q.v.), who served 50 years 1880-1930. He was followed by A. Harder 1931-35, and H. Scheffler 1935-37. In 1898 the church was incorporated. In 1923 the congregation numbered about 140 souls. In 1937 it was merged with Ixheim (q.v.) to form the Zweibrücken (q.v.) congregation. At that time it had 114 baptized members. NEFF.

Erntefeld, a bimonthly 8-page (at the beginning) periodical 6 x 8 in., started by the Mennonite Brethren missionaries at Nalgonda, India, in 1900, not published after 1914-15, had 1,550 readers. Its editor was the missionary Abraham Friesen, and it was printed by the Raduga firm at Halbstadt, Russia. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 565, 672.) C.K.

Erpolzheim, a village in the Rhenish Palatinate, Germany, near Bad Dürkheim, the seat of a Mennonite church which has always been closely connected with Friedelsheim (q.v.). Its existence before the Thirty Years' War is probable, for on Oct. 20, 1600, the Reformed Church Council at Heidelberg reported to the elector that "in the vicinity of Erpolzheim the Anabaptists hold their night meetings" (Hege, 163). Since Erpolzheim belonged to the county of Hardenburg, the Mennonites living there were not listed in the registers required by the Palatine government. Only once was there an incidental reference in the records of the Karlsruhe Generallandesarchiv, stating that a Mennonite by the name of Nikolaus Zerger lived in Erpolzheim about 1689, whose Mennonite maid Anna Marie joined the Reformed Church. In 1732 a deacon of the Friedelsheim church was a Hans Berger, who lived at Erpolzheim (Müller, 211). In the Lutheran and Reformed registers of deaths the following Mennonite names occur (1753-97): Johannes Ummel (d. 1764), Berger, Herbach, Rothen, Ellenberger, Neff, Latscha, Eicher, Bergtholdt, Herstein, Schnebel, Lichti, Wissler, Pletscher, Kinzinger, Zercher, Gut.

In a commissary's list to the French army (1795-96) are found these names: Johannes and Heinrich Bergtholdt, Johannes and Peter Pletscher, Nikolaus and Georg Hodel, Johannes Latscha's widow, Jakob Schnebele's widow, and Heinrich Berger's widow. According to a later war-debt list the following lived at Erpolzheim in 1807: Peter Pletscher, Jakob Schnebele's widow, Jakob Schnebele's children from his first marriage, Johannes Latscha's widow, Philip Hodel, Katharina Hodelin, Heinrich Ummel, Jakob and Heinrich Bergtholdt, Heinrich Berger's widow, and Christian Hirstein.

The church seems to have been strongest in the second half of the 18th century, perhaps even surpassing Friedelsheim. According to Frey there were in Erpolzheim in 1802, 40 Mennonites, in 1834 only 10; perhaps many had emigrated to America. In 1923 two families, Becker and Bergtholdt, were living there. In 1954 there were resident in Erpolzheim 20 members of the Friedelsheim congregation, 11 of whom were refugees from the Danzig area.

According to the Dutch Naamlijsten the elders and ministers of the Erpolzheim-Friedelsheim congregation (first mentioned in 1766) were as follows: elders—Abraham Ellenberger, 1738-76(?); Abraham Ellenberger, Jr., 1776-?; Jacob Näff, Heinrich Wiesler, and Heinrich Pletscher, all 1790-?; preachers—Abraham Ellenberger, 1738 (then made elder); Peter Becker, 1752-76; Johannes Strohm, 1757 (d. 1780); Abraham Ellenberger, Jr., 1761-76 (then made elder); Heinrich Wiesler, 1762-90 (then made elder); Heinrich Pletscher, 1782-90 (then made elder); Heinrich Krämer, 1785 (1790).

In 1756 a member by the name of Johannes Ummel built a little hall with a chamber over his winepress and put it at the disposal of the congregation. After his death, however, his sons closed its doors to them. In 1788 the farm again came into the possession of a Mennonite preacher, Johann Heinrich Wissler, who sold the hall to the congregation for 400 guilders. It was entered in the Grundbuch as the property of the Friedelsheim congregation in 1902. During the summer months six or seven meetings are held here, which are attended by the Mennonites at Erpolzheim, Freinsheim, and Dackenheim, who are members of Friedelsheim.

Esau, a Mennonite family name appearing in the rural Old Flemish congregations of West Prussia, first mentioned in 1617 at Tiegenhof. In 1662 a Jacob Esous was a deacon of the Danzig Flemish Mennonite (Huiskopers) congregation at Rotterdam, Holland. In 1776, 16 families of this name were counted in West Prussia, and in 1935, 86 persons. Members of this family emigrated to Russia and America. Peter Esau seems to have been the first preacher of this family, serving the Grosse Werder congregation 1765-*ca.*81. Abraham Esau (1799-1885) was for 48 years an active preacher in the Tiegenhagen congregation in West Prussia, during 29 of which he served as elder. Abraham Esau was rector of the University of Jena in 1931-34; Johann J. Esau (1859-1940) was a Mennonite engineer in the Ukraine, and Jacob Esau was a Mennonite physician in Chortitza before 1900. Esch (Eash, Esh, Oesch), a family name represented among European and American Mennonites. John Horsch lists Oesch among the names of Swiss Mennonite refugees in the Palatinate after 1664, who later came to Pennsylvania. Christian Neff's Mennonitisches Adressbuch of 1936 lists an Oesch family in the Augsburg Mennonite Church and three Esch families in the Ernstweiler Mennonite Church. Franz Crous's list of Mennonites (1940) in South Germany has four families bearing the name Esch and ten the name Oesch. The family is prominent in the Luxembourg congregation; Joseph Oesch, who was serving as bishop in 1953, died on July 15, 1954.

C. Z. Mast reports that 100 families bearing the name Esch are mostly farmers in Lancaster Co., Pa. The immigrant ancestor of this family, Jacob Esch, landed in Philadelphia in 1751. Among his sons was Jacob Eash, Amish bishop who died in 1850. The family history of Jacob Eash names 2,946 of his descendants, many of whom are Amish, living principally in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Iowa.

Near the time that Jacob Esch, Sr., came to America, James Esch also emigrated from Europe to eastern Pennsylvania. Among his descendants was Christian D. Esch (q.v.), Mennonite bishop and missionary doctor to India. Menno Esch, Mennonite bishop at Mio, Mich., is a member of this family.

Daniel Kauffman is the authority for the statement that John Oesch (1792-1850) was a native of Bavaria, who settled in Waterloo Co., Ont., where he was ordained preacher in 1829 and five years later bishop. In 1953 ten ordained men in various Mennonite conferences bore the name Esch or one of its variants. M.G.

Esch, Christian David (1883-1931), pioneer Mennonite doctor to India, was born near Wellman, Iowa, the eleventh child of David and Fannie (Kanagy) Esch. Soon after uniting with the Mennonite Church (MC), he felt the call to missionary service and therefore decided to obtain an education. After completing his high-school work and two years of college at Goshen College, he entered medical school, receiving his M.D. degree from Bennett Medical College in Chicago in 1910. While living in Chicago he was active in the work of the Mennonite Home Mission.

In 1908 he was married to Mina Brubaker, with whom he sailed for India in 1910, arriving in the Central Provinces in November. In March 1911 he was ordained to the ministry. Returning to America on his first furlough in 1917, the World War forced a four-year stay, during which time he practiced medicine in Hesston, Kan., and received his A.B. at Goshen College. In March 1924 Esch was ordained bishop for the India field. During his second term in India his work was principally among the lepers, in recognition of which the governor of the Central Provinces bestowed upon him the Kaiser-I-Hind silver medal. Returning on their second furlough in 1928, they made their home in West Liberty, Ohio. After 15 months in America, they returned to the India field, where Dr. Esch took charge of the mission hospital in Dhamtari. He died on Feb. 21, 1931, leaving his widow and six children. M.G.

Eschatology, literally the doctrine of the last things, i.e., of the end, also called the doctrine of the future, but in its fullest sense the teaching about the Christian hope or the outcome of history and God's program. Individual eschatology deals with the destiny of the individual, including death and eternal destiny (resurrection, judgment, immortality, heaven, hell). General eschatology deals with the destiny of the race and the universe, i.e., with the outcome of human history and the end of the world, including all the items involved in individual eschatology. The particular question of the future millennial kingdom, though involved in general eschatology, is treated under the article Chiliasm. The doctrine of ultimate universal salvation will be treated under the article Universalism.

In general Anabaptists and Mennonites have taken the position of classic evangelical Christianity and have no distinct eschatology different from that of evangelical Protestantism. This position as held by all the groups in North America and the conservative groups in Europe is well set forth in Article XVIII of the Dordrecht Confession (1632) as follows: "Regarding the resurrection of the dead, we confess with the mouth, and believe with the heart, that according to the Scriptures—all men who shall have died or 'fallen asleep,' will—through the incomprehensible power of God—at the day of judgment be 'raised up' and made alive; and that these, together with all those who then remain alive, and who shall be 'changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump,' shall 'appear before the judgment seat of Christ,' where the good shall be separated from the evil, and where 'everyone shall receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad'; and that the good or pious shall then further, as the blessed of their Father, be received by Christ into eternal life, where they shall receive that joy which 'eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor hath entered into the heart of man.' Yea, where they shall reign and triumph with Christ forever and ever.

"And that on the contrary, the wicked or impious shall, as the accursed of God, be cast into 'outer darkness'; yea, into eternal, hellish torments; 'where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched'; and where—according to Holy Scripture—they can expect no comfort nor redemption throughout eternity.

"May the Lord through His grace make us all fit and worthy, that no such calamity may befall any of us; but that we may be diligent, and so take heed to ourselves, that we may be found of Him in peace, without spot, and blameless. Amen."

A distinctive feature of early Anabaptism was the martyr theology, i.e., its philosophy of history, according to which the great battle being fought between God and His enemies is best observed in the struggle between the prophets and martyrs of the Old Covenant, then in Christ and His cross and resurrection, finally in the martyrs of the Christian church beginning with apostolic times. The Anabaptist martyrs, they believed, have joined in this great struggle and will, with the help of God, win the victory not only for themselves as individual heroes of faith, but as co-warriors with Christ. This conflict means suffering, and accordingly the doctrine of the suffering church is vital in Anabaptist theology. But the victory will come through suffering, and suffering is accordingly a testimony to the martyr that he is a part of the true church and a true child of God. This is the hope of the Anabaptist, a sure and confident hope in ultimate victory in union with Christ, in spite of and even because of present suffering. The enemy may seem temporarily to have the upper hand but this is but for the moment. In this vision of the course of history the Anabaptist sees the great state churches, both Catholic and Protestant, lined up with the enemy. Are they not persecuting the true church of Christ? But nothing can withstand the power of the suffering church; the mighty power of its faith, its ability to absorb all the wicked onslaughts of the enemy and to bear the suffering without yielding, is itself a power which the enemy cannot conquer. This magnificent interpretation of the history of the church and the unquenchable vision of a victorious outcome is repeatedly testified to in the writings of Menno Simons and others, in the martyr testimonies in the Ausbund and in the Offer des Heeren as well as in the Martyrs' Mirror and elsewhere.

Anneken of Rotterdam said to her judges in 1539 (Offer), "I tread the path of the prophets, the way of the martyrs and apostles." Balthasar Hubmaier (d. 1527) used as his great motto a statement which implies the entire cross-centered theology of history of the Anabaptists: "The divine truth cannot be killed, and although it may for some time let itself be scourged, crowned (with thorns), crucified, and laid in the grave, it will nevertheless rise up again victorious on the third day and reign and triumph in eternity." One of the hymns of the Ausbund says, "The bride, like the bridegroom, must enter through suffering into joy," making suffering a way station on the road to glory. The cross, says Stauffer (Anabaptist Theology of Martyrdom), is for the Anabaptists always both the sign of victory established by God once for all, and the law which comes true in the lives of the faithful over and over again; it is the deed by which God made a new start, and the form by which He will consummate His work. Menno Simons' great work, The Cross of Christ, concludes with a vision of the coming glory of the martyrs founded on the victorious sayings of the Book of Revelation.

The Anabaptist-Mennonite emphasis on the overcoming power of a martyr faith and belief in an ultimate victory for Christ and His cause (although with the strong emphasis on discipleship and holy living) and the reaction against any type of revolutionary Chiliasm led in the course of time to a minimum emphasis on the doctrine of the second coming of Christ as having little practical relation to present-day living. In some circles the doctrine also developed that the individual could not be sure of ultimate salvation but could only live in hope. This denial of the doctrine of assurance persists today particularly in the radically conservative and traditional groups such as the Old Order Amish and Old Colony Mennonites. It is in radical contrast to the joyful assurance of the early Anabaptists, including the martyrs, for whom such a doctrine would be inconceivable.

The doctrine of universalism, namely, that all men shall ultimately be saved, including the idea of a second chance for the wicked dead in hell, considered in orthodox Christendom as heresy, has occasionally though rarely found adherents among Mennonites, although it has usually been formally repudiated when it has raised its head.

Under modern outside influences particularly since 1900, chiliastic views such as premillennialism and even dispensationalism have won considerable acceptance in nearly all Mennonite groups in North America except the radically conservative groups such as the Old Order Amish, Old Order Mennonites, Old Colony Mennonites, and Church of God in Christ Mennonite. The Mennonite Brethren Church, the United Missionary Church, and such smaller groups as the Evangelical Mennonites (United States), the E.M.B. and the K.M.B. groups, have become almost completely premillennial. In the two largest groups, the Mennonite Church (MC) and the General Conference Church, the millennialists are still a minority group, though rather large in some areas (see Chiliasm).

When the Dutch and Northwest German Mennonites generally adopted the liberal theological point of view in the late 19th century, they abandoned the belief in the bodily resurrection, a literal judgment, and a literal second return of Christ, though retaining belief in immortality. Along with this change went a general acceptance of the optimistic evolutionary view of history which was characteristic of 19th-20th century prewar liberalism. The hope of the world and the church was seen in the achievements of man. The shocking experience of World Wars I and II, together with the powerful growth of atheistic communism, has rendered this hope vain; hence with the resurgence of evangelicalism in Dutch Mennonitism there has also come a revival of evangelical eschatology with an evangelical hope. Since creedal or doctrinal positions have no longer been defined by Dutch Mennonites since the 18th century, it is impossible to state a general eschatological position for the group as a whole.

The revolutionary Münsterites (1534-35), a fringe group under the leadership of Jan Matthys and Jan of Leiden, carried the apocalyptical eschatology of Melchior Hofmann (he began his radical teaching about 1530) much further than Hofmann did, adding to it the concept of actually establishing the kingdom of God by human action. This fantastic concept they carried through, creating a legal kingdom or state patterned on Old Testament concepts, which was destroyed by the military action of the Bishop of Münster. The actual happenings in the kingdom of Münster were a mixture of radical eschatology, social revolutionary ideas, and the personal misconduct of "king" Jan of Leiden. Because of the difficulty of assessing the latter's sincerity and distinguishing the eschatological and purely social-revolutionary elements, it is difficult to draw a clear picture of the Münsterite eschatology, which in any case stood by itself outside the main stream of Anabaptist thought. Eschelbronn near Dillsberg (q.v.), in the former Palatine region of Heidelberg (q.v.), has been at least since 1717 the home of Swiss Mennonites, leaseholders on the estates of Baron von Feltz. It is not certain whether the name Bamberger found in the Mennonite list of 1717 belongs there or in the Jewish list drawn up at the same time. The same list names the Muselmann family, and the list of 1724 also the Pletscher family. A table of inhabitants, buildings, and farms in the Palatinate, 1790, designates two Mennonite families, presumably Pletscher and Muselmann (Records of the Palatinate, Generallandesarchiv at Karlsruhe). Escondido Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, known also as Bethania Mennonite Brethren Church, was located one mile from Escondido, San Diego Co., Cal., and was a member of the Pacific District Mennonite Brethren Conference. Founded by Elder Abraham Schellenberg of Buhler, Kan., who moved there in 1907, it had a membership in 1910 of approximately 100. Families began to move away after 1917 when heavy frost for two years in succession destroyed the citrus fruit crops. Most of the members left for places farther north, Shafter, Wasco, and Reedley. The church building was sold in 1921 for $535.00; a small group of members remaining there received financial and spiritual support from the conference until about 1929. I.G.N.

Escondido Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, located in Escondido, San Diego Co., Cal., was a member of the Pacific District Conference. The first meetinghouse was dedicated Oct. 29, 1911, with M. M. Horsch of Upland, Cal., officiating. The congregation was organized in the spring of 1912 under the leadership of J. S. Hirschler, also of Upland, with 19 charter members. Shortly after its organization a number of Mennonite families moved away and the attendance began to decrease. In 1930 the Sunday school was discontinued and worship services were held once a month. The congregation was finally dissolved in 1934. The ministers who served the congregation are Herman Janzen, H. H. Adrian, and H. D. Voth. H.D.B.

Espelkamp-Mittwald is a new city located 60 miles south of Bremen, Germany, built for East German refugees after World War II on the site of a former German munitions dump and poison gas factory. The area, formerly thickly wooded, covers about two square miles and contained at the close of the war about 120 barracks and warehouses of various sizes. These buildings were all earmarked for destruction by the British army of occupation, but were saved for transformation into residences and factories by the intervention of Birger Forell, a Swedish Lutheran pastor. The project was begun by the German Evangelical Hilfswerk, but later conjoint responsibility was also assumed by the state of Nordrhein-Westfalen. Late in 1948 the Mennonite Central Committee opened a semipermanent international voluntary service camp to aid the poorer refugees in establishing their homes. Considerable religious activity grew up around this camp, which activity was later taken over by the Conservative Amish Mennonite mission board. In recognition for their services the city invited a number of German Mennonite refugees to settle there, and with MCC help about 30 families (120 souls) had become established by late 1953. Elder Albert Bartel has pastoral oversight of the new congregation. At the same date Espelkamp had a total population of 5,500, with a number of small industries such as furniture factories and a textile mill. P.P.

Eshleman (Eshelman, Aeschleman, Aeschliman, Aeschiman, Ashliman, Eschelmann), a Swiss family name found among the Mennonites (MC) of Lancaster Conference and the areas to which they have migrated, especially Maryland and Ontario, and also among the Alsatian Amish. Among the Eshelman immigrants to Pennsylvania were Daniel (before 1718), John (1731), Ulrich (1750), and Frank (latter 18th century). The name appears in Swiss history, Langnau district, 1550. The Swiss canton of Bern was struggling with the Mennonites in the early 18th century: some were sent to the galleys, and Preacher Michael Aeschlimann, 81, was sentenced to lifelong imprisonment; also imprisoned was Kaspar Aeschlimann of Rüegsau. In 1764 two Emmental Mennonite couples named Aeschlimann went to the Jura and were there married by Mennonite ministers, whereupon the Swiss authorities sought to declare the marriages null and void. In 1753 a Christian Eschelmann was living at Ibersheim in the Palatinate. The name Aschliman is common also among the 19th-century Alsatian Amish Mennonites of Fulton Co., Ohio. Among the ordained men have been Bishop Peter Eshleman (1798-1876) of the Miller district, Washington Co., Md., and his son Deacon Peter Eshleman (1834-1917) who served in the same district for about 40 years. Three Africa missionaries of the Lancaster Conference are named Eshleman (1953), and two deacons are serving in the home conference district. A minister named Eshleman is also serving in Virginia. Essex County, Ont., is located in the southwestern corner of Ontario in the southernmost part of Canada. The Mennonites live along the southern border of the county and are grouped around the towns of Wheatley, Leamington, Kingsville, and Harrow, along the shores of Lake Erie. A number of Mennonite families can also be found in the border city of Windsor. All the Mennonites came from Russia after World War I, the first settlers arriving in 1925. At present there is a total Mennonite population of 1,600 in the county, of whom approximately 1,300 belong to the General Conference Mennonite Church and the remainder to the Mennonite Brethren. The Essex County United Mennonite Church (GCM) with churches at Harrow and Leamington had 860 members in 1953 and the Leamington M.B. Church had 118 members in the same year. The General Conference Mennonites have recently completed the construction of their own high school and have named it the United Mennonite Collegiate Institute.

Essex County United Mennonite Church (GCM), Oak St., Leamington, Ont. Leamington (pop. 6,951) is located 35 miles southeast of Windsor. The church consists exclusively of immigrants from Russia mostly during 1923-30; in fact, all the Mennonites near Leamington are immigrants from Russia, and belong either to the General Conference Mennonite Church or to the Mennonite Brethren. The first 15 families came from the vicinity of Waterloo as farm hands and share farmers. In the course of time other families came from all parts of Ontario and the western provinces of Canada.

The first ministers chosen from the congregation, J. D. Janzen and N. H. Schmidt, were ordained by Elder J. H. Janzen. Services were held every Sunday, at first in private homes, and later in rented halls. In the first years church life was very difficult to maintain because of the general poverty and the distances to the center.

From 1925 to 1929 all the General Conference Mennonites in Ontario who had come from Russia were united by Elder Jacob H. Janzen into a single organization, called at first the General Refugee Church in Ontario (Allgemeine Flüchtlingsgemeinde in Ontario), but later (Aug. 15, 1926) changed to United Mennonite Church in Ontario. Waterloo was the center. Because of steady growth and the great distance between groups of the members, the body was divided on Jan. 20, 1929, into three independent congregations, of which the Essex County United Mennonite Church is one, with its center at Leamington.

In 1929 the church had 303 baptized members. Until 1933, J. H. Janzen, Waterloo, administered baptism and communion, and contributed much to the general courses for ministers. In the autumn of 1932 the congregation chose N. N. Driedger as elder from among the ministers, and ordained him on May 20, 1933. He was still serving in 1955. In 1933 a church was built, and in 1948 an annex was added.

Most of the members are farmers. Only a few live in town. Low German is usually spoken at home. In 1955 the church had grown to 930 baptized members.

Essingen, a village (pop. 1,500) three miles northeast of Landau in the Palatinate, Germany, in the late 18th century the center of an Amish Mennonite congregation, descendants of refugees from Switzerland, who lived in the neighborhood of Landau. Elder Hans Nafziger (q.v.) was a leading personality. Two Amish Mennonite conferences were held in Essingen, attended by ministers of the congregations at Montbéliard, Alsace, Breisgau, Lorraine, Palatinate, Nassau-Weilburg, and Waldeck. At the first of these conferences, held on May 1, 1759, 13 congregations were represented; at the second, Nov. 22, 1779, there were 19. An Ordnungsbrief (q.v.) was drawn up at each meeting, both of which have been preserved. In 1809 Essingen contributed 10 doubloons to the traveling expenses of the Mennonite delegates sent to interview Napoleon on behalf of exemption from military service. Nothing more is heard of the Essingen congregation. Toward the end of the 19th century and early in the 20th there was a small congregation at St. Johann near Albersweiler (somewhat to the south of Landau). Its last elder, Jakob Hege of Mörlheim (east of Landau), died in 1911. After his death Matthias Pohl, the minister of the Sembach congregation, held services in Landau; later the ministers of the Deutschhof-Geisberg congregation performed this service. But this group was not Amish, but Mennonite, and had nothing to do with the Essingen Amish congregation.

The few Amish families which continued to live in the Essingen neighborhood after the dissolution of the Amish congregation maintained connection with the Amish congregation across the Alsatian border near Wissembourg, called Lembach (q.v.) or Froensburg, later Fleckensteinerhof. After the meetings at the latter place ceased in 1929, the remaining Amish families in the neighborhood affiliated with the Deutschhof-Geisberg (q.v.) congregation, which held occasional meetings in Landau.

The Essingen congregation was called the "Pfälzer Obere Gemeinde" in the signatures to the 1759 Ordnungsbrief, when the following ministers signed: Jörg Holi, Christen Nafziger, Christen Imhof, Jakob Holli, Hans Nafziger. In the 1779 Ordnungsbrief the signature of the congregation appears as "Essingen," with the following ministers signing: Hans Nafziger, Christen Nafziger, Christen Erismann, Jakob Ullmann. In the Lutheran church book for Essingen for the years 1730-61 deaths in the following Mennonite families are reported: Hans and Michel von Huben, Ulrich, Johannes, and Peter Nafziger, and Valentin Güngerich. From the evidence in the Karlsruhe Landesarchiv, the following families belonged to the Essingen congregation ca. 1780: Christian Bürky and Johannes and Christian Ehresmann (all three living on the Mechtersheimerhof), the Ullmann and Gingerich families on the Pfalzhof (Breitwieserhof), Christian Nafziger of Geilweilerhof, and certain unnamed families in Mühlhofen (Pfalz-Zweibrücken) and in Essingen (estate of Baron von Dalberg). Somewhat later the Schönbeck and Wagler families appear here.

Esslingen, a city (pop. 70,000) of Württemberg, situated on the Neckar, six miles east of Stuttgart, from 1209 to 1802 a free imperial city, in which Anabaptism early found many adherents, with some protection from the nobility. The name has survived in the "Wiedertäufer-Klinge," a forest ravine where they were accustomed to assemble. As early as 1527 there was an Anabaptist congregation here, which prepared the ground for the introduction of the Reformation (see Ambrosius Blaurer), but also suffered severe persecution. Its leaders were the knifesmith Hans Krafft (q.v.) of Augsburg, and the cobbler Felix Pfudler of Esslingen, Zuberhans (q.v.) of Hegensberg, Stephan Böhmerle, and others. The number of members soon increased to 100. Esslingen was at this time a place of refuge for the Anabaptists; Hans Leupold (Hege, 45), Leonhard Eleutherobius (Freisleben), and others spent some time here. Several of the Anabaptists imprisoned in the dungeon at Passau stated that they had been baptized at Esslingen, that Lienhard Wenig, a vinedresser, was their elder, and other prominent Anabaptists were Martin Arnold and Paul Frank of Hainbach (Nicoladoni, 188 ff.). Expelled early in 1528, they emigrated to Reutlingen under the leadership of the guild master Leonhard Lutz (Hege, 45). Stephan Böhmerle returned, and was executed on Oct. 5, 1529, as the first martyr of Esslingen.

The city council of Esslingen had issued a warning, Nov. 10, 1527, against the "deceitful seduction of Anabaptism," but did not take steps of suppression until the Austrian government at Stuttgart reminded the councilors of its presence in the city. Many men and women were arrested and by torture compelled to make confessions as follows: their faith they based alone on the Scriptures; faith must precede baptism; communion is a commemoration of the death of Christ; bearing arms is forbidden, nor may one do battle against one's enemy, be he Jew or Turk; peace and unity must be preserved; and it is a duty to obey all reasonable commands of the government. If several said that all who refused baptism should be killed as heathen, and that they were awaiting the coming of aid from Moravia where there were many of their faith, it is clear that either their statements were misunderstood or were extorted by torture, for there can be no thought of murder in connection with the Hutterian Brethren (Pfaff, 473). Nevertheless it may be correct that some required community of goods and asserted that Christ was not God, but a prophet and a sinless man, like any other; for all who do God's will are His sons. The contemporary chronicler, Dyonisius Dreytwein (b. about 1500 in Esslingen), makes an interesting statement at the conclusion of a comparison of the different creeds, "Therefore the Anabaptists are still the best and most pious; they do not swear, they do not practice usury, they do not drink to excess, as thou, miserable crowd" (p. 97).

Six of the arrested Anabaptists recanted and were released with a fine of 10 to 30 pounds; the others were banished. Stephan Böhmerle, who returned, was beheaded on Oct. 5, 1529. In 1530 Joachim Fleiner (q.v.) and Ludwig Lichtenstein met the same fate, as well as Bastian Egen and Jakob Schneider of Uhlbach.

When, in 1531, the Reformation was carried out in Esslingen, a more lenient attitude was taken toward the Anabaptists. Ambrosius Blaurer, the Swabian reformer who arrived in Esslingen in 1531, won most of the Anabaptists by the earnestness of his preaching and by personal contacts. But when he left in the following year a bitter quarrel which broke out among the clergy caused the Anabaptists to leave the church again. They also took offense at the manner of life of many members and the lack of church discipline which Blaurer had introduced at their instigation. Thus the serious-minded returned to the Anabaptists, and new repressive measures were initiated by the clergy. The Zuchtordnung of 1532 provided that anyone who rejected infant baptism and was rebaptized, should be admonished by the preachers, and if he did not desist from his error he should be imprisoned, and if he still persisted, expelled. On Feb. 4, 1532, the Anabaptists were summoned to the Rathaus, to be cross-examined by the clergy. Oddly, they confessed that they held the doctrine of the sleep of the soul (q.v.) (Pfaff, 47). In February 1533 a new examination was ordered, at which three Anabaptists were compelled to recant publicly. Following an opinion given by the Esslingen clergy, all meetings of the Anabaptists were forbidden. But the order was not enforced.

On April 5, 1534, an Anabaptist meeting in the region of Esslingen was surprised, which was attended chiefly by Anabaptists from Württemberg. A list of persons who had harbored Anabaptists was found and sent to Stuttgart. In the following year Anabaptists again appeared in Esslingen. On Aug. 23, 1535, Duke Ulrich of Württemberg wrote to the Esslingen authorities, urging them to suppress the "false doctrine of the Anabaptists." But nothing was done. In 1541 the clergy of Esslingen complained that for years the Anabaptists in the small parishes had so corrupted the populace that few acknowledged the pastors as the true preachers. On June 29, 1544, the council of Esslingen commanded the parishes to show more respect for the clergy, and arrested three men and women on a suspicion of Anabaptism. At their trial they said that the taking of interest is wrong; no one is condemned for original sin; infant baptism is useless; preaching is an aid to salvation if it is rightly done; but because it is not, it bears no fruit and reforms nobody. Veit Bechtold said Christ was true man and God, born of Mary, but crafty arguing about it should be avoided. They were dismissed with a serious warning.

In 1551 several Anabaptists of Hainbach were again arrested for holding meetings contrary to the order of the council. One of them, Gerhard Feygenbutz, declared that faith must precede baptism; he could not swear, but would otherwise conduct himself like any other citizen and do twice as much as one. They were dismissed with the warning that if they did not desist from their error their goods would be confiscated.

Duke Christoph of Württemberg in 1558 requested that the Esslingen authorities watch the Anabaptists, who were meeting in the outskirts of the city, and in 1560 he wrote them that the sectarians were meeting in a forest between Hainbach and Rüdern; this mischief should be stopped. An investigation revealed that the Anabaptists were particularly numerous and were increasing in Möhringen. After some lenient measures the council issued a sharp decree against Möhringen and Vaihingen, warning all of the ungodly error of Anabaptism, and threatening any who sheltered them with confiscation of property, corporal punishment, and exile.

On June 6, 1562, 28 Anabaptists, most of them from Württemberg, were seized in a ravine at Katzenbühl not far from Hainbach, where they had frequently assembled. When they obstinately refused to recant they were expelled from the region of the city. Again in 1564 several Anabaptists were banished. In 1567 Jakob Andreae (q.v.) preached eight sermons against the Anabaptists, which he published in 1568, and which influenced the governments again and again to proceed against the Anabaptists. Repeatedly the dukes of Württemberg, Ludwig and Friedrich, accused the council of Esslingen of tolerating Anabaptists. In 1598 several Anabaptists were again arrested. Some of them said they held their meetings in the woods near Stetten, and one of them justified their meetings on the grounds that the apostles had also done so. Most of them recanted, and the rest were banished. In 1609 Duke John Frederick warned the council of Esslingen of Anabaptists who had reputedly come to Hainbach and were trying to win converts. The council, however, replied that in the last three or four years, since Walter Lichtenstein had left Hainbach, there were no Anabaptists there. Nothing is known of their presence there since that date. Hege.

Esslinger, Georg, was Landprocurator of the Duke of Württemberg about 1600. His office included the collection of taxes from the Mennonites of the duchy. In 1608 he was accused of fraudulently appropriating 50,000 guilders of the Täufergut (a fund made up of income from the sale of Anabaptist property). The trial, which was held at Stuttgart, ended with Esslinger's dismissal from office and punishment. During the trial he had misrepresented the Mennonites as being disloyal subjects. (Bossert, TA: Württemberg, 1444 and Index.) vdZ.

Esslinger, Wolfgang, one of the seven martyrs who were put to death Dec. 7, 1529 (not 1531, as stated in the Martyrs' Mirror), at Schwäbisch-Gmünd (q.v.). In this city, at that time a free city, the Anabaptist preacher Martin Zehentmayer (q.v.), also called Martin der Maler, from Bavaria, formed a congregation which in 1529 had over 100 members, but was ruthlessly nipped in the bud.

In February 1529 the council had Zehentmayer and 40 adherents, 19 of them women and girls, thrown into prison; Esslinger shared this fate. The council made an effort to have them renounce their faith, but with little success. The prisoners seem to have been encouraged to steadfastness; for in various regulations "all women, girls, and children" were forbidden to go to the towers, to sing or to read there or talk to the prisoners. The captives suffered willingly.

Meanwhile a bitter conflict had arisen between the mayor Egen and a part of the council concerning their power and authority, which the mayor managed to decide in his own favor by calling in outside force. At the expense of the Swabian League (q.v.) he demanded that 250 soldiers be sent to him immediately on the ground that he feared an insurrection on the occasion of the approaching execution of the Anabaptists, considering their great following in the city. His request was granted. After the arrival of the troops and the notorious imperial provost Berthold Aichele (q.v.), who was accompanied by two executioners, legal proceedings were at once opened against the Anabaptist prisoners; the councilors did not all agree with this procedure but had to yield to force.

In order not to heighten the excitement of the citizenry who were worried about the life of the prisoners who had already languished in prison 42 weeks, they apparently tried the nonresidents first, among them Wolfgang Esslinger. The council promised them liberty if they renounced their faith. When this failed to move them, seven of them, including Wolfgang Esslinger, Zehentmayer, a woman, and a youth of sixteen, were sentenced to death. When the mayor read the verdict Esslinger called out to him, "Just as you are judging today, God will also judge you when you appear before His face; God will recognize you. Leave your sins and unrighteousness and repent, then God will not hold it against you." The sentence roused general horror and was carried out Dec. 7, 1529, on an open place before the city. On the site of execution in the presence of the executioners another attempt was made to make them recant, but, as the council later reported, the spectators, especially the women, called out encouraging words to the victims. After a short prayer they all went to their death completely unafraid.

The steadfastness of the martyrs made a deep impression on the Anabaptists and was celebrated in several hymns; one of the songs written by the victims in prison, "Aus tiefer Not schrein wir zu dir," of which each one composed a stanza, was widely distributed. The songs are found in Die Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 48-59.

Esztergom (German, Gran), a city (pop. 22,000) on the Danube in Hungary, 25 miles northwest of Budapest, seat of the Catholic archbishop and primate of Hungary. In the library of the primate many valuable codices (manuscript books) of Hutterite origin are kept, once confiscated from the Brethren. When around 1757 the last great persecution of the Anabaptists (Hutterites) set in under the Empress Maria Theresa, which eventually ended in a complete liquidation of the brotherhoods in Slovakia and with their forced conversion to Catholicism (see Habaner), government orders were issued that all of their handwritten books and their (non-Catholic) Bibles were to be confiscated and handed over to the ecclesiastical authorities (mostly to the Jesuits). Such large-scale confiscations of books (raids) took place in 1757-63, and again in 1782-84. Joseph Beck (q.v.) collected all of the relevant material (orders, reports, etc.) from Hungarian and Slovakian archives and published it in the appendix of his Geschichts-Bücher, pp. 578-634. From these excerpts we also learn that many books were successfully hidden by the Brethren before the coming of the officers. On the other hand a good number of books were not preserved but were simply burned as "heresy" by some parish priests (Arch. f. Ref.-Gesch.).

Some 30 codices were kept in the former Jesuit College of Bratislava (Pressburg), now the library of the chapter of the Canons of the Cathedral. Another set of 27 codices was sent to the primate in Esztergom, where these books are still well preserved in the primatial library. Ten more codices came somehow into the library of the University of Budapest, and many more were scattered in various libraries. All in all much more than 100 such codices must have been taken away. The hidden ones came to light almost a century later, and a few even found their way back to the Brethren in America.

The Hutterite collection in Esztergom comprises 5 chronicles (Denkbüchel, Geschichtsbüchel), 3 epistle books, 5 hymnbooks (Liederbüchel), 12 codices with religious tracts and ordinances, and 2 more books with miscellaneous contents. The chronicles usually run from the beginnings (around 1525) up to 1620, 1668, and even 1694; the epistle books were written in 1574, 1581, and 1601; the hymnals originated in 1637, 1650, etc. Among the 12 codices with a varied content is found a beautiful copy of Riedemann's Rechenschaft (q.v.) in a small-sized codex of 1614; Andreas Ehrenpreis's great Sendbrief of 1652 (very likely the original ms., Cod. No. III, 137); then three codices with the great "Article Book" (q.v.) of 1602, 1655, and 1679; and one codex (No. III, 198) with the famous Gemeindeordnungen (regulations and ordinances) by Ehrenpreis (q.v.), around 1640. Other codices contain most carefully written epistles (from Jakob Hutter up to Andreas Ehrenpreis), a variety of doctrinal tracts, Bible concordances, catechisms, and an "Apocalipsis" (written 1593), and the apocryphal "Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs." One codex contains nothing but the writings of Sebastian Franck (written 1597), and one codex of 1657, called Weinbüchel, instructs "how to treat wine when spoiled."

All of these books are beautifully bound in embossed leather, often showing the year and ownership, and locked by brass clasps. They average 300 leaves (some have up to 600), most are octavo size, and are carefully written (occasionally in black and red) on heavy paper. In the introduction to his Geschichts-Bücher (XXIII-XXXIII) Beck lists in detail all the codices he used, briefly summarizing their contents. However, the library of Esztergom has many more such books than are listed by Beck, and a complete catalog is still needed. Transcripts of almost all this material are kept in the provincial archives of Brno, Czechoslovakia, known as the "Beck Collection" (see Beck, Joseph von).

A description of these books is also found in R. Wolkan, Die Hutterer (Vienna, 1918), and in R. Friedmann, "Die Briefe der österreichischen Wiedertäufer," in Archiv f. Ref.-Gesch. XXVI (1929) 40 f. and 166 f. (ML II, 156 f.) R.F.

E.T.E.B.O.N. (Eigen Tabak en bollen om niet), a fraternity (corps) of the students of the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam, formerly connected with the fraternities of the University of Amsterdam, was founded on May 7, 1814. The association song is the Latin Patriam Canimus. Its colors are red, white, and blue—the colors of the Netherlands. Nearly all the ministers of the Dutch Mennonite churches were members of this corps as students. The records of its meetings are written in verse. Admission is bound with certain mysterious ceremonies. Formerly a pilgrimage was made every two years to Hotel de Grebbe at Rhenen on the Rhine. The 25th, 50th, 75th, 80th, 100th, 125th, and 140th anniversaries were celebrated, and Gedenkschriften were published on a number of these occasions. At the end of World War I (ca. 1918) the E.T.E.B.O.N. broke its connection with the student fraternities, and has lost much of its importance. (DJ 1914, 59-68; 1953, 17 f.; ML I, 612.) K.V.

Eternal Security, the doctrine that Christians can never apostatize after coming to faith, in Calvinism known as "perseverance of the saints," as a special term was used by Walter Scott (Plymouth Brethren) as early as 1913 (Holness, 186). Under a section heading, "The Eternal Security of the Sheep," he writes, "Can my sins separate me from Christ or break the bond of eternal life? Impossible!" Elsewhere he states, "Eternal life therefore cannot be lost: It is absolutely secure" (Holness, 110). L. S. Chafer, whose Gospel ministry extends back to 1900, does not know when the term came into use; the significance which he attaches to this doctrine is shown by the 100-page treatment given to it in his vast Systematic Theology. "Those chosen of God and saved by grace are, of necessity," he holds, "preserved unto the realization of the design of God. . . . The Scriptures could not . . . do other than declare the Christian's security without reservation or complication" (Systematic Theology III, 268).

By eternal security of the believer, H. A. Ironside declares, "we mean that once a poor sinner has been regenerated by the Word and the Spirit of God, . . . it is absolutely impossible that that man should ever again be a lost soul" (Eternal Security, 6). Other leading advocates of this teaching during the past 50 years have been H. C. Trumbull, C. I. Scofield, and A. W. Pink. Chief among Scriptures alleged in its support are John 5:24; 6:23; 10:27-29; Rom. 8:32-39; I Cor. 3:15; Phil. 1:6; II Tim. 1:12; I Pet. 1:3-5; I John 5:13.

The influence of this teaching upon the Mennonites has not been negligible. While European Mennonites have barely been touched, the teaching has gained some adherents among Mennonite groups in America. In the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America the doctrine had little chance in the past to be generally accepted, but gaining a foothold in 1910-20 the doctrine has more recently had a greater influence with young ministers and students. In general, however, the M.B. group rejects the teaching. In the General Conference Mennonite Church this doctrine does not represent its established tradition. Since its appearance about 1930, however, sizable groups of adherents are now found in a small percentage of congregations. In the Mennonite Church (MC) this teaching has made small progress excepting in one conference where a private estimate guesses that 25 per cent of the members and 40 per cent of the ministers hold to it.

The teaching is clearly exotic to Mennonite faith, its chief sources in North America being "Fundamentalist" Bible schools and Bible institutes, a few colleges and seminaries, and some independent Bible teachers and periodicals.

While the term "Eternal Security" had its origin early in the 20th century, the idea of unconditional election is as old as Augustine. Sharpened in the hands of Gottshalk of the 9th century the doctrine was strenuously advocated by Zwingli and developed into a logical system by Calvin. Against this predestinarian background with all its implications the Swiss Brethren and Dutch Mennonites had to work. Pilgram Marpeck called predestination a blasphemous doctrine (Horsch, MQR, 145), and says that we know of no knowledge of Christ or clarity of claim to eternal life, apart from keeping His commandments and teachings (Wenger, MQR, 236). Only by remaining in Christ is one His disciple, and only so does he have a God, says Marpeck.

The Swiss Brethren recognized the possibility of apostasy, of Satan's disturbing the minds of believers in the simplicity of faith (Wenger, MQR, 236). They held just as firmly to Christian assurance. "We know, thank God, of the freedom in and through Christ . . ." (Marpeck, 239). "His Holy Spirit . . . will guide us until the end" (Marpeck, 239). Conrad Grebel held that if the believer continues to live in this new life and resolutely separates himself from sin, he may be sure of salvation (Bender, 131). Menno Simons speaks of Zwingli's statement that the sinner is not responsible for his evil deeds as "an abomination above all abominations" (Opera, 311a; Works II, 294b, quoted by John Horsch, op. cit., 146). That the Swiss Brethren and early Mennonites sensed a responsibility for the spiritual well-being of the membership lest they fall by the way and be lost. That he himself does not believe this Zwinglian doctrine is witnessed by the rigid discipline he exercised and executed in the measures of the ban and avoidance. Obedience of discipleship was held to be necessary for assurance.

The Eighteen Articles of Faith drawn up by Mennonite (MC) General Conference in 1921 seek to meet Eternal Security teaching in two of its articles. Article VII, of Assurance, reads: "We believe that it is the privilege of all believers to know that they have passed from death unto life; that God is able to keep them from falling, but that the obedience of faith is essential to the maintenance of one's salvation and growth in grace." Part of Article XIV, of Apostasy, reads: "We believe that the latter days will be characterized by general lawlessness and departure from the faith; . . . that on the part of the church there will be a falling away and 'the love of many shall wax cold.' "

The Bible lays a real foundation for absolute assurance based on God's love (John 3:16; Rom. 8:35-39), His omnipotent keeping power (John 10:38, 39; Jude 24, 25), His eternal purpose and foreordination (Rom. 8:28-30; Eph. 1:4), the efficacy of Christ's sacrifice (Rom. 3:24, 25; Gal. 1:4; 2:20; Eph. 1:7; Heb. 9:11-14; I Pet. 1:18, 19), the saving power of His resurrection (Rom. 4:25; 5:10; I Cor. 15:20-22), His intercession at the right hand of the Father (John 17; Rom. 8:34; Heb. 7:24, 25; I John 2:1), the testimony of the Holy Spirit (Rom. 8:16), the sealing of the Holy Spirit (II Cor. 1:21, 22; Eph. 1:13, 14; 4:30), the present experience of eternal life (John 3:36; I John 5:13), and the sufficiency of His grace (II Cor. 12:9).

In equally clear language believers are admonished to faithfulness (Matt. 24:24-51; 25:21-30; Rom. 1:17; Rev. 2:10) and warned against apostasy (Mark 24:11-13; I Tim. 4:1; II Pet. 2:2). The entire Epistle to the Galatians is directed to Christians who were removing from Him who called them unto a different Gospel (1:6; 5:4) and enjoins a return to faith in Christ. In like manner the practical purpose of the Epistle to the Hebrews is the re-entrenchment of faith. The lengthy cumulative warnings pointed up in such unequivocal statements as in 2:1; 3:6, 12, 14; 4:11, 14; 6:4-6; 10:26-31; and 12:25 can be understood only in terms of the possibility of final apostasy of those who had once been regenerated. In similar strain the warnings to the Seven Churches of Asia must be understood in the light of the doubtful issue of the conditional clause, "Except thou repent," of Rev. 2:5, 22 (see also 3:3).

The divine purpose of God to save us does not invalidate genuine human responsibility of faithfulness and obedience. The matchless benediction of Jude 24, 25 is not incompatible with the awful warning of Heb. 10:26-31. (See Free Will.)

Etliche schöne Christliche Geseng wie sie in der Gefengkniss zu Passaw im Schloss von dem Schweitzer Brüdern durch Gottes gnad geticht vnd gesungen worden, a collection of 52 hymns published in 1564 (n.p.). It was published in a second edition in 1583 with the title, Etliche sehr schone Christliche Gesenge, wie dieselbigen zu Passaw, von den Schweitzerbrüdern, in der Gefengnuss im Schloss, durch Gottes gnad gedicht vnd gesungen worden. This edition was combined as part two with a first part bearing the title Ausbund Etlicher schöner Christlicher Geseng, wie die in der Gefengnuss zu Passaw im Schloss von den Schweitzern und auch von andern rechtgläubigen Christen hin und her gedicht worden. A 1622 reprint is identical with the 1583 edition. The next undated edition (17th century) is the first to combine the two parts into an integrated whole. The Goshen College Library has copies of all the above editions except the one of 1622, the 1564 copy being a unicum. Two hymns of the first edition (1564) were omitted in the second, viz., No. III, Lobt den Herren ir Heyden all, and No. XVII, Wir schreyen zu dir Herre Gott. The second edition (1583) added one hymn, viz., No. LIII, O Herr nit stoltz ist mein hertz doch. Thus the first edition had 52 hymns, and the second 51. Most of the hymns are anonymous; but 12 of them, signed with the initials "H.B.," were written by Hans Betz (as Wolkan proved, not Hans Büchel as Wackernagel surmised). Eugene Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, was located approximately 11 miles west of Eugene, Ore., in the 1890's. It was founded by Amish families who came to the Eugene area from Hubbard, where they had settled about 1887. During the early years two Sunday schools were organized in this region, the one about 6 miles west of Eugene having at one time an attendance of approximately 50. Several years later the church was built and Peter Mishler was ordained bishop. Following his death, his brother J. D. Mishler was ordained bishop in 1895. Because of church difficulties and because land in other Oregon communities was preferred, the families moved away and by 1950 only one remained in the neighborhood. The church was sold and the money was used for the construction of the Hopewell Mennonite Church, near Hubbard, which was built in 1901-2. M.G.

Eureka, Ill., a town of 1,500 inhabitants, the county seat of Woodford County. It is the home of Eureka College, a school of the Christian denomination, and of the Mennonite (MC) Home for the Aged. Between Eureka and Roanoke, some miles to the northeast, is located the Roanoke (q.v.) Mennonite Church (MC). A few miles north of Eureka is the Metamora (q.v.) Mennonite Church (MC). The village claims to be the "Pumpkin Center of the World." C.H.S.

Europäische Mennonitische Bibelschule (Ecole Biblique Européenne), opened at Arnold Böcklinstrasse 11, Basel, Switzerland, at that time the MCC European headquarters office, was founded on the initiative of Harold S. Bender on March 20, 1950. Members of the school board at the founding were: Hans Nussbaumer, France; Christian Schnebele, Germany; Pierre Widmer, France; Samuel Gerber, Switzerland; C. F. Klassen, Canada-Germany; and the current MCC director of Europe. Later it was decided to elect on the school board two representatives from each of the supporting conferences. These conferences are the Pfälzisch-Hessische Conference, Gemeindeverband, Swiss Conference, Alsatian Conference, and the French Conference. The president of the board since its beginning has been Hans Nussbaumer, Schweighof, France. Samuel Gerber of Les Reussilles, Switzerland, was director of this school 1950-52, Cornelius Wall of Mountain Lake, Minn., since 1952. The MCC helped in many respects to start and operate this school. Since students from all over Europe attend the school, courses are conducted in French and German. There were ca. 60 students in 1955. Originally the term of the Bible school was 4 weeks; in 1955 it was extended to 10 weeks. It is hoped to extend the term to 12 weeks in the winter, and add a short summer term. The school was moved to Starenstrasse 41 in Basel in 1953, when the MCC headquarters was moved to that address. The purpose of the school is to acquaint young people with the Word of God and to train them as Sunday-school teachers, youth workers, and for other church service. Europe. It must be said at the outset that in spite of basic unity on all major points of faith and life (barring the revolutionary and radical fringe elements) the Anabaptist-Mennonite movement in Europe has never been a fully unified movement or church. Politic-cultural and language barriers, among other things, have prevented this. Apart from a very small French movement in French Flanders and an elusive English movement, the Anabaptist movement was wholly Teutonic, but composed of two German-speaking parts and one Dutch-speaking part: (1) the Swiss-South German founded in 1525, (2) the Hutterite group in Moravia founded in 1528, essentially the communistic wing of the first group, and (3) the Dutch-speaking Dutch-North German-West Prussian group, begun in 1530. (There was also for a time a Middle German-Middle Rhine branch of the Swiss-South German group, but this did not survive the first half-century.) The rapid spread of the movement is most remarkable. Beginning in January 1525 in Zürich, by 1535 the entire Teutonic block of Western Europe had been covered. An approximate circumference line would run Chur, Gratz, Brno, Königsberg, Leeuwarden, Ypres, Strasbourg, Basel, Chur.

This article will trace the general history of the above three groups from an over-all European perspective, leaving the detailed story for the national articles—Austria, Belgium, England, France, Germany, Moravia, Netherlands, Poland, Russia, Switzerland, and for other articles on provinces and regions. The following outline will be used:

toleration at a few places such as Strasbourg and Nikolsburg, and the general toleration in Moravia by the nobility until the Jesuit reaction began its deadly work (1592), to be an Anabaptist was to be a criminal subject to arrest, torture, imprisonment, exile, confiscation of property, and in most larger territories (except Hesse) execution. In the first ten years, 1525-35, several thousand were executed, and before the last execution (Zürich, Switzerland, 1614, the Netherlands 1574, Belgium 1594) there must have been at least 5,000 martyrs. The Hutterite chronicle as of 1540 lists 2,147 brothers and sisters who gave their life for their faith, and van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (1660) lists 2,500. The MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA has name articles for over 2,000 martyrs. Toleration came first in Holland, about 1572, though not complete at once, and by 1600 the period of severe persecution was really past in that country. In Switzerland severe persecution continued (canton of Bern) until the middle of the 18th century, and real toleration did not come until 1815. For the Hutterites heavy persecution (after the initial decade or two) really set in only with their expulsion from Moravia in 1592, but continued until the last remnant found refuge in Russia in 1770. In Austria, Tirol, Bavaria, the rest of South Germany, and Middle Germany (Saxony, Thuringia, Hesse, Cologne) persecution did not cease until the movement was totally destroyed (ca. 1580-1600). By the time of the Thirty Years' War (1618-48) all Anabaptist remnants had vanished in the South and in Middle Germany, except for small remnants in the cantons of Bern (Emmental and Thun) and Zürich (Horgen) and the struggling Hutterite communities in Hungary. The once promising Westphalian Anabaptist communities were finally suppressed by the Counter Reformation. On the other hand the movement in the Dutch language area was growing at that time almost everywhere: the Netherlands, Lower Rhine, East Friesland, Schleswig-Holstein, and Altona (the latter two settlements founded by refugee immigration 1600-50) except in Catholic Flanders where it had been wiped out by 1630, and in a few areas where it still had a severe struggle. Likewise the important settlements in the Vistula Delta area (Danzig-Elbing, Culm-Thorn, Königsberg), which had been founded by Dutch refugees 1535-60, were rapidly developing into a major block. The Swiss, Hutterites, and West Prussians (except the Danzig, Elbing, and Königsberg city groups) were all rural and destined to remain so almost exclusively throughout their history, including their daughter settlements. By contrast the Lower Rhine, most Northwest German congregations, and all the Dutch Mennonites (except certain rural areas in Groningen, Friesland, and North Holland) were solidly urban, already manifesting some of the industrial and commercial enterprise which was later to be so characteristic of these groups. Only in the Netherlands, because of relatively early toleration, their large number, and their urban character, were Mennonites entering into the national cultural life, although this came also in Crefeld, Emden, Hamburg, and Danzig in the next century. Here in the Netherlands the Mennonites made a real and significant contribution (1600-1700) in art and literature (Golden Age) as well as in medicine; they also were often leaders in trade and banking, navigation, and whale fishing.

During this period the three major groups listed earlier remained relatively distinct, with little intergroup contact. The Hutterites viewed the Swiss, Dutch, and Prussians as lacking true Christian principles in not adopting the communal way of life, and at times indulged in vigorous polemics against them, although on at least one occasion (Frankenthal, 1571) they joined with the Swiss in a disputation against the state church leaders. The language barrier kept the Swiss-South Germans and Dutch apart. Menno Simons was not translated into German until 1575, and then only the Foundation-Book. A "short Menno" appeared in 1754, but Menno's complete works were never translated in Europe. Dirk Philips was translated into German in part in 1611, but no other Dutch Mennonite writings at all until the next period.

An attempt to draw the Swiss and Dutch closer together in the mid-16th century was frustrated by the intransigence of the Dutch (Wismar articles of 1554 and Menno's writings against Zylis and Lemke of 1559) on the two points of shunning and Menno's peculiar doctrine of the Incarnation, neither of which the Swiss could accept (Strasbourg conferences of 1555 and 1557). The Dutch actually put the Swiss under the ban about this time. Only a century later (1660 ff.) when the severe need of the persecuted Swiss touched the brotherly love of the Dutch, and the latter had somewhat relaxed their severity, did the situation change. There was a High German group (Swiss-South German refugees and influence in the region of Cologne) who came into closer fellowship with certain Dutch elements and actually joined in several Dutch "unity" confessions of faith (Concept of Cologne in 1591, High German confession of Jan Cents, q.v., in 1630, Dordrecht Confession in 1632).

During this period the relations of the Dutch with the North German and Vistula congregations were very close. The latter were composed largely of refugees from the Netherlands (Friesland) and Flanders, and maintained the Dutch language in family and church life (first German preaching in Hamburg 1786, in Danzig 1760's, and first German publication a 1660 confession of faith at Danzig). During this period and for another hundred years Amsterdam remained the mother of the eastern churches in more ways than one.

At the end of this period the distribution of Mennonite population (including children) might have been as follows: the Netherlands (including East Friesland and Lower Rhine) 140,000; Switzerland 1,000; Schleswig Holstein-Hamburg 1,500; Vistula Delta and Königsberg 5,000; Hutterites 5,000; a total of over 150,000. Without unbaptized children the baptized members hardly exceeded 75,000. (No list of congregations, ministers, or members is available at all before the Dutch Naamlijst of 1731, and no thorough statistics until the late 19th century. Congregations in Germany were not on this list in the Naamlijst before 1766.)

During this period the original Anabaptist heritage of faith and life was maintained relatively intact. There was a loss of the sense of mission and consequent development of introversion, but the original concept of the church as a brotherhood of believers separated from the world and maintained pure by discipline was staunchly maintained, together with nonconformity to the world, nonresistance, nonswearing of oaths, simplicity of costume and manner of life. Theologically the only minor changes were those due to Socinian and Collegiant influences in the Netherlands. The serious major divisions (1565-80) in the Netherlands and in the North German and Vistula congregations persisted, particularly the Flemish and Frisian (the Waterlander in Holland only). Mennonite literature flourished in the Netherlands, but nowhere else. Hans de Ries, P. J. Twisck, Lubbert Gerritsz, and J. P. Schabalje ranked with the best in Dutch Christian literature, and the Mennonite Biestkens Bible had reached a peak of popularity with over 100 editions of the whole Bible or New Testament in 1560-1648. The Swiss had their Ausbund hymnbook and Froschauer Bible (not originally Mennonite) reprints, but little else. The Hutterites had their extraordinary manuscript chronicles, epistles, theological treatises, and confessions, but only two printed books, Riedemann's Rechenschaft of 1545 and Ehrenpreis' Sendbrief of 1652.

2. Developments 1648-1918. This period witnessed a series of migrations of prime significance. From 1650 to 1750 a considerable number of Swiss (from Zürich and Bern) migrated to Alsace, the Palatinate, and Baden, and after 1709 to Pennsylvania (joined by numerous Palatine immigrants), with a smaller contingent settling in Groningen in Holland, and another group transferring from inner Bern to the Jura territory and Basel. Emigration from the Netherlands ceased altogether, except for the tiny group of 1853 from Balk to Indiana, which is now extinct. There are no Dutch Mennonite colonies; in fact the Dutch Mennonite population declined so greatly (to 30,000 by 1800) as to forebode extinction. A few of Dutch extraction came to Pennsylvania 1683-1710 from the Lower Rhine region and Hamburg. A small group of Palatines and Alsatians also settled in Galicia 1780 ff.

But the major migration was from the overcrowded, restricted Vistula Delta region, whence in 1788-1840 some 10,000 souls went to the Ukraine (a few in 1853 to Samara) to establish the great Mennonite body in Russia, which by 1914 had reached 100,000 souls with some 30 distinct settlements, including the Caucasus, Crimea, Volga area, Orenburg, and Ufa, Western Siberia, and Turkestan. This growth was in spite of the loss of one third of the Russian Mennonite population (18,000) by emigration to the prairie states and provinces of the United States and Canada in 1873-80. Smaller settlements of Vistula Mennonites had also been made in inner Poland (near Warsaw) and Volhynia (both Russian after the Congress of Vienna in 1815).

Another notable migration was the post-Napoleonic (1817-50) emigration of several thousand Swiss, Alsatian, and South German (also some Galician and Hessian) Mennonites to the North Central States (western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois), Iowa, and Ontario.

In this period there were two serious divisions with permanent consequences. The first was the Amish schism of 1693-97, which permanently split the Swiss-South German group in half, and which is still perpetuated in North America though now fully overcome in Europe. The second was the Mennonite Brethren schism in the Ukraine in 1860 ff., which ultimately won about one fourth of the Russian Mennonites (25,000 souls in Russia by 1914) and has been perpetuated in North and South America. The smaller divisions include the immersionist Dompelaers in Hamburg 1648, extinct by 1676; the Kleine Gemeinde in the Ukraine in 1812, with its sub-schism of 1862 the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren, both perpetuated exclusively in North America as very small groups; the further small Russian divisions, now practically all extinct, the Jerusalemsfreunde (1866), the Apostolic Brethren (Brotbrecher) (1890), Allianzgemeinde (1905); and the Hahnische Mennonites in Baden in 1868, still existing there in three small congregations. Also to be noted is the Neu-Täufer division of 1835 in the Emmental (half from the Reformed Church, also called Fröhlichianer after their leader Samuel Fröhlich) existing today in moderate numbers both in central Europe (Switzerland and South Germany), where they are called Evangelische Taufgesinnte, and in the central United States, where they are called Apostolic Christians. The older Dutch divisions were completely healed, together with the newer division of Lamists vs. Zonists (1664-1801), in the A.D.S. (General Mennonite Conference) of 1811, although the Flemish-Frisian division persisted in superficial form in West Prussia and Russia until into the 20th century.

The first century of this period was marked by the closest relations that have ever developed between the Dutch and Swiss-South German groups. The severe persecution by the Bernese government brought vigorous though ineffective political intervention by the Dutch Mennonites, while the physical suffering of the Swiss and the Palatines in this time brought generous financial aid from the Dutch for a very long period of time (1650-1750) through the noted Commission for Foreign Needs. This commission helped also in emigration, assisting some Swiss to settle permanently in Groningen (1710 ff.), where they have been completely assimilated, and many more Swiss and Palatines to emigrate to Pennsylvania 1710-50. A similar attempt to resettle Tilsit-Memel Mennonites in Holland (1732) miscarried.

During this first century of the period also the relations between the Netherlands, North Germany, and West Prussia remained close, even down to Napoleonic times, with considerable translation of Dutch Mennonite literature into German (confessions, catechism, sermons), as well as the maintenance of the Dutch language in preaching until late in the 18th century. Later with the rise of nationalism, particularly in Germany with the rise of Prussia and the formation of the German Empire in 1870, international relationships among European Mennonites declined noticeably, except between the West Prussians and the Russians and the Dutch and Northwest Germans. Alsace-Lorraine being a part of Germany 1870-1918, the French Mennonites were badly divided during this time, but the Alsatian Mennonites at the same time were strongly oriented toward the South Germans, especially the Baden group. The growing sense of German unity in turn finally overcame the century-old distance between the Northwest Germans, the West Prussians, and the South Germans, though slowly. The Mennonitische Blätter, founded in 1854 as an all-German periodical, the first Mennonite church paper in Europe and the only one for another generation (Gemeindeblatt, Baden 1870; Zondagsbode, Netherlands 1887; Zionspilger, Switzerland 1882; Mennonitisches Gemeindeblatt, Galicia 1912; Botschafter, Russia 1905-14; Unser Blatt, Russia 1922-26; Friedensstimme, a private venture in Russia, 1905). The attempted Vereinigung of Mennonite Churches in Germany (1886-) was only partly successful, since most of the West Prussians, all of the Badischer Verband, and part of the Palatinate-Hesse churches stayed outside.

A serious twofold block to closer fellowship between the Dutch Mennonites and the remaining Mennonites of Europe during this period was the differing theological and ecclesiastical development as between the Netherlands and the rest of Europe. Liberal theology came into the Dutch churches in the second half of the 19th century and by 1870 had nearly completely captured Dutch Mennonitism, together with East Friesland and Crefeld. Along with this came the surrender of nonresistance and nonconformity rather completely, as well as a complete shift from a lay ministry to a trained and salaried ministry (this latter change had begun already in 1735 with the founding of the seminary at Amsterdam). Everywhere else in Europe, except in the German city churches where liberalism also made inroads in the 20th century, the chief new influence was pietistic. The West Prussian, South German, Swiss, French, and Russian churches either remained traditional and relatively inert, or became pietistic (especially Hamburg, Palatinate, Baden). These groups also retained nonresistance longer (Germans fully to 1870 and partly to 1914, Russians to the end, Swiss partly to the present time, French not after 1815), also a degree of nonconformity combined with a rural culture, and (except in the German city churches and the Palatinate) kept the lay ministry. Pietism also found an echo in the Netherlands in the 18th century (J. Deknatel of Amsterdam) and later a similar influence, the Reveil (Isaac da Costa of Amsterdam) in the 19th century.

At the same time, in the course of the 19th and 20th centuries all the European Mennonite groups (the Swiss last, and the Russians scarcely at all since they developed their own German-Mennonite culture) became increasingly nationalized and assimilated into their national life and culture, losing largely their sense of separation and acquiring a political interest. Particularly was this the case in the urban groups. Ernst Crous has vividly described this process in Germany in his essay, "How the Mennonites of Germany Grew to Be a Part of the Nation." No Dutch Mennonite would have thought of writing such a comparable essay for the Netherlands, because that assimilation had taken place two centuries earlier and the Dutch Mennonites occupied in a sense an elite status in Holland. And in Russia the Mennonites were proud to have remained distinct from the Slavic culture of the nation as an autonomous German-Mennonite culture group; those Russian Mennonites who became interested in a rapprochement with the Russian culture were usually under suspicion and often criticized.

It is remarkable that only the Russian Mennonites developed their own church educational program (they in a sense had to, of course, to survive). The Dutch vigorously object to church schools even today, and have never developed a full school of any sort, not even a full theological faculty. The attempt at a German Mennonite high school at Weierhof in the Palatinate (1805 ff.), while educationally successful was a relative failure as a church school because of the small Mennonite patronage. A weak and late attempt in West Prussia died in birth, although there had been some elementary schools in certain West Prussian communities in the 17th-19th centuries. The German-speaking Jura Mennonites, living as a German-language island in a French culture area, have maintained a series of Mennonite elementary schools for a century, latterly with state financial aid.

The 19th century was marked also by a noteworthy development of the regional conference system, Switzerland 1780, Dutch A.D.S. 1811, West Prussia 1830, Baden 1848, Palatinate-Hessen 1870, South German 1884, Mennonite Brethren in Russia 1876, Mennonite Church in Russia 1880, Alsace 1905, French-speaking 1905. While the autonomy of the local congregation was largely retained (except in the Badischer Verband where the conference had complete centralized control over the local churches) the conference inevitably began to influence the local churches toward more uniformity and more alertness and activity.

A noteworthy development in the 19th century was the rise of foreign mission interest, although home missions and evangelism remained either totally undeveloped or quite rudimentary. Through Baptist influence the foreign mission cause came to be supported in the Palatinate (1820 ff.), in Holland (1830 ff.), and in West Prussia (1830 ff.). When the Dutch Mennonite mission board was organized in 1847 (work in Java began in 1851) it found considerable support in West Prussia and Hamburg, also some in the Palatinate, and in South Russia whence it drew much of its support and most of its few missionaries until 1914.

Except for the Netherlands there was a remarkable paucity of Mennonite literature in Europe throughout this period. This might be expected from the largely uneducated and rural groups such as Switzerland, France, Baden, and West Prussia. Even in the German city churches with their trained ministers little was produced, except in Hamburg and Emden. The same is true for the Palatinate. Even in Russia the literary output was noticeably small down to the very last. Perhaps the Mennonites were too much assimilated to other thinking, some to Pietism, some (the trained clergy) to the current liberal or orthodox theology of the main trends in European life. In some cases of course the constituency was too small to support the publication of literature. In Russia preoccupation with the problem of colonization no doubt played a role. Dutch Mennonites published relatively much all through this period. Four major Mennonite areas developed their own hymnbooks, confessions, and catechisms: Holland, West Prussia, Russia, and South Germany, but no church publishing house ever developed among the Mennonites of Russia. Mennonite population remained relatively static in Germany, France, and Switzerland during the 19th and 20th centuries, doubled in the Netherlands 1815-1918, and multiplied tenfold in Russia.

3. 1918-56; Developments since World War I. The two serious world wars (1914-18 and 1940-45), together with the rise of Communism in Russia, have had decisive effects on Mennonitism in Europe. The repeated German attacks on France in 1870, 1914, and 1940 seriously alienated the French and Swiss Mennonites from the Germans, though brotherly good will has in part overcome this. The rise and temporary rule of Nazism (1933-45) together with the German attack on the Netherlands caused even more serious alienation between the Dutch and the Germans. World War I between Germany and Russia brought a serious strain on the German-oriented Mennonites in Russia. The defeat of Germany in 1918 returned Alsace to France but ruptured the growing fellowship of Alsatians and Germans. The defeat of Germany in 1945 resulted in the destruction of the age-old Mennonite settlements in inner Poland and Galicia, also making the condition of the German-speaking Mennonites in Russia almost intolerable. About 35,000 Russian Mennonites, mostly of the Chortitza settlement, were able to escape in 1943-45 with the retreating German army and some 12,000 were ultimately resettled in Paraguay and Canada, the rest being recaptured and returned forcibly to Russia.

However, the most important development in this period was the practical destruction of Mennonitism in Russia as a consequence of the Russian Revolution and the establishment of atheistic communism as the ruling force in Soviet Russia. The Mennonites did not revolt by force against this development, but being unable spiritually to accept it, they resisted communization. This made them de facto enemies of the Communist state, and Stalin's measures to liquidate the peasant resistance to collectivization in 1927-34 hit the Mennonites very hard. Had it not been for the decision of some 21,000 to emigrate to Canada (1922-25), partly because of the great famine and disorder of 1918-20, and the escape of some 4,000 in 1929-30, the losses would have been still greater. Statistics are impossible, but it is clear that most of the Mennonite settlements in Russia no longer exist, at least with any large number of Mennonite families. Mennonite church life became practically extinct in that land by 1935, although there was sufficient private and family religion left to make possible a brief reinstitution of church life in the Ukraine in 1941-43, especially in Chortitza during the German occupation. The Siberian settlements suffered the least, and there was actually a new settlement established on the Manchurian Amur border 1926-30, which, however, was almost extinguished, largely by mass flight, in 1930-31.

Noteworthy developments have taken place in inter-Mennonite relations since 1918. One is the Mennonite World Conference, held in Basel in 1925, Danzig in 1930, Amsterdam in 1936, Goshen and Newton (United States) in 1948, Basel again in 1952. Another was the great relief work in the Russian famine (1920-22) largely by the American Mennonites, but also in part by Dutch Mennonites. (German Mennonites cared for several hundred who were stranded for a time in Germany, e.g., at Lechfeld, q.v., and in Mecklenburg.) A third was the extensive relief work of the American Mennonites (MCC) in Western Europe, including all Mennonite areas except Russia, 1945- .

Finally mention must be made of the highly significant migrations of Russian Mennonites to Canada (1) in 1922-25 and 1930, and (2) 1947-52 which have vitally affected Canadian Mennonitism, and the similar substantial Russian settlements in 1930-32 in Brazil and Paraguay, also in 1947-50 in Paraguay again. The last movement of migration was of small groups of Danzig-West Prussian Mennonites to Uruguay 1950-52 and a few to Canada.

One of the historic tragedies of Mennonite history, though not as extensive as the tribulation and suppression in Russia, was the total destruction of the 400-year-old Mennonite community in West Prussia-Danzig in 1945 as a result of the German defeat by Russia and the Polish reoccupation of the Vistula Delta (Russia taking over the Königsberg corner). About three fourths (9,000) of the West Prussians survived as refugees and are now relocated as follows: 1,000 in Uruguay, 300 in Canada, 8,000 in West Germany, with a rather compact block of about 1,000 in the Palatinate.

A theological trend worth noting since 1910 is the substantial decline of liberalism in Holland and Northwest Germany during this period, paralleling the decline of liberalism in European Protestantism in general, and the resurgence of an evangelical theological emphasis.

The present distribution of Mennonite baptized membership in Europe is as follows: Netherlands 41,000, Germany 8,000, France 3,000, Switzerland 1,500, total (without Russia) 53,500. (ML I, 614 f.)

Eusebius of Caesarea (266-340) was bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, one of the leading men at the Council of Nicea and the favorite theologian of Constantine the Great, conspicuous for his great learning. His fame rests on his Ecclesiastical History from the apostolic times to A.D. 324. Today it is our chief source for the early church, being very comprehensive and beyond doubt reliable. Eusebius lived through the last (and worst) persecution of the Christians under Emperor Diocletian (around 300). This experience prompted him to collect the stories not only of the martyrs of his time but of all Christian martyrs since the beginning. This "Collection of Martyrdoms" was then extensively used in his great church history which was leading up just to the time of the Council of Nicea (which to most left-wing Christian groups later meant the turning point, the downfall of the Christian Church). It is most likely that it was these records of martyrdom which so strongly appealed to the Anabaptists who read in them a confirmation of their own way, the way of the "suffering church." That might account for the fact that Eusebius' church history is so frequently used as a reference in Anabaptist tracts. This is particularly true for Hutterite devotional, doctrinal, and church historical tracts found in their numerous codices. Eusebius' great popularity among Anabaptists can be inferred from the hymn (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, pp. 669-75) entitled, "Ein schönes Lied von den Aposteln und Heiligen Märtyrern, aus Eusebius auf das Kürzeste gezogen und gesangsweis verfasst" (1567, not 1570 as in the Liederbuch). This hymn has 57 stanzas and was possibly composed by one Christoph Scheffmann, who wrote several hymns of this kind.

The question as to where the Brethren got their knowledge of Eusebius is not yet solved. Humanists, of course, and Catholic scholars, knew the book as it was written in Latin. But among the Anabaptists very few ever mastered this language (a few converted priests in the earliest period, also Thomas of Imbroich, and a few more) and they hardly translated the book for their group. The main source then seems to have been the various works by Sebastian Franck (e.g., his Chronica, 1531) which were widely read among the Hutterian Brethren and represent the link between Anabaptism and Humanism. Balthasar Hubmaier may also have been instrumental, since he was very learned and widely read. Finally one might assume that pamphlets circulated among the Brethren with excerpts from Eusebius in translation, edited by free-lance scholars of the early 16th century who sympathized with nonconformist movements. Hutterite codices contain many historical references (even an entire sermon by John Chrysostom of the 4th century) which all point to such little-noticed sources of popular education.

Eussestal (Eysestal), a parish of Germersheim, Baden, Germany, the location of the Eussestal monastery. Here and on the estates of Breitwieserhof, Hilspach, Stadtwies, Laubenwald, Oberbergerwies, and Lautertal, Swiss Mennonites had settled by the 1720's. A 1720 directory of Schafsweiden mentions the name Wohlgemuth. In 1724 the Germersheim lists name "four poor Anabaptists, who are temporary renters." One, named Bauer, was the monastery miller. In the course of the 18th century these names occur: Schneider, Zuber, Herzler, Müller, Gingerich, Christmann, Eschelberger, and Draxel (records of the Palatinate, Generallandesarchiv at Karlsruhe). Eva Pieters, widow of Gheeraert Listync, an Anabaptist martyr, was born in Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland; she was baptized in Münster in Westphalia while the city was besieged by the bishop's army. When the city was taken on July 25, 1535, she succeeded in escaping to the Netherlands, where she was taken prisoner, but saved her life by renouncing her faith. She then went to Belgium and joined the Anabaptist congregation at Brugge (q.v.). Since there were no traces of Münsterism in this congregation, it may be assumed that she had given up all Münsterite ideas. When she was seized she remained steadfast and loyally sacrificed her body for the sake of Christ. On Aug. 20, 1538, she was burned at the stake in Brugge together with Josyne Schricx (q.v.). Evangelical Mennonite Brethren. The Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Conference was organized Oct. 14, 1889, under the name Conference of United Mennonite Brethren in North America, the first session being held at Mountain Lake, Minn. Later this name was changed to Defenseless Mennonite Brethren of Christ in North America. In 1937 the present name was adopted. For a time many of the congregations used the name "Brudertaler," probably under the influence of the Mountain Lake founding church, and the Conference was popularly called the "Brudertaler" Conference. The Ebenezer Church at Henderson, Neb. (separating from the Bethesda Church), under the leadership of Elder Isaac Peters, and the Brudertaler Church at Mountain Lake, led by Elder Aaron Wall, were the first churches organized. Wall's following was about one third of the Mountain Lake Mennonite community; the other part organized to form two churches, Bergfeld and Bethel. The churches from which Peters and Wall separated later joined the General Conference Mennonite Church. The ground given by Peters and Wall for separation was the need of (1) the new birth and changed life as a requirement for baptism and church membership; (2) a separated walk as a result of the new birth; (3) a more rigid church discipline. The form of baptism is now optional with each congregation, though earlier it was pouring only.

The Conference, although at no time attaining a phenomenal growth, can report steady progress. Families moving into new settlement areas became the charter members of newly organized churches. Soon a dozen churches dotted several states and provinces. Some of these churches have since ceased to exist, largely because of repeated crop failures during periods of continued drought. G. P. Schultz was the outstanding evangelist. H. P. Schultz, John N. Wall, and John R. Dick served the Conference as chairmen more than any other. The Conference in 1954 numbers 21 organized churches with a total membership of 2,309, and 3 mission stations not as yet member churches with a total attendance of about 65. There are 64 ordained ministers, including missionaries (men) and educators, and 12 men are licensed to preach.

An increasing number of Conference young people are attending schools of higher education in preparation to serve as missionaries, ministers, doctors, nurses, educators, and in other lay professions. Churches of the Conference co-operate with the following schools: Dalmeny (Sask.) Bible Academy, Lustre (Mont.) Bible Academy, Meade (Kan.) Bible Academy, Mountain Lake (Minn.) Bible School, Steinbach (Man.) Bible Academy, and Grace Bible Institute, Omaha (Neb.). The Henderson (Neb.) Bible School and the Dallas (Ore.) Bible School, once operated by the E.M.B. churches at these places, have been discontinued.

Revival and evangelistic meetings are held almost annually in all of the churches. Bible conferences, Bible camps, vacation Bible schools, and child evangelism are encouraged in all constituent areas.

Missions were encouraged from the inception of the Conference. The P. A. Friesens were the first E.M.B. missionaries to India (1906), serving under the M.C. Board; the G. T. Thiessens went to China in 1914; and the A. F. Wienses were the first home missionaries, going to Chicago in 1906. Today the conference has 60 missionaries on the foreign fields, 9 on extended furlough or retired, and 10 candidates. About 45 missionaries serve on the home fields. The Conference is affiliated with the following mission organizations: China Mennonite Mission Society, Congo Inland Mission, Gospel Missionary Union, and the Far Eastern Gospel Crusade. Missionaries are also channeled through eight nonaffiliated mission organizations.

The E.M.B. Conference is affiliated with and supports the Mennonite Central Committee (MCC) and the National Association of Evangelicals (NAE). In 1953 the Conference joined with the Evangelical Mennonite Church to form the Conference of Evangelical Mennonites (q.v.), but retaining its own conference organization also.

In 1953 the Conference consisted of the following congregations (with membership): Nebraska—Henderson 96, Jansen 70; Kansas—Meade 266; Minnesota—Mountain Lake 256; South Dakota—Marion 115; Iowa—Luton 43; Montana—Lustre 100; Illinois—Chicago 77; Oregon—Dallas 313; California—Reedley 20; Manitoba—Steinbach 310, Winnipeg 42; Saskatchewan—Dalmeny 183, Langham ?; British Columbia—Abbotsford 103. The Conference was divided into five districts in fellowship: (1) Manitoba and Saskatchewan, (2) Montana and Oregon, (3) Mountain Lake, Marion, and Chicago, (4) Nebraska, (5) Alberta, but this system has been discontinued.

The Conference published its own journal, Evangelisationsbote (q.v.) 1910-53, after 1934 called Gospel Tidings. Since the affiliation of the Evangelical Mennonite Church and the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren in 1953, this paper and the conference paper of the E.M.C. have been combined under the name The Evangelical Mennonite. But in 1923 an official publication appeared containing the Constitution and Discipline and a newly prepared Confession of Faith. The cumulated conference reports 1901-38 were published in a booklet in 1938.

Evangelical Mennonite Church, before 1948 known as the Defenseless Mennonite Church of North America and earlier popularly called the "Egli Amish," was conceived about 1864 in Adams Co., Ind. Henry Egly, since 1858 a bishop of the Amish congregation near Berne, claimed to have experienced regeneration of heart, and began to urge the necessity of a definite experience of regeneration. He charged his group with formalism, lack of spiritual vitality and depth, looseness in maintaining the old customs, especially in regard to dress, and rebaptized those who had not experienced regeneration at the time of their first baptism in order that their baptism could be the answer of a good conscience toward God. No sooner had Bishop Egly made the announcement of his position than the congregation was divided, about half claiming they had had a personal experience of salvation either before baptism or after. These became adherents to Bishop Egly's teaching, and with these in 1866 he organized his own church.

The contention that arose under Bishop Egly's ministry in Adams Co., Ind., spread to certain Amish congregations in Fulton Co., Ohio, Gridley, Ill., and even to Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska, although the main centers have been Berne, Ind., Archbold, Ohio, and Gridley, Ill. He strengthened his cause in all these places and won many converts who later became leaders in the conference when it was organized. The early teaching was very strict in regard to discipline and dress. The prayer head covering (a black three-cornered veil) and bonnet were originally worn. Later the veil was made larger and longer and eventually was discarded for the costume of the general populace. The men commonly wore beards but did not practice wearing the collarless coat and did not wear ties in the early days. In place of this a sort of black kerchief was worn around the neck. The modern tie was, however, adopted later, although some of the older ministers never wore it. Wearing of ornamental jewelry was banned, as was the use of tobacco and strong drink. The holy kiss was in favor but gradually was dropped by the laity, being practiced only in the reception of members and among ministers. This is no longer practiced except that where the rite of footwashing is observed the two washing each other's feet exchange the token. At first the group was quite exclusive, lived independently of other religious organizations, and was conservative in its relations with other people. In the early years they had no musical instruments, but had singing schools; but finally organs were permitted and now piano and other instrumental music are considered an integral part of the worship service.

The church services were conducted with singing and testimony for all the members and preaching by the minister, or by the deacons in the absence of the ministers, and sometimes in their presence. There were also special prayer and testimony meetings. At first German was spoken but later English was introduced and part of the service was in German and part in English. There were usually two services on Sunday, morning and afternoon. The early church had a kitchen and dining room attached so that members could stay all day, families taking turns in providing the meal, which consisted of bread and butter with syrup or apple butter and coffee.

The first Sunday schools were started in 1870-74 and were conducted in schoolhouses. These schools were independent of the church, since they met considerable opposition. Their purpose was not fully understood and they did not last long. In 1880 the first official Sunday school was held in the meetinghouse and was generally accepted. During the first few years the classes were conducted in German. Jubeltöne was the songbook used, and the Bible was the textbook. The smaller children used a special German A-B-C book and the next classes Hübner's Biblische Geschichten, both of which were published by the Mennonite Publishing Company of Elkhart, Ind. Children were taught to memorize verses of the Bible; later Sunday-school quarterlies of the Mennonite Publishing House of Scottdale, Pa., were used and some are still used. Services are now all in English.

The church membership was gained by preaching repentance and the forgiveness of sins as a personal, definite experience. This was expressed in general or special meetings by the convert rising to his feet sometimes during the sermon and asking the church for their prayers, asking forgiveness of parents and friends, making wrongs right, and holding on in prayer until he received through faith in Christ's atoning blood the evidence that his sins were forgiven. Later opportunity was given at the close of the message for those wishing to be saved to raise their hands for prayer and also come forward and kneel at an altar. Conversions were confined to the immediate families but as years passed the spirit of evangelism reached outside the immediate Mennonite fold. Yearly, and sometimes oftener, special evangelistic services are now conducted to reach not only the Mennonites but also those in the community who have no church home and are in need of salvation.

The first annual conference was held in 1883 although incorporation did not take place till 1908. This conference was confined to the discussion of the various doctrines of the church and transacted no business. Bishop Henry Egly was in charge. Others taking active part in the discussions were C. R. Egle, Peter Hochstettler, Detsch, Christian King, S. Leip, Joseph Rediger, Daniel Rupp, and Christian Zimmerman. Topics included Sinners and Unrighteousness, Justification, Repentance, Atonement, Baptism, Immersion, Adoption, Footwashing, Marriage of a Child of God, Oaths, and Nonresistance. It was another decade before another conference was held, but since 1895 there has been a yearly conference with routine business. Each local church was represented by one delegate for each 25 members. Since 1948 each local church has been represented by one delegate for each 35 members.

The church began missionary work in 1896 when the conference supported Matilda Kohm in Africa. Interest in this venture was stimulated by Joseph Rediger, elder in the Salem Church, Gridley, Ill. She went out under the Christian Missionary Alliance Board to the Lower Congo just north of Boma. After her first furlough, on her return to the field in 1900 she took with her Alma Doering, and both worked under the Swedish Missionary Society in territory between the Congo and the Kasai. Missionary interest multiplied until finally the Congo Inland Mission Board was organized (1912) in cooperation with the Central Conference of the Mennonite Church, and in later years has expanded its operations to include two other Mennonite conference representatives on its Board, with a total of 74 active missionaries on the field and 8 who are on the retired list. Also in 1949 missionary efforts were extended by the church to the Dominican Republic, where there are now 7 workers.

In 1898 the Salem Orphanage near Flanagan, Ill., was founded by Daniel R. King and his wife, a childless aged couple, members of the Defenseless Mennonite Church, when they gave their farm of 100 acres, two miles south of Flanagan, for the cause. A charter was granted Dec. 22, 1896, the name "Salem Orphanage" legally adopted, and a Constitution and Bylaws framed by the first six trustees. Since then the Board of Directors has been chosen by the Conference. In 1905 Henry Broad of Flanagan also willed his farm of 160 acres, which lies within one mile of the Home. The churches of the Conference give monthly offerings for its maintenance. The name was changed to "Salem Children's Home" in 1945.

In 1897 the annual conference resolved to publish a paper in the interest of the Conference and orphanage under the name Heils-Bote. Its English companion was begun about the same time under the name Zion's Call, with D. N. Claudon as editor. This was published by the Salem Orphanage until a Conference resolution in 1913 made it the official organ of the Defenseless Mennonites. Later on Sept. 1, 1921, the paper became a combination of Zion's Call and Good Tidings and was published under the name Zion's Tidings. Since the merger of the E.M.B. and E.M.C. conferences the paper now represents both of these groups and is called The Evangelical Mennonite.

In the last decade of the 19th century a group under the leadership of J. A. Ramseyer insisted upon immersion as the only mode of baptism and taught the infilling of the Holy Spirit to be an experience separate from regeneration, and became exceedingly zealous to do missionary work. As this was not generally accepted by the church, a split occurred, the Ramseyer group leaving in 1898 to form the Missionary Church Association (q.v.). In the 1940's attempts were made to reunite the two groups, but without success. Finally in 1953 a successful merger was made with the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren (q.v.) to form the Evangelical Mennonite Conference (q.v.). In 1954 the Evangelical Mennonite Church consisted of 19 congregations with a total of 2,103 baptized members as follows: Ohio—Archbold 437, Wauseon 184, Pioneer 41, Bluffton 62; Indiana—Berne 263, Woodburn 163, Grabill 144, Lafayette 70, Ft. Wayne 71; Illinois—Gridley 224, Groveland 153, Chicago 39; Kansas—Sterling 142; Tennessee—McMinnville 17, Smithville 18, Pomeroy 17, Sparta 3; Michigan—Adrian 34, Midland 21. E.E.R.

Evangelical Mennonite Church is the new name adopted in 1952 by the Kleine Gemeinde Mennonite Church of Canada. For the history of this group see Kleine Gemeinde.

Evangelical Mennonite Conference, properly "The Conference of Evangelical Mennonites," a joint conference of the Evangelical Mennonite Church (q.v.) and the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.), was formed June 14, 1953. It does not constitute a true merger, since each conference maintains its own separate identity and name and internal organization. The new joint conference has its own committees, publishes an official monthly organ The Evangelical Mennonite (first number July 1953) and annual Conference of Evangelical Mennonites Calendar. Organizationally it has an Executive Board, an executive secretary appointed by the Board, and four commissions as follows: Commission on Missions, Commission on Education, Commission on Promotion, Commission on Departments. An equal number of representatives of the two subsidiary conferences are appointed for a term of three years on the above. The conference meets triennially. H.S.B.

Evangelical Mennonites (Gehman group), 1857-79, one of the constituent groups which entered into the formation of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ-United Missionary Church. It arose as a schism in the Eastern Pennsylvania (GCM) Oberholtzer group, beginning initially in the Upper Milford congregation and centering in the person of Preacher William Gehman (1827-1918), who became the leader of the New Evangelical group. Gehman, ordained in 1849, began holding private prayer meetings in 1853 (with conference approval), which in 1856 were forbidden by the bishop of the conference. In the 1857 spring conference a vote was taken on the question and all those voting against the bishop's decision were expelled, 24 persons in number. The expelled group built a new meetinghouse at Upper Milford and on Sept. 24, 1858, organized the Evangelical Mennonite Conference with two elders, William N. Schelly and William Gehman, two preachers, David Henning and Henry Diehl, and three deacons. In 1876, when the conference first published its confession of faith and discipline, there were four elders, David Henning and Eusebius Hershey having been added, six preachers, Abel Strawn, J. L. Romig, John Musselman, and Abraham Kauffman having been added, and three deacons. In 1879 at the time of the merger there were nine congregations, nine ministers, and six deacons. After Upper Milford the next organized congregations were Coopersburg and Quakertown. The Evangelical Mennonites were strictly evangelistic and practiced a warmer, more emotional type of piety than the other Mennonites of that time. They definitely represent the entrance of a Methodistic type of piety, activity, and church organization into the Mennonite brotherhood in America. As early as 1876 they had an official missionary society, whose constitution was published in the book of discipline. This was essentially a home mission society, and did not operate foreign missions even though the constitution included foreign missions in its name. Eusebius Hershey of this group, the first American Mennonite foreign missionary, waited long to be sent by the church, but finally, in 1890, went out independently to Nigeria at the age of 67, dying there a year later. Evangelical Society of the Canton of Bern (Evangelische Gesellschaft des Kantons Bern), organized in 1831, in the circles of Heimberger Brethren (Oberland Brethren) and the pietists of the city of Bern, Switzerland. Its object is to revive spiritual life in the Reformed Church. The official organ of the Association is Brosamen, Evangelisches Volksblatt. It maintains a school of evangelism in Bern, an office, and a bookstore.

The society has connections with the Mennonite congregations of the canton of Bern (Alt-Taufgesinnte, Alttäufer). A number of Mennonites are members of the main conference of the society. It often serves the Mennonite churches with evangelists (in evangelization weeks, holidays, etc.). On the other hand, Mennonites also serve at the conferences of the society. In Emmenholz (q.v.) in the canton of Solothurn, a part of the Kleintal congregation, Mennonite preachers and evangelists alternate in conducting the services. In Chaux d' Abel (q.v.) connections have been maintained since 1868, and in Kleintal (q.v.) since 1881. A.-T.

Evangelical United Brethren Church. This denomination was formed in November 1946 through the merging of the former Church of the United Brethren in Christ and the Evangelical Church. These denominations were born almost simultaneously and developed side by side through 150 years before this union.

The Church of the United Brethren in Christ resulted from the efforts of Philip William Otterbein (q.v.), then pastor of the Second Reformed Church in Baltimore, and Martin Boehm, a Mennonite bishop living in southern Lancaster Co., Pa. Otterbein, imbued with the Reformed pietistic spirit which he inherited during his student days at Herborn, was so favorably impressed by a sermon preached by Boehm at Long's barn, near Neffsville, Pa., about 1767, that he threw his arms about Boehm's neck and said, "We are brethren!" whence the name "United Brethren." For a long generation, Otterbein, Boehm, and other pastors with similar pietistic and evangelistic inclinations continued their work in their respective denominations. By 1800 the work was sufficiently distinct to warrant the calling of the first general conference, at which time Otterbein and Boehm were named bishops. The first rules and order were printed in 1815.

This denomination stressed the observance of "footwashing" during the earlier years of its history and permitted the practice of baptism by immersion, though prescribing no one form. Through differences of opinion about the constitution of the church, a small faction left the denomination in May 1885 to form the Church of the United Brethren (Old Constitution), which continues as a small denomination to the present.

The Evangelical Church was founded by Jacob Albright (q.v.) in 1800 in eastern Pennsylvania. Upon his death in 1808, his associate, George Miller, drafted the first Discipline (rules and order) of the denomination, which was printed in 1809. The first general conference of the denomination met at Linfield, Pa., in 1816 and established a printing press at New Berlin, Pa.

A division in the denomination gave birth to the United Evangelical Church in 1894. Most of the clergy and members of this denomination were reunited with the Evangelical Church in October 1922; a small group continues to the present as the Evangelical Congregational Church.

Both constituent groups of the present denomination have been closely related to the Mennonite and other Anabaptist groups. Baptism by immersion was permitted, occasionally members wore "plain" clothes or partially "plain" clothes, while the observance of footwashing had practically disappeared at the infrequent observances of the "lovefeast."

The Evangelical Church was significant to the Mennonites as it, more than any other movement, mediated the revivalist spirit and methods of the Methodists to the Germans in Mennonite communities. Many Mennonites were drawn into the movement while others reacted against it.

The Evangelical United Brethren Church in 1954 was sponsoring seven colleges and three theological seminaries, one of which is located in Reutlingen, Germany, where the Evangelical Church was established in 1850. Missionary work is being supported in Europe, China, Japan, the Philippines, Africa, Puerto Rico, and Peru. The official weekly paper is the Telescope-Messenger, and a similar organ for young people is called the Builders. The 1954 membership was almost 800,000. R.W.A.

Evangelical United Mennonite Publication Society, Goshen, Ind., appears in 1880 as the publisher of The Doctrines and Discipline of the Evangelical United Mennonites, and in 1881 as the publisher of A Choice Collection of Hymns. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ Publication Society, Berlin, Ont., appears as the publisher of the Doctrines and Discipline of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ in 1888 and again in 1897. By 1903, however, the Bethel Publishing Company appears as the publisher of M.B.C. books. It appears, although this is not confirmed by J. A. Huffman's History of the Mennonite Brethren Church (New Carlisle, 1920), that the first two names refer to the official denominational publishing agency of this group, which, though continuous, changed its name. The annual conference of 1879 had established a church printing plant and appointed a publishing committee. The printing plant was first located in Goshen, then in 1885 in Berlin, Ont. The Bethel Publishing Company was, however, a private venture of J. A. Huffman, which became a denominational agency in 1918. H.S.B.

Evangelical United Mennonites, 1879-83, formed October 1879 by a merger of the Evangelical Mennonites (Gehman group 1856-79) of Pennsylvania, and the United Mennonites (Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, and Ontario, 1875-79), a transition group which became the Mennonite Brethren in Christ in 1883 by the addition of the Swank (Ohio) faction of the Brethren in Christ (1861-83). At the time of the union in 1879, the group had some 40 ministers and 18 congregations, organized into 3 district conferences, Ontario, Pennsylvania, and Indiana-Ohio-Michigan. The discipline of the United Mennonites (slightly revised) was adopted for the merged group.

The presiding elders of the three conferences during this period were as follows: Pennsylvania—William Gehman 1880-91; Ontario—Solomon Eby 1875-86; Indiana-Ohio-Michigan—Daniel Brenneman 1879-80, 1881-82, 1883-84. By 1883 the group had 58 ministers, 37 churches (and 76 preaching places), and 2,076 members. H.S.B.

Evangelisationsbote (Gospel Tidings since 1943) was first published in January 1910 as a four-page German monthly organ of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Conference. Its purpose is to serve as a tie between the conference churches, to further and to unify their joint efforts in evangelism, missions, charity, youth work, and spiritual edification. From 1921 on for 30 years it was issued twice monthly. In 1943 the name was changed to Gospel Tidings. For the first 28 years the language was almost exclusively German, then the English portion increased until January 1951, when the German was dropped. For four years (1947-50) the regular issues consisted of eight pages. From 1951 it was published monthly with from 16 to 20 pages, when it had about 900 subscribers. From January to June 1953 Gospel Tidings has been published jointly with the Zion's Tidings, official organ of the E.M.C., in 24-page monthly issues, size 9 x 12 in., and printed in Berne, Ind. The last issue was June 15, 1953, after which it was succeeded by The Evangelical Mennonite, organ of the Conference of Evangelical Mennonites, the affiliation of the E.M.B. Conference and the Evangelical Mennonite Conference.

Since the conference did not have its own publishing house and did not employ a full-time editor, there were frequent changes in the journal; there were 13 editors and 8 printing places in the 42 years of its existence.

Of special interest are the 25th Jubilee issue of May 15, 1936, and the Historic Review number of Aug. 1, 1948. H.F.E.

Evangelische Mennoniten-Brüderschaft (see Allianz-Gemeinden), a Mennonite congregation of South Russia, which was organized May 16, 1905, at Yushanlee in the Molotschna settlement. It arose from the desire to have fellowship only with truly believing members of the church. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 722-24; ML I, 615.) Neff.

Evangelische Mennoniten-Gemeinden was the name of a number of Mennonite congregations in Russia, of which the Molotschnaer Evangelische Mennonitenbrüderschaft (q.v.), founded in 1905, and Altonauer Evangelische Mennonitengemeinde (q.v.), founded in 1907, were most significant. The popular name for these congregations was Allianz-Gemeinden (q.v.). P. M. Friesen, as indicated in the title of his book, Alt-Evangelische Mennonitische Brüderschaft, and expressed throughout it, was one of the chief promoters of the concern which caused the founding of these congregations. He himself was for a time the leader of the Evangelische Mennonitische Brüderschaft at Sevastopol. His book contains much information regarding the basic philosophy of the movement.

As a member of the Mennonite Brethren Church he was disappointed, and with him others, in the course which his church followed. Raising the question as to whether the promising beginning had been fulfilled particularly regarding John 17:21, he concluded that the concept of the fellowship of the saints was too closely identified with being a member of the Mennonite Brethren Church (375 ff.). Although basically in agreement with the Mennonite Brethren principles, he strongly advocated an Allianz, a fellowship of all children of God particularly within the Mennonite brotherhood in daily life and also around the Lord's table. The segregation type of Allianz as promoted by the Darbystic Bible School of Berlin (later Wiedenest) was too narrow for him. He strongly promoted an inter-Mennonite fellowship, simultaneously stressing Mennonite principles and tradition and the evangelical warmth of Pietism. Contrary to Mennonite Brethren practices he went so far as to recognize baptism by sprinkling or pouring (156 ff.) and stated that the Evangelische Mennoniten-Gemeinden "have found a way out for those who do not wish to be rebaptized and at the same time are not satisfied with the practices of the Mennonite Church [in Russia]. The Mennonite Brethren Church has [justly] lost the monopoly in the realm of being the 'church of believers'" (footnote 723).

There were also others who were not fully satisfied with the spiritual life and practices of the Mennonite Brethren and the Mennonite Church in Russia. The leadership of this group could be counted among the better educated. In a way this development among the Mennonites in Russia was duplicated among the Mennonites of the prairie states in America when in Henderson, Neb., and Mountain Lake, Minn., separate congregations were organized which later became known as the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren (q.v.). Although there was no direct connection between these two groups there was similarity not only in name but also in practice and emphasis. The Evangelische Mennoniten-Gemeinden have never had a large following, but have exerted a beneficial influence not only through their congregations, but also through groups of sympathizers, particularly regarding the relationship between the Mennonite and the Mennonite Brethren churches and their weaknesses. Members of the group that came to Canada after World War I organized originally as separate congregations and joined the Mennonite Brethren Church, while those going to Brazil joined the General Conference Mennonite Church, and only those of Paraguay have remained an independent group. Evangelische Stimmen, the title of a collection of sermons "for all Sundays and holidays. Published in co-operation with several Mennonite preachers by Johannes Molenaar" (q.v.). The first volume, published at Leipzig in 1844, contains six sermons: (1) an Advent sermon by Molenaar on Matt. 21:1-9; (2) for the second Advent Sunday by Jakob Mannhardt (q.v.) of Danzig on Mark 1:14, 15; (3) for the third Sunday of the Epiphany by Isaak Molenaar of Crefeld on Matt. 8:1-13; (4) for the fifth Sunday of the Epiphany by Jakob Ellenberger (q.v.) of Friedelsheim on Matt. 11:28-30; (5) for the first Sunday of the Trinity by J. de Liefde of Zutphen, Holland, on Acts 2:47; (6) and for the twenty-third Sunday of the Trinity by Johann Gottfried Lübkes of Neuwied on Phil. 3:17-21. Further volumes were presumably not published. (ML I, 616.) NEFF.

Evangelische Botschafter, Der, a 16-page monthly Mennonite periodical, 10 x 12 in., of which only one issue (2,500 copies), dated July 1, 1836, was published, edited by Heinrich Bertholet (1796-1853), printed by C. A. Pulte at Skippack, Pa. Bertholet, a preacher in the Mennonite (MC) congregation at Skippack, Franconia Conference, states the purpose of his paper under the following description of contents (translated):

"Der Evangelische Botschafter shall consist of two parts, the first of religious and the second of agricultural reading matter.

"In the first part special attention will be given to (a) consideration of divine subjects generally; (b) explanations and expositions of separate passages from the Bible, the Book of all wisdom; (c) information concerning the condition of the Mennonite congregations; (d) information concerning the condition of other religious bodies; (e) record of all marriages and deaths occurring in all Mennonite congregations so far as the information can be obtained.

"In the second part attention will be given to (a) articles of general interest in industrial pursuits; (b) articles on farm and garden work; (c) information relating to inventions and improvements along industrial lines in general and concerning farm and garden in particular; (d) information from the best authorities on the cultivation of the vine, silk, and tobacco; (e) miscellaneous subjects."

No reason is known for the discontinuance of the paper. This was the first attempt at a Mennonite periodical anywhere in the world. The first successful journal was John H. Oberholtzer's Religiöser Botschafter (GCM), established in 1852 at Milford Square, Pa., not far from Skippack, which has been continued under other names and publishers to the present. Since it used part of the name, it might in spirit be considered the successor to Bertholet's paper. H.S.B.

Evangelism, "spreading the Gospel," the outreach of the Christian Church to win unbelievers. For the outreach expressed in foreign missions and city missions see the relevant articles. Evangelism is to be distinguished from revivalism (q.v.), which refers to reviving indifferent or spiritually weakened members of the church, though in popular language in North America the term "revival" is often used indiscriminately to refer to evangelistic outreach as well. This latter confusion is due in part to the fact that at times evangelistic and revival efforts are combined in the same meeting or series of meetings in a congregation or community, and the joint effort called "revival." The problem of terminology is further confused by the fact that many American Mennonite congregations in various branches have come to have an annual series of meetings of a week or two in length, to serve both of the above purposes, and also to secure conversions of their own children. The common name given to such a series of meetings is "revival meetings," although "evangelistic services" is also not infrequently used, and at times the terms are used interchangeably to refer to the same thing. Usually a preacher is called in from the outside to conduct the meetings; he is almost always called "the evangelist," not "the revivalist," although his work may be, by nature of the local conditions, far more revivalistic than evangelistic. Some congregations try to have their Sunday evening services of an evangelistic nature, including the preaching of an evangelistic sermon. In some congregations evangelistic appeals (by which is meant appeals for unconverted persons to accept Christ as their personal Saviour) are made in the regular Sunday morning services. Personal work by individuals who seek to win others to Christ in personal conversation is often called personal evangelism. The term is used also for literature evangelism or tract evangelism, and radio evangelism. Visitation evangelism is used for house to house solicitation of commitments to Christ and church membership. Thus the term "evangelism" is used today for many and varied procedures, and can be used for any attempt to win men to Christ and church membership.

The Anabaptists were originally intensely evangelistic. Their only hope of expansion was by this method. Since they controlled no political units as the Reformers did, they had to win others. However, the main reason for their strong evangelistic program, as F. H. Littell has clearly shown, was their acceptance of the Great Commission of Christ as their action program. K. S. Latourette has pointed out that the Anabaptists were the only group in the Reformation period to carry out the Great Commission, and that the Free Churches have always been in the forefront of missionary and evangelistic action. The Reformers were not evangelistic (in the strict sense), partly because they adopted the principle of the territorial state church, and the principle that the ruler determines the religion of his people. Thus they were immobilized by political boundaries and the state church concept, whereas the Anabaptists had full mobility.

The records are full of accounts of the vigorous itinerant evangelism of the early Anabaptists. The Hutterian Brethren in particular had a magnificent record, sending their missionaries all over Germany, Austria, and Switzerland, often two by two, throughout the 16th century and later. The scaffold and the stake, indeed all scenes of execution, became evangelistic platforms. The evangelistic appeal of the death of the martyr and accompanying testimonies was so attractive that at some places the authorities forbade public executions, conducting them in private to avoid the undesired effects. Many individual evangelists could be named. One of the outstanding evangelists of Holland besides Menno Simons was Leenaert Bouwens (d. 1582), who baptized 10,378 persons in many different places from Meenen to Danzig, according to his diary. The Reformers could not understand men who left their families to engage in itinerant evangelism, as many Anabaptist missioners did, and vehemently condemned them for it.

Gradually, however, the persecutors won the upper hand. By countless imprisonments and executions the Anabaptist movement was throttled, and in many regions extinguished; the evangelistic fires died down. Those who were once flaming evangels and courageous missioners now became the Stillen im Lande, happy to be permitted merely to exist. In some areas the rulers permitted and even invited the Mennonite (Anabaptist) refugees to settle in their lands, with the distinct understanding that they were not to proselyte, that is, not to evangelize their neighbors. They were often not allowed to give public evidence of their presence as a religious group. They were forbidden to hold public services or to have church buildings, or if the latter were allowed, they were not to appear like religious edifices and could not have bells. In some places it was illegal for outsiders to join them. In 1780 Bishop J. Nafziger of Essingen in the Palatinate was fined 500 florins and exiled from the Palatinate because he dared to receive into his congregation two children of Mennonite parentage who wanted to return to the faith of their fathers after having been reared as Catholics.

By the mid-17th century the spirit of evangelism was completely extinguished in all Mennonite groups. It remained so everywhere until late in the 19th century, and still remains extinct in such groups in North America as the Old Order Amish, the Old Order Mennonites, and the Old Colony Mennonites. There has been little of the evangelistic spirit or outreach activity among Mennonites anywhere in Europe in modern times, although there are some evidences of it today in France, Switzerland, and a few places in South Germany. In Holland, as also in Crefeld and Emden (Northwest Germany), there have been many transfers in recent decades from the state church to the Mennonite churches, largely cases of persons of a liberal theological position seeking more congenial religious fellowship in the Mennonite brotherhood. This transfer movement can scarcely be called evangelism, however, since it is passive reception of transfers rather than aggressive solicitation of the individuals.

The institution of Reiseprediger (q.v., itinerant minister), which came into the South German groups about 75 years ago and somewhat later into France, West Prussia, and Russia (both M.B. and G.C.) and recently into Switzerland, has not been a case of evangelism, since the Reiseprediger is in effect an itinerant pastor, visiting scattered families and seeking to provide spiritual help to members of the church, particularly those in danger of falling away. However, some of the Reiseprediger, as well as some local pastors, having secured training at St. Chrischona (Basel, Switzerland) or certain other Bible schools in Germany, France, and Switzerland which fostered an evangelistic spirit, brought with them something of the spirit and practice of evangelism into their Mennonite congregations. Several of them, such as Christian Schnebele and Ulrich Hirschler of South Germany, have actually served as evangelists in such non-Mennonite organizations as the Tent Mission (Zeltmission) and the Pilgermission. Some congregations, such as Montbéliard in France and Ingolstadt in Bavaria, have conducted evangelistic services to reach their neighbors. In German-speaking areas such meetings are called Evangelisation. Recently J. B. Muller of Toul and Pierre Widmer of Montbéliard served as evangelists for the American Mennonite mission in Belgium.

According to Neff (ML I, 616), the outstanding South German evangelists, Elias Schrenk (d. 1911) and Jakob Vetter (d. 1919), as well as others, found entrance into Mennonite congregations in Switzerland, Württemberg, and the Palatinate. Vetter, in particular, exerted considerable influence.

In Russia German Baptists and Pietists (Eduard Wüst), Moravian Brethren, and English Plymouth Brethren of the evangelistic type about the middle of the 19th century visited certain Mennonite areas and scattered the seed of the evangelistic spirit there. B. Harder (q.v.) of Halbstadt was the most outstanding pulpit speaker and evangelist of the Mennonite Church in Russia. Jakob Quiring (Samara, died in New York) was also an outstanding evangelist in his younger years. The Mennonite Brethren arose (1860) to a large extent as the result of the Wüst revival and naturally perpetuated it more than did the main body of Russian Mennonites. The first recorded evangelistic outreach by a Mennonite among the Russian people was that by Johann J. Wieler (1839?-89) of the Mennonite Brethren, who had a thorough knowledge of both the Russian and German languages and served as a teacher in the Halbstadt Zentralschule 1879-83. Upon leaving the school he became a Reiseprediger and worked much among the Russians. As a result he was banished from Russia and went to Rumania, where he engaged in evangelistic work, establishing a congregation and where he lost his life accidentally in 1889 at the age of 50. Another early worker among the Russians was a certain Kalweit, also M.B., the grandfather of the Adolf Reimer mentioned in the next lines.

About 1906 a young M.B. schoolteacher, Adolf Reimer, dedicated himself completely to evangelism among the Russian people. He worked intensively throughout Russia, including St. Petersburg, until his death of typhus in 1924, reaching even the circles of the pietistic nobility in St. Petersburg. He edited a Russian Abreisskalender (block devotional calendar), which had extensive circulation. A. H. Unruh, founder of the Bible school at Tchongrav (Crimea) and later for many years a teacher in the M.B. Bible College in Winnipeg, did evangelistic work among the Russian people before 1914 and was at one time on this account imprisoned together with G. Froese, his lay co-worker. The Mennonite Brethren Conference began a public mission work among the Russians about 1905, which soon had to be stopped because of opposition by the government.

But regular support of evangelistic efforts among the Russians was continued privately by financial support of native Russian evangelists, a somewhat dangerous procedure. The treasurer of this secret fund was J. P. Isaak. The M.B. publishing house "Raduga" at Halbstadt promoted evangelistic effort among the Russians by the publication of evangelistic and devotional literature in the Russian language, particularly in connection with the Russian preacher Prokhanov of the Russian Evangelical group.

The Mariental M.B. Church in Alt-Samara developed direct evangelistic work among the native Russian population of its environment beginning about 1914, first in the Russian village of Koshki, where a meetinghouse was secured. Jakob Hein was a regular worker living in the village from 1917 until his death in 1921. There were converts, but the work was given up when no further regular workers could be provided. In 1920 work was begun among the Mordvins with good results. In 1924 work was begun among the Russian population in the cities of Samara and Simbirsk with excellent results. Both the above mission efforts were in operation in 1925, according to a report published in Unser Blatt in December of that year.

A notable chapter in Russian Mennonite evangelism is the mission to the pagan Ostyaks in (Khants) Siberia along the Ob River in a territory beginning about 300 miles north of Tomsk. Johann J. Peters of Orenburg, a graduate of a Bible school (J. Warns) in Berlin, began the work independently in loose connection with Karl Benzien. In the spring of 1928, ten years later, it was still in operation. In the intervening period Peters was joined by other volunteer workers, most of whom settled among the Ostyaks as families and supported themselves, although there was also support from the churches. Most of the workers came from the Slavgorod settlement in Siberia. Numerous reports in Unser Blatt 1925-28 show that there were converts and that Christian communities were established. (See Ob Mission.)

Mention should also be made of the brief activity of the Tent Evangelism work in Russia under the leadership of Jakob J. Dyck (1890-1919). Dyck, a former student in Berlin (J. Warns), while in Moscow serving as an army Red Cross worker (Sanitäter) joined a Christian Soldiers' Association (mostly Mennonites) in 1917, which was active in personal evangelistic work in the city. The association purchased a tent, and a number of members, among them Dyck, started tent evangelism among the native population in Central Russia. In June 1919, 24 men and women, most of them Mennonites, were consecrated to the work of tent evangelism in the Rückenau (Molotschna) Mennonite Brethren Church. The headquarters for the work was established at Panyutino about six miles from Losovaya. Shortly thereafter Dyck and four associates, who were conducting evangelistic meetings in Dubovka-Eichenfeld, were murdered in the attack on the village by the Machno bandits.

Jakob Kroeker (1872-1948), one of the ablest preachers produced by the Russian Mennonites (M.B. group), trained in the Baptist Seminary in Hamburg, became a Reiseprediger, traveling far and wide, cofounder of Raduga, friend of the pietistic nobility in St. Petersburg, influenced much by the German evangelist Baedeker and associates, moved to Germany in 1910, was cofounder with Pastor Jack of the mission for evangelization of Russians living in Germany and still more in Russia proper, known as Licht dem Osten (Wernigerode a.H.). This organization did a great work among the Russians by training and sending out workers, publishing a Bible concordance in Russian, as well as other religious literature, distribution of Russian Bibles, etc. Licht im Osten had many supporters among the Russian and German Mennonites, and occasional Mennonite workers, such as Jakob Dyck, continued (1954) in the service of the organization.

Two factors have contributed to inhibit the development of evangelism among the Mennonites of Europe: (1) the tradition of withdrawal and introversion plus a certain amount, no doubt, of inferiority feeling, the Stillen im Lande attitude, and (2) the general immobility and static condition of European religious attitudes. Because of the deeply set cultural patterns, the feeling in Europe is widespread that one is born into a religious group and ought not to change, and ought not to be solicited to change, even though the religious connections may be very tenuous and remote. Most of the population, up to 95-98 per cent, has actually been baptized into some religious confessional group. In line with this, particularly in Germany, Mennonites are inclined to look askance upon inquirers, and to discourage them from entering the Mennonite fellowship. Many such inquirers, most of them certainly sincere, approached Mennonite pastors during the time of the great postwar Mennonite relief work in Germany (1946-54) with its accompanying widespread favorable publicity, some being attracted also by the peace testimony of the relief workers. An alert evangelistic spirit might have led at least to the establishment of a number of evangelistic centers and possibly the creation of new local Mennonite fellowships. American Mennonites hesitated to step in but considered the possibility seriously when they saw that the German Mennonites for one reason or another did not move. Some contacts were actually established by MCC workers, especially with student and youth groups, such as at the University of Mainz and at the MCC centers at Frankfurt, Vienna, Salzburg, Berlin, and the Espelkamp reconstruction unit. In some places, such as Vienna, direct invitations and encouragement were given by local Protestant leaders for the establishment of permanent Mennonite work. Several representatives of the M.B. group were sent to Europe, particularly to Germany and Austria, on evangelistic preaching missions. M.B. churches have been established at Neuwied and Linz.

The Conservative Amish Mennonites have established a work at Espelkamp. In 1954 the Swiss Mennonite Conference, with an MCC subsidy, took over the opening established by the MCC in Vienna. Mennonite (MC) evangelistic centers have been established in Brussels and Paris, with the co-operation of the French-speaking Mennonites (a French-American advisory committee has been created), as well as in London and at Esch, Luxembourg. Incidentally, and almost by chance, a small work (MC) has been begun at Palermo, Sicily. Plans had been considered for opening a Mennonite work in Poland as a follow-up to relief work there, but the expulsion of the Mennonite workers in May 1950 by the government negated these hopes. The full import of the evangelistic impact of the testimony of the Mennonite relief work in Europe 1946-56 (and continuing) remains to be seen.

The Mennonite immigrants to America at all stages and locations before the coming of the Russian Mennonites 1873 ff. brought with them the Stillen im Lande spirit, happy simply to find freedom and peace. They devoted themselves vigorously and successfully to carving homes out of the wilderness and establishing traditional Mennonite congregations, but they undertook no evangelistic work among the American Indians (as did the Moravians, for instance) and did not share in the various religious awakenings and revivals from the Great Awakening of 1734-44 on down, even rejecting these influences and at times expelling those who accepted the new methods and new piety. Witness Bishop Martin Boehm of Lancaster Co., Pa., who was expelled in 1770 to become a cofounder with Otterbein of the new United Brethren Church in 1803. (W. W. Sweet's assertion in his Revivalism in America that the Great Awakening of 1734, which began in New Jersey, was sparked by Mennonites along with Theodore Frelinghuysen and Gilbert Tennent, is incomprehensible and without documentary proof.) The small group of German Pietists led by Alexander Mack, who came to Pennsylvania in 1719-22 (now called Church of the Brethren), by contrast to the Mennonites, was aggressively evangelistic, and as a result increased rapidly in membership, even winning many Mennonites.

The spirit of evangelism finally penetrated the older Mennonites east of the Mississippi in the 1880's and following, coming from the outside—largely through the aggressive work of the American Sunday School Union and the frontier evangelism of the Methodists, Baptists, United Brethren, and similar groups, with whom they often came into close contact. The evangelistic revivalism of Charles G. Finney (beginning in 1837) and more especially of D. L. Moody, 1870-1900, and his successors, had probably still greater influence. But the old inhibitions were still powerful. The tensions stirred up by the new spirit led to the schism of the Evangelical Mennonites (q.v.) in 1858 in Pennsylvania and the Menonite Brethren in Christ (q.v.) in 1874-75 in Indiana (Daniel Brenneman, q.v.), in Ontario 1870 ff. (Solomon Eby, q.v.), and elsewhere. Meanwhile, in the old church (MC) the ferment grew, and J. S. Coffman (q.v.) introduced the spirit and method of evangelism (also revivalism) 1879 ff. He was followed by others. A Mennonite (MC) Evangelizing Committee (q.v.) was organized at Elkhart, Ind., in 1882, followed by a Mennonite Evangelizing and Benevolent Board (q.v.) in 1892, the forerunner of the Mission Board of 1905. City missions (q.v.), beginning with Chicago in 1893, were a definite fruit of the new spirit. Evangelism was definitely established and recognized as a church function and responsibility by 1910 and came into its own in overwhelming force after World War II. At present this group (MC) has over 250 evangelistic mission outposts, plus additional mission Sunday schools, many in the immediate vicinity of the base congregations, others in faraway Vermont, Alabama, northern Minnesota, northern Michigan, northern Alberta, northern Ontario, and Kentucky. A similar outreach has developed in Negro missions, Jewish missions, radio evangelism, colonization evangelism, and a large tract distribution program. The effectiveness of these extensive efforts remains to be seen, but they are a testimony to a widespread and powerful interest in evangelistic outreach, indicating that the group has fully accepted the evangelistic responsibility and discarded the Stillen im Lande spirit. The sense of mission that was lost for almost three centuries has returned.

Similar developments, though not so extensive, have taken place in other North American Mennonite groups. In some groups persistence in maintaining the German language has continued to be a severe practical block, as well as an internal inhibition to evangelistic advance. Distinctive patterns of Mennonite behavior and custom have often interfered with evangelistic effectiveness, at times to the great frustration of those in the front line of evangelistic effort. Actual net gains of outside converts have often been small.

A striking exception to the above pattern has been the Mennonite Brethren in Christ—United Missionary Church. Founded (1874-83) by leaders with a strong evangelistic emphasis, such as Daniel Brenneman, Solomon Eby, and William Gehman (q.v.), this group has grown largely by evangelism among non-Mennonites in all areas. This is notably true of its Michigan Conference, which today has 2,000 members, won almost wholly in non-Mennonite territory. One of the outstanding early evangelists was Eusebius Hershey (q.v., 1823-91) of Pennsylvania, who spent 43 years in evangelistic work mostly among non-Mennonites in eastern United States and Canada before going abroad as the first foreign missionary (1890) from any Mennonite group in the United States. Another was Andrew Good (q.v., 1838-1918), who traveled over 200,000 miles preaching in nearly every state in the Union, also making 20 trips to Ontario. The first evangelist in Ontario was Noah Detwiler, who spent 12 years in evangelistic work in Ontario besides working in Pennsylvania and Kansas. Numerous men have served as full-time or part-time evangelists for periods of 20-40 years. The evangelistic work of this denomination has up to recent times far exceeded that of any other Mennonite group. It was the first group in North America to operate a city mission, opening its Grand Rapids, Mich., mission in 1884. All the group's city missions, over 100, were founded as evangelistic centers and have been used to build up churches from the non-Mennonite sources. A major method of evangelism used by the M.B.C.-U.M.C. group is the "camp meeting," a method taken over from the Methodists. The first such meeting was held in 1880, and every district conference of the church has sponsored such a meeting annually for many years. Of the two goals of these meetings, revival and evangelism, the latter has always been the predominant one. A high percentage of the members of any typical congregation would be found to have been converted at a camp meeting.

Part of the Mennonite groups who came from Russia to the United States 1873 ff. brought with them an awakened mission and evangelistic interest, resulting from their support of the Dutch Mennonite mission work in Java, as well as influences from Moravian, Baptist, and pietistic sources. This, fortified in America in the case of the General Conference group by an awakened spirit in the Oberholtzer group, the urge of the immigrant groups from the Palatinate, and the Wadsworth school, led to a strong work in 1880 ff. among the American Indians in Oklahoma and Arizona (later in Montana) by the G.C.M. group, and by the M.B. group among the American Indians, certain Volga Russian immigrant groups in the Dakota region and elsewhere, and among the Mexicans in Texas. It did not produce a corresponding outreach in city missions or rural missions in either group. Of the smaller groups the Evangelical Mennonites, the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, and the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren have shown a strong evangelistic spirit. The Missionary Church Association (q.v.) which branched off from the Defenseless Mennonites in 1898 has been very strongly evangelistic from the start and has grown very largely by evangelism among out-group persons. After World War I, evangelistic work among the Mexicans living in the United States developed, with the Mennonite Church (MC) working in Chicago, Colorado, and Texas, the Mennonite Brethren group in Texas, and the Church of God in Christ Mennonites in Mexico and in New Mexico. The latter group also began work among the Indians in Arizona and also in Alberta.

With the evangelistic emphasis, especially in the M.B.C. and M.C. groups, a class of workers arose known as "evangelists." This consisted largely of preachers or pastors who gave much of their time to evangelistic meetings in Mennonite congregations. But few of these became full professional evangelists giving all their time to such work as was customary in other larger churches except in the Mennonite Brethren in Christ group. After World War II mass evangelism developed in the M.C. group, Geo. R. Brunk, Jr. (q.v.), Howard Hammer, and Myron Augsburger outstanding in this work. This type of work is marked by the use of large tents holding 2,000-6,000 persons, and extended community-wide campaigns of 3-6 weeks in a location. It remains to be seen whether this type of work is more a revival effort among Mennonites, or a real evangelistic outreach to unbelievers. So far (1956) it has remained largely the former.

With the development of the evangelistic spirit and activity has often come, particularly in North America, a change in type of piety in the direction of a warmer, more expressive, more verbalized spirituality, and an emphasis upon crisis conversion, together with some change in theological emphasis in the direction of more attention upon conversion and status, rather than ethics and discipleship. These subtle changes have as yet not been fully studied nor evaluated. Influences of other kinds have also come to bear upon Mennonites of various groups, from the same sources that have brought evangelistic influences, often from the Bible institutes and Bible schools where numerous Mennonites have secured training, and which are usually quite evangelistic. This influence includes not only new methods of church work and a considerable emotionalism, but also such doctrines as eternal security, second work of grace, and millennialism. Thus the movement for evangelistic activization has been accompanied by significant side-effects and related changes. In the major groups, and some of the minor ones as well, these changes have produced a significantly different Mennonitism.

A recent development is "Child Evangelism," an outside movement which has won considerable support in certain areas. This movement attempts evangelistic methods similar to those used with adults on children as low as 3-4 years of age, regularly on all children below 8, claiming that they are lost sinners and must be regenerated before any Christian nurture can be given. Its theology is strongly Calvinistic; its basic theory denies the age-old Mennonite doctrine that all children are saved by Christ's atonement before the age of accountability and that conversion cannot take place before that age is reached, which is normally the age of puberty. A strong reaction is, however, developing against this movement as its theological errors and psychological and educational faults are uncovered. Acceptance of the basic thesis and method of this movement would destroy the very foundation of the Mennonite concept of adult baptism, a responsible believers' church, and discipleship. H.S.B.

Evangeliums Panier. This was the German issue of the Gospel Banner and was first published by the United Mennonite Church (now the United Missionary Church) at Goshen, Ind., in January 1879 with Daniel Brenneman as editor, 1879-82. Succeeding editors were Timothy Brenneman, November 1882 to April 1885; Joseph Bingeman, April to October 1885; J. B. Detweiler, 1885-88; and H. S. Hallman, 1888-95(?).

After a year as an 8-page monthly publication, 10½ x 13½ in., it was enlarged to a semimonthly, 10½ x 15½ in., in January 1880, and further increased in 1885 to 16 pages, 8¾ x 11½ in. In 1880 the publishing of the paper was transferred from Indiana to Berlin (now Kitchener), Ont. In 1893, however, with the decline of the use of the German language in the church, it was reduced to eight pages, and was finally discontinued in 1895 (?). E.R.S.

Eveleens, a Dutch Mennonite family, found at Aalsmeer (q.v.), North Holland, since about 1600, whose numerous members through more than three centuries belonged to the Mennonite church, and of whom a large number are still found among the Mennonites of the Aalsmeer congregation, where the name is very common. Dirk Eveleens was a preacher and elder of the Oude vermaning (Old Frisian congregation) on the Uiterweg, until this congregation merged in 1866 with the Zijdweg congregation. vdZ.

Everling (Eberling, Eberlin, Everlin, Everlinck), Jakob, an elder in the Obersülzen (q.v.) church in the Palatinate, who lived in the second half of the 17th century and was deeply concerned for the oppressed circumstances of his brethren.

On Nov. 2, 1671, he informed Hans Vlamingh (q.v.) at Amsterdam of the arrival of a number of Swiss Mennonite emigrants to the Palatinate (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1405). On Jan. 4, 1672, he wrote another letter to the Amsterdam congregation, with further information about the refugees settling in Obersülzen (ibid., No. 1248). Thereupon the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs sent a large sum of money to support these immigrants, and later another sum (11,000 guilders), which was distributed by Everling and others. They gave their report in a letter (ibid., No. 1198) signed by Jacob Everling, Johann Krämer, Valentin Huthwol, and Heinrich Kosel. This letter (undated, 1695 or 1696) shows that Everling, of whom nothing more is known, was still living at that date. In a letter of May 16, 1672 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1417), he wrote that he could not recognize the Dutch Mennonites as brethren because they admitted marriages with nonmembers of the church. Furthermore he declared himself satisfied by their letter which had informed him that they were Biblical in the doctrine of satisfaction, and that they did not admit to the communion persons who had not been baptized. NEFF, vdZ.

Mart. Mir. D does not list him; E 1125-27 gives extracts of his letters; Müller, Berner Täufer, 195; ML I, 616.

Evert Aerts of Utrecht, a maker of knives, executed as an Anabaptist on May 14, 1535, at Amsterdam, along with nine others. He was one of the revolutionary group who joined Jan van Geelen (q.v.) to attack the city of Amsterdam (May 10-11, 1535). (Grosheide, Verhooren, 62 f.) vdZ.

Evert Hendricks (Naeldenverkooper) was a native of Warendorf, Westphalia, Germany. This Anabaptist martyr, who was a clothmaker, was apprehended in Amsterdam. He confessed that he had been rebaptized about 1565 at Veere, Dutch province of Zeeland. He had traveled widely in his business, disseminating his Anabaptist opinions. In Emden he had bought some Mennonite books, to sell them elsewhere. Among those books were the Offerboek, by which must have been meant the Offer des Heeren (q.v.), and a small Gospel-book and a Concordance. He also confessed that he had been married in Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland, according to Mennonite customs (op der Mennonieten maniere). This means that a Mennonite minister had performed his marriage in a meeting of the congregation. He also admitted that a Mennonite meeting had been held in his house at Amsterdam two months previously (March or April 1572). On June 20, 1572, he was sentenced to death, but the execution for some reason or other was delayed until Sept. 3, 1572, when he was burned at the stake with Sander Woutersz (q.v.) at Amsterdam. Evert and Sander were the last victims of persecution in Amsterdam. (Grosheide, Bijdrage, 184-85, 308; Mart. Mir. D 620, E 944; ML I, 616.) vdZ.

Evert Jans, a cobbler of Coesfeld in the district of Münster, Westphalia, Germany, who was living in Amsterdam, was one of the first Anabaptists of the Netherlands. He was arrested in Amsterdam and on Dec. 5, 1531, beheaded at The Hague together with nine other Anabaptists, including Jan Volkertsz Trypmaker (q.v.). They all renounced their faith and for this reason were not included in the Dutch martyrbooks. (Grosheide, Bijdrage, 50, 302; DB 1917, 159.) vdZ.

Evert Nouts, a Dutch Anabaptist taken prisoner at Rotterdam in February 1558 together with some other members of the congregation. During his trial on Feb. 28 he confessed that he had been baptized more than three years ago at Antwerp, Belgium, by Gillis van Aken (q.v.) and that he had lived at Rotterdam for about three months. He was about 27 years of age. He was sentenced to death on March 28, 1558, with four other Mennonites. On the day set for the execution, when the victims had been brought up to the scaffold and one of them, Jan Hendricks (q.v.), had already been strangled, an insurrection arose among the spectators. During this riot the victims, including Evert Nouts, were liberated by the insurgents. Nothing further is known about him. (Mart. Mir. D 191-94, E 574-77; DB 1905, 172; ML III, 277.) vdZ.

Everts, Dirk, separated from the Waterlander Toren congregation at Amsterdam in 1616 with a number of adherents to form the congregation of the "Afgedeelden" (q.v.), which apparently shortly after 1630 joined the United Frisian and High German group at Amsterdam. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1201-3.) vdZ.

Evertsz, Jan, a preacher of the United Mennonite congregation at Haarlem, Holland, meeting at den Blok on the Klein Heiligland. In 1670, when this congregation was divided into a Lamist (q.v.) and a more conservative Zonist (q.v.) group, Evertsz joined the latter. In 1680 a schism arose in this Zonist group between Jan Evertsz and Thomas Snep

(q.v.). In 1685 Thomas Snep left the Zonist group with the majority of the members, leaving behind a small number, of whom Jan Evertsz was the leader. Evertsz, who is said in his youth to have been a Catholic, was very conservative, and a violent antagonist of marriages outside of the congregation, and of audible prayer, which he rejected as an undesirable innovation. In 1658 he published Kort en bondig Bewijs, dat Dr Galenus Abrahamsz ende David Spruyt hebben een verkeert en verleydelijck Verstant, . . . (n.p.). (DB 1863, 137, 144-51.)

Ewert (Ewertz, Ewerts, Evert, Ebert, Efert), a Mennonite family name of Frisian-Dutch descent, frequently found in West Prussia. This name is a patronymic of Evert (Dutch Christian name) and may formerly have been Everts or Ewerts. In West Prussia the members of this family all belonged to the more progressive Frisian or Waterlander wing. It was first mentioned at Danzig in 1572, and Montau in 1605. Thies Evert (Ewert) was a preacher of the congregation of Dannenberg (q.v.), Lithuania, at the time when this church was expelled from Lithuania; most of them moved to the vicinity of Elbing in West Prussia (1731). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1583.)

Gillis (Gils) Evert (Ewert) was a minister of the Dannenberg congregation; he migrated to the Netherlands in 1732 and was aided by the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs to a farm on the island of Walcheren, Zeeland (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 2095-96). He gave much trouble to the Committee, and the Amsterdam Archives contain a large number of his letters, full of complaints and reproaches (Inv. Arch. Amst. I; the most important are Nos. 2041, 2043, 2045, 2129, 2137, 2180, 2192, 2209-10). In 1739 he went back to Prussia, and with the financial aid of the Dutch Committee obtained a small farm there (ibid., No. 1675) and served the (Frisian) congregation of the Kleine Werder in the territory of Elbing until at least 1755.

The Dutch Naamlijst 1743-1802 names a number of members of this family who served as preachers in several Prussian churches. Hans Ewert was an elder of the Frisian (also called Waterlander) congregation of Schwyngrube in de Stuumsche Needering 1755-76 (?), later Tragheimerweide. Other preachers of this family who served the same congregation were Gillis Ewert (d. about 1760), Jacob Ewert serving 1776-1800, also as elder, and another Jacob Ewert from 1795. Andries (Andreas) Ewert is mentioned as a preacher of the Waterlander Lithuanian congregation about 1750.

Members of this family migrated to Poland, Russia (Molotschna settlement) and America. Among the better-known members of the family were Elder Wilhelm Ewert (q.v.), a delegate to America in 1873 and an emigration leader; Gerhard Ewert of Gross Lunau, Prussia, author of Sieben Betrachtungen des andächtigen Pilgers auf dem Wege gen Zion (Graudenz, 1843, 130 pp.); Henry H. Ewert (q.v.), son of Wilhelm, educator in Manitoba; Wm. J. Ewert (q.v.), elder of the Brudertal Mennonite Church; Benjamin Ewert, leader in the General Conference of Mennonites in Canada, and Bruno Ewert, the last elder of the Heubuden congregation in West Prussia and later minister in the Montevideo, Uruguay, congregation, and Jacob G. Ewert (q.v.) of Hillsboro, Kan.

Ewert, Henry H., a Mennonite (GCM) minister and educator, b. April 12, 1855, at Nessau near Thorn, West Prussia, the oldest of 12 children born to Wilhelm and Anna Janz Ewert. In the spring of 1874 he with his parents migrated to Kansas, settling near Hillsboro. On Aug. 20, 1882, he married Lizzie K. Baer of Summerfield, Ill., and after her death Mrs. Katie Kruse (nee Krehbiel) in 1926.

Ewert received his elementary and intermediate education at Thorn. In Kansas he attended the state normal school at Emporia 1878-79. Later he studied at the Des Moines Institute, Des Moines, Iowa, and took a two-year theology course at Marthasville, Mo.

Soon after arriving in Kansas and obtaining the necessary preparation, Ewert taught school for a few years in his home district. In 1882 he became teacher and principal of a Mennonite parochial school at Alexanderwohl, Kan. In 1883 this school, sponsored by the Kansas Mennonite Conference, was transferred to Halstead, Kan., to be continued as a conference school, under the name of Mennonite Seminary. Here H. H. Ewert continued to be teacher and principal for nine years (1883-91). In 1884 he was ordained as conference minister and preached in different churches. He organized the Kansas Sunday School Convention.

In 1891 H. H. Ewert came, upon invitation, to Manitoba, to take over the schoolwork here among the Mennonites of this province. Here he was appointed school inspector of Mennonite schools by the government and engaged as teacher and principal of the newly established parochial Mennonite school at Gretna, Man., which was at first named Gretna Normal School, then Mennonite Educational Institute, and later changed to Mennonite Collegiate Institute. In the latter capacity he was active 43 years. He died on Dec. 29, 1934, at the age of nearly 80 years, and was interred in Gretna.

H. H. Ewert was deeply interested in educational and religious matters, in church and conference undertakings among Mennonites in Manitoba and also at large, including Sunday schools, teachers' conventions, church conferences, and other benevolent organizations and establishments. He was organizer of the General Conference of Mennonites in Canada.

H. H. Ewert did not publish any books but wrote many articles for publication in Mennonite church papers, and some pamphlets. Among the pamphlets may especially be mentioned an address given by him under the auspices of the Historical and Scientific Society of Manitoba in Winnipeg in 1932, on the topic, "The Mennonites," which has been published in both English and German. He also edited a monthly German church paper, Der Mitarbeiter (q.v.), for 28 years.†

Ewert, Jacob G., was born Nov. 24, 1874, in Markoviziane, Poland. His father, Gerhard J. Ewert, emigrated to Kansas with his family in 1882, and was one of the 39 charter members of the First Mennonite Church in Hillsboro when this was organized in 1885. He lived there the rest of his life.

Due to financial difficulties Jacob Ewert was unable to get a well-rounded formal education, but being apparently of more than average talent and certainly a man of will power he got his teacher's certificate and taught in the Kansas public schools, intermittently studying at Bethel College. It was here in 1897 that rheumatism struck him, paralyzing him to such an extent that only an arm and a shoulder remained free to move. He even had to be fed through a tube. He thus spent over 26 years in bed, cared for by his brother David (1878-1924), himself also an invalid. However, Jacob Ewert continued his studies in bed, gaining a fair reading knowledge of several modern European languages as well as Hebrew, Latin, and Greek, which he taught to students of Tabor College who came to him for instruction. He also made a contribution to Wenig's Wörterbuch, a dictionary published in Germany.

He was also active in journalism, coediting for several years the German monthly Vorwärts, published in Hillsboro, writing the column "Gegenwärtige Aussichten." He was much in sympathy with the socialistic views of the times and wrote among other pamphlets one entitled Christentum und Sozialismus.

Being an ardent pacifist, it became his work to advise many young men drafted into the country's services during World War I. In the interests of pacifism he also translated the correspondence between Count Leo Tolstoy and the American pacifist Adin Ballou, published by Lewis G. Wilson in Arena.

Due to the active interest he took in prohibition, he was elected secretary of the Prohibition Movement in Kansas, which position he held for several years. In the interests of this movement he wrote Die Bibel und die Enthaltsamkeitslehre, published by the Christliche Mässigkeitsverein (Berne, Ind.).

Possibly his greatest efforts went into the relief work in Europe, especially Russia, after World War I. He wrote untiringly in the various Mennonite papers in its interests, and considerable sums of money were entrusted to him to help feed the hungry abroad. The records show some $89,000 passing through his books. He died March 16, 1923. (Vorwärts-Kalender, 1925, Hillsboro, Kan.; ML I, 617.) NEFF, J.W.N.

Ewert, Peter, a member of the Kicin (q.v., Poland) Mennonite Church, was instrumental in taking the congregation into the Baptist Church. Johann Penner, a Mennonite at Adamov who had joined the Baptists, visited his relatives at Kicin in 1855 and spread Baptist ideas among members of the Mennonite congregation. In July 1860, G. F. Alf (q.v.), the Baptist evangelist of Poland, visited Kicin and conducted meetings at the home of Peter Ewert. Ewert and others were baptized by immersion, and Johann Penner ordained Ewert as minister. Thus the Kicin Mennonite Church merged with the local Baptists, mostly of Lutheran background.

Soon some difficulty arose on the principle of nonresistance, which was unknown to the Baptists, but which the Mennonites wanted to maintain, and on the practice of footwashing and baptism. Peter Ewert carried on a lively correspondence regarding these questions with Alf (q.v.) and with Mennonite Brethren in Russia (Friesen, 244). According to Kupsch, Ewert and Penner with the Mennonite-Baptists went their own way for a while, but finally merged with the Baptists again. "Ewert recognized his error, repented and came back to the Baptists, and became a missionary. Penner also returned to the Baptists in 1863." C.K.

Ewert, Wilhelm, a Mennonite elder and leader, b. Feb. 23, 1829, at Stronske, Thorn, Prussia, d. June 21, 1887, near Hillsboro, Kan., was the youngest son of Peter and Maria Ewert. He attended a secondary school in Thorn, and learned carpentry. On May 30, 1854, he married Anna Janz, a daughter of Cornelius and Sarah Janz. Of the 13 children, only 6 outlived their father.

In 1843 Ewert was baptized by Elder David Adrian of the Ober-Nessau Mennonite Church (q.v.), which elected him as minister in 1860 and as elder in 1868. When the West Prussian Mennonites were in danger of losing their principle of nonresistance because of the compromise accepted by most of the West Prussians following the order of cabinet of 1867, he was active in finding a country which would honor their convictions. In 1870 he and Peter Dyck visited Russia to investigate settlement possibilities. When they saw that the Mennonites in Russia were confronted by the same problem, they directed their attention to America. Again Ewert was one of the delegates who investigated the prairie states and provinces.

In the spring of 1874 Ewert and his family and a few families of his congregation settled in Marion Co., Kan., joining with a group of Mennonites from Russia to found the Brudertal Mennonite Church (q.v.) the same year. Ewert was the first elder. He at once became active in community and conference activities and was one of the great promoters of elementary and secondary education, and particularly of Bethel College. He was always generous in aiding needy individuals and groups financially and spiritually. He was succeeded as elder by his son William J. Ewert (q.v.). Another son, H. H. Ewert (q.v.), was the well-known teacher of Halstead Seminary and Gretna Collegiate Institute. C.K.

Ewert, William J., second son of Elder Wilhelm Ewert and Maria Thiart, was born May 22, 1856, in West Prussia. He died April 5, 1928, in Kansas. He was married to Ernstine Dirks Sept. 6, 1889. To them were born seven children. He received his education in Prussia. In 1874 at the age of 18 he came with his parents from Prussia, settled in Marion Co., Kan., and became a member of the Brudertal Mennonite Church of that locality, of which he was elected a minister. On Nov. 22, 1891, he was elected elder (bishop) of this church, and ordained to this position Jan. 24, 1892, which position he kept to the time of his death. Besides being a farmer, he was also interested and employed in publication and conference work, in which he acted as secretary. B.E.

Ewsum, Christoffer van, b. 1523, d. April 9, 1583, a nobleman of a wealthy and influential family of Groningen, Netherlands, who had extensive landholdings there. Through his marriage to Margaretha, a daughter of Ulrich van Dornum, of Oldersum, East Friesland (which could not have taken place in 1536 as stated ML I, 617, but is known to have occurred by 1551), he not only acquired additional properties but also a unique spiritual heritage. Ulrich van Dornum (q.v.) was a stanch promoter of the Reformation with special connections with men like Karlstadt. Even Melchior Hofmann and Menno Simons are thought to have found refuge on his estates. A younger daughter married a follower of Menno Simons.

Christoffer van Ewsum lived in the Asingaburg near Baflo and also had possessions in Middelstum, where the family castle was located. Here Menno Simons must occasionally have found shelter. On May 15, 1551, the chancellor of Gelderland reported to the imperial representative at Groningen that Menno Simons was staying with Christoffer van Ewsum. Van Ewsum himself was expelled from Groningen by Alba. When the ban was repeated on Jan. 10, 1570, he was referred to as a "Mennonist." A Reformed relative of Margaretha and her sister left some inheritance for them, provided they would "purge" themselves of "heresy."

This does, however, not justify the assumption that Christoffer van Ewsum and his wife were full-fledged followers of Menno Simons or Anabaptists. Van Ewsum was also a supporter of the Reformed Church at Emden, a friend of Johann a Lasco, and a "benefactor and protector of pious refugees" (Reformed). He had a large library, which was used by the well-known historian, Hermann Hamelmann. In a statement of August 1569 he said that he had lived in East Friesland during the last 17 years, having possessions at Emden and Jennelt. To what an extent the Mennonites had a protector in him here is not known. C.K.

Excommunication, Procedure and Grounds. The doctrine and theory of discipline behind the practice of excommunication is discussed in the articles Ban and Discipline; here only the procedure and grounds will be treated. (The corresponding German term is Ausschluss aus der Gemeinde.)

Excommunication is here taken to mean the exclusion of the offender from all church fellowship. In the Catholic churches, both Roman and Greek, excommunication has been maintained uninterruptedly, administered by the bishop (or the pope or papal legate). The grounds and procedure are specified in the canon law, but the bishop is authorized to exercise his judgment in cases not covered by the law. The chief grounds are heresy, i.e., deviation from the dogma of the church, and any persistent defiance of the authority of the church or disobedience of its regulations. In medieval and later times the state was expected to and did join in the punishment of the offender by civil penalties, including the death penalty for heresy and blasphemy. The Reformers continued excommunication in a modified form, including the participation of the state in punishment. Gradually, however, the practice died out in the Protestant state churches and by the 17th century was practically extinct, except in certain Calvinistic countries, particularly in Scotland, and in colonial America. Today excommunication is almost unknown among the major Protestant bodies, except for cases of bold heresy by the clergy in certain groups such as the Episcopal Church and the Presbyterian Church, which have had some noted heresy trials in the 20th century. In such cases the decision is made by regularly constituted church courts and according to church law. The smaller and stricter Protestant churches in America have largely retained excommunication as a major aspect of discipline.

Excommunication was practiced from the very beginning by Anabaptists and Mennonites, and has been retained down to the present time in all groups which have retained discipline, which includes all but the Dutch Mennonites and Northwest German city churches. The power of excommunication has generally resided in the office of bishop or elder acting in the name of the congregation. The exercise of the power was customarily subject to an approving vote of the congregation, as it still is among the Mennonite Brethren and the Amish. The bishop, in consultation with the ministry of his congregation, presented the case to the congregation, stating the offense, and after an approving vote, pronounced the formula of excommunication. In some Mennonite (MC) churches more recently the bishop has the authority to excommunicate without a vote of the congregation. In some groups (e.g., G.C.M.) the decision as to excommunication (like admission to membership) is made by the church council or some representative group rather than by the pastor or responsible leader of the church. Restoration of the excommunicated member was and is possible usually only after a lapse of time upon repentance and confession. In the stricter groups, e.g., the Mennonite Church (MC) and the Amish, excommunicated members are received back into membership "from their knees," that is, they kneel to make confession and renew their vows, and are then given the right hand of fellowship and asked to rise just as in the case of baptism. Often a lapse of time, such as a month, is required before restoration.

The grounds for excommunication have always included both heretical doctrine and misconduct. The latter has included not only gross and flagrant sin but also disobedience to the regulations of the church, including a variety of points depending upon the character of the congregational or conference regulations. At various times and places the following have been (and still are) grounds: immorality in any form, theft, lying, etc., drinking of alcoholic beverages or drunkenness, smoking tobacco, attendance at theaters (including motion pictures), gambling and card playing, military service and training, unethical economic practices including taking advantage of bankruptcy laws, wearing of jewelry and fashionable attire, violation of the requirements of uniform costume, etc. An earlier universal ground was intermarriage with "outsiders," often even with those of other Mennonite branches; it is still the rule in a number of the more conservative groups, even in the Bergthal district of the Canadian G.C.M. Conference which excommunicates for marriage to any non-G.C.M. member. The rigid groups, such as Amish and the Old Colony Mennonites, have excommunicated for the use of modern inventions and conveniences, such as automobiles, electricity and electrical appliances, telephones, floor carpets, wall pictures, photography, etc. At times excommunication has been applied to schismatic leaders and even whole groups, and the threat of excommunication has been used to maintain control and to ward off incipient schisms or the appeals of internal or outside leaders for followers. In some cases bishops or elders, abusing their power, have high-handedly excommunicated personal enemies or have excommunicated for very minor infractions of rules or personal interpretations of them. More than one schism, especially in Holland in earlier times, has been wholly or partially caused by such actions. Occasionally assertions have been made to the effect that the early Anabaptists or Mennonites tolerated freedom of doctrine. This is clearly contradicted by the actual excommunications for heresy.

An excommunication formula developed, probably by tradition, which ultimately was printed in the ministers' manuals, or handed down in manuscript form as among the Amish. A typical formula is that printed in the Allgemeines und vollständiges Formularbuch (Neuwied, 1807) which was often reprinted: (Translated) "Since by your sinful life you have grieved God, given offense to the church, and made yourself unworthy to be a member of the church, therefore we excommunicate you herewith in the name of God, and by the authority of Christ's Word and commandment, according to Matt. 18 and the teaching of Paul in I Cor. 5, from our church, until you return, feel penitence and sorrow for your sin, ask God and the church for forgiveness, and lead a renewed life; to which may the Lord Jesus grant you grace, light, and understanding." The common rule was that the offender was to be admonished or visited before the excommunication could take place, but that in case of gross and flagrant publicly known sin, this prior admonition was not necessary.

In recent years excommunications are not so frequent, since it is now common to permit an offender to withdraw before excommunication, in which case the bishop or elder merely announces the withdrawal, or it is recorded in the church book without announcement. A painless type of excommunication is the practice of some congregations of dropping from the church rolls those who fail to pay their church dues for a period of time, or discontinue participation in the church activities, or cease attendance at the services. In some places members who have been disciplined by the "small ban," i.e., "setting back" from communion, may be continued as noncommunicant members for a long time, even until death. In others such noncommunicant members are carried only for a few years and then either quietly or publicly dropped. In a few Mennonite (MC) conferences deliberate abstention from the communion service three or more successive times is a ground for severance of membership.

A few historic cases of excommunication are worthy of note. In 1547 Dirk Philips, with Menno Simons' agreement, excommunicated Elder Adam Pastor at Goch because of his unitarian theology. In 1549 Menno Simons excommunicated Elder Frans Cuiper for pro-Catholic leanings. In 1552 he excommunicated Elder Gillis van Aken for adultery, restoring him in 1554 on confession. In 1560 he excommunicated Zylis and Lemke, two leaders of the High German churches, and, with the support of the Dutch leaders and churches, all the High German leaders, for not agreeing to the strict practice of avoidance including marital avoidance, as decided at the Wismar Conference. This marked a permanent division between Menno's followers and the South German and Swiss Brethren. In the course of the numerous factional disputes and schisms among the Dutch Mennonites 1560-1650, excommunication (including mutual excommunication of entire groups) was resorted to more than once. The same thing occurred in the Amish schism in Switzerland and Alsace in 1693, when Jakob Ammann excommunicated all those who refused to join him in the strict practice of avoidance, and the Reist party in turn excommunicated the Amish party. In America similar occasions can be reported. In 1777 the excommunication of Bishop Christian Funk by the Franconia Conference for supporting the colonial side of the Revolutionary War led to the Funkite schism. In the schism of the Brenneman group in Indiana in 1874, Daniel Brenneman was excommunicated by the conference (MC). Other similar cases have occurred in the MC group in more recent times.

The formation in 1847-48 of the new Oberholtzer group (first stage of the General Conference Mennonite groups), as well as its own early history, contains four striking cases of group excommunication. At the 1847 fall meeting of the Franconia Conference (MC) the Oberholtzer faction of 16 ministers including the moderator of the conference were expelled from the conference for having subscribed to an unsanctioned new constitution. Soon thereafter the chairman of the new conference and another minister, Abraham and Henry Hunsicker, were expelled together with their following for opposing the conference ruling of prohibition of membership in secret orders. In 1858 the new conference expelled Preacher William Gehman and 22 others for persisting in holding special prayer meetings contrary to a conference decision. In 1861 it expelled Preacher Henry Johnson of Lower Skippack, who took with him most of the congregation. The Hunsicker faction died out, but the Gehman faction developed into the Evangelical Mennonites (q.v.), the oldest unit of the later M.B.C. Conference, still in vigorous existence with about 5,000 members. The "Johnson" Mennonites have continued as an independent group.

In 1697 the Danzig Elder Georg Hansen excommunicated the Mennonite artist Enoch Seeman, Sr., for painting portraits in violation of the Second Commandment, and would not reinstate him until he promised to paint only landscapes and decorations.

In later years, when the pressure to participate in military service became greater, numerous cases of excommunication of those who departed from the nonresistant faith are reported in Holland as well as in the Danzig area. In 1793 a Texel (Holland) Mennonite was excommunicated for serving on a naval vessel. W. Mannhardt, speaking of the practice of the West Prussian churches, says (in his Wehrfreiheit der Altpreussischen Mennoniten, 1863), "From earliest times in all the Prussian churches the acceptance of military service has been counted as a sin requiring excommunication, . . . by which the offender drops out (ausscheidet) from the church. Earlier when certain members had been forcibly taken into the army and served in a war, they were forgiven and restored to membership upon repentance. Later, when military service was followed by continuing obligations in the reserve corps, the excommunication was made irreversible." When an Elbing Mennonite who had served in the 1815 campaign against Napoleon tried in 1816 to force the church to receive him again by an appeal to the King, which the elders resisted, the case was taken to court (Kammergericht) in Berlin, which in 1818 freed the elders of all charges, stating that in the light of their age-old principles the Mennonites had a right to such excommunications. Military service is no longer a ground for excommunication anywhere among European Mennonites and not in most American congregations of the General Conference Mennonites, the Evangelical Mennonites, the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, and possibly a few others. However, in the Mennonite Church (MC) and related groups, the Old Order Amish and Old Order Mennonites, the conservative groups in Canada, and the Mennonite Brethren Church in Canada it still is. In most cases the forfeiture of membership is automatic. The Canadian M.B. Conference took action in 1948 more clearly defining its position by requiring excommunication for participation in combatant service but not for service in an unarmed medical corps. In the M.C. group in World War II some 1200 men lost their membership, some 500 of whom were reinstated later.

The land-commissioners Jacob Höppner and Johann Bartsch, who located the Chortitza colony in the Ukraine (founded 1788-89), were excommunicated from the Flemish church at Chortitza because of bitter feeling about their work. Bartsch was reinstated later, but Höppner became a member of the Frisian branch of the church. Johann Wiebe, elder in Chortitza, attempted to deter Claas Reimer from organizing the schismatic Kleine Gemeinde in 1812 by threat of excommunication and unfrocking. The elders of the Mennonite Church in the Molotschna and Chortitza colonies in 1860 excommunicated the 18 founders of the Mennonite Brethren group, even though the latter had already formally withdrawn from the old church. In the confusion of the early days of the M.B. group (1860-65) a number of cases of excommunication, even of leaders, occurred, some by radical elements. Among these cases were J. Reimer, B. Bekker, and C. Schmidt. H.S.B.

Exeland Mennonite Church (MC) began as a rural mission project in the area a few miles southeast of the town of Exeland, Wis. In 1949 services were held in the basement of the church under construction. The completed church was dedicated on May 9, 1954, on which date the congregation was organized as a member of the North Central District. The membership was 25, with Wallace Kauffman as pastor. Exeter Civilian Public Service Unit No. 117 was opened at Exeter School, Lafayette, Rhode Island, Nov. 9, 1943, and closed in August 1949. The 20 men of the unit, under the direction of the Mennonite Central Committee, performed various services in this institution, which cared for mentally defective boys. M.G.

Exile (Banishment), a punishment which in former times could be applied to citizens if they tried to assert their religious independence and left the state churches. Thus the third article of the fourth Lateran Council of 1215 (Roman Catholic) obligated the temporal authorities to expel all subjects who had deviated from the Catholic faith.

During the Reformation this punishment was inflicted upon the Anabaptists in nearly all the Protestant countries, whereas death was the corresponding penalty in Catholic regions. The exiles were usually bound by oath not to return to the country; if they broke their oath, their return was considered a crime and was severely punished. Questions of faith were then no longer considered, and judgment followed on the basis of disobedience of the temporal authorities. Since the Anabaptists held the oath to be incompatible with the teachings of Jesus, and since they were aware of no criminal deed, they did not grant the state the right to banish them, referring to the verse of Scripture, "The earth is the Lord's" (Bossert, 315). The authorities, however, forcibly took them over the border if they refused to go voluntarily. Corporal punishment was not infrequently added to exile. In some countries they were whipped, in others branded on the cheek.

But in the neighboring country after their expulsion they were not safe either, for the authorities always notified these countries of the expulsion and demanded that they also banish the victim (Strickler, 336, 586). Hence if some returned to their homes, it was not always due to a fault of theirs.

Exile was the first penalty visited upon the Anabaptists, having been applied at Zürich in the very week of the inception of the movement. After Zwingli's first disputation with the advocates of adult baptism on Jan. 17, 1525, the council of the city ordered all the nonresident Anabaptists to leave the canton. On Jan. 19 the council issued a mandate making it compulsory to have all unbaptized infants baptized; "He who will not do this shall get out of the city, jurisdiction, and canton of my lords with wife and child, goods and possessions, or await what will happen to him." On March 11, 1525, it was decided that anyone who received adult baptism should be expelled with his family. Later on both Zürich and Bern confiscated the property of the exile. In Switzerland Mennonites continued to be banished on religious grounds until within the 18th century, particularly in the cantons of Bern and Zürich.

The history of Anabaptist banishment is particularly noteworthy in Bern where this punishment was applied even more rigorously than in Zürich. After the foreign Anabaptists had been expelled at the introduction of the Reformation into Bern (1527-28), the council issued a mandate on July 22, 1531, ordering that Anabaptists should first be submerged under water and then ejected from the canton; if they returned they should be drowned. The mandate of July 31 repeated this order. Following the great disputation at Bern (q.v.) of March 11-17, 1538, the foreign Anabaptists were told that they were to leave the canton immediately. Native Anabaptists were told that they would be conducted over the border by the police and in case of return they were to be executed with the sword unless they recanted. This was the procedure followed during the next decades. Innumerable persons, regardless of sex or age, were thus driven from their homes. An official opinion of the clergy (1585) recommended that especially the leaders of the Anabaptists be banished from the country and sent to the galleys. Others who were not leaders, but obstinate persons, were to be expelled. In the mandate of Sept. 3, 1585, it was accordingly ordered that the stiff-necked Anabaptists were to be taken to the border in chains. The mandate of 1597 added the threat of death in case of return and declared the property of exiled persons confiscate to the state (see Täufergut). The mandate of Dec. 26, 1644, decreed that returning Anabaptists should be publicly whipped. Thus the Bernese government in the course of time tried various means of force to induce the Anabaptists to return "to the right way." When all these measures proved fruitless, and they still wanted at any cost to get rid of the "damned sect," the authorities proceeded to expel all the Anabaptists held in prison in the penitentiary. The exiles had to sign the following Verbannungs-Revers: "I, the undersigned, herewith confess that after I on account of my adopted aforesaid Anabaptist doctrine had been for a time detained by our high Christian government in their penitentiary or orphanage in Bern, and had been admonished on the subject to withdraw from the doctrine, but I can and will not desist from my assumed opinion . . . I have fallen more and more into the punishment and disfavor of my high government in consideration of my adopted doctrine, which is exactly contrary to the government mandate. And that I now therefore am to avoid their city and canton and depart. Therefore I herewith vow and promise to accept such banishment from now on when I am to be conducted over the border, and avoid the city and canton and the borders altogether, and henceforth to have no contact by oral or secret or public communication with its citizens in any way, on the aforesaid doctrine. With this further declaration that I shall and will not in any form let myself be seen or enter into their lands and territories, but if contrary to expectations, I do not keep this my promise but act contrary to it, it shall be regarded as if I had broken a properly sworn oath and that therefore a high government without further ado act in accord with the law and the content of the publicly read mandate, and as it is customary to judge such persons by law, shall I the false teacher be judged, by virtue of this letter, which I herewith in this matter sign with my own hand." On Jan. 20, 1663, the chancellery of Bern announced that most of the banished Anabaptists were again at home. A mandate of Sept. 8, 1670, ordered the expulsion to begin again, "to clear these intolerable people out of the land." Those who returned should be branded with a hot iron. (Concerning the fate of one of these exiles see Heinrich Funk.) The ejection of the Swiss Brethren is one of the most inglorious chapters in the history of the Bernese state.

In Protestant Germany banishment was early used against the Anabaptists. In Saxony the Protestant pastors engaged in the general church inspection in 1527 were directed to warn "all those who held to an error in faith, whether on the sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, baptism," or any other doctrine, to leave the country at once; if they returned they would be severely punished. If laymen refused to desist from their error they should be ordered to sell their possessions and leave the country within a certain time (Sehling, 142 ff.). Banishment was also applied in Hesse, and in the imperial cities of Strasbourg, Augsburg, Nürnberg, Lindau, and others.

In Württemberg the theologians, in the opinion they drew up on the penalizing of the Anabaptists at the request of Duke Ulrich upon his return in 1535, reported that the "fine appearance of the life" of the Anabaptists caused many members of the church to join them. These poor people would not do this out of malice, but out of pure simplicity of mind and the good zeal which they have to God; on the other hand they see "with us and the great multitude of ours unfortunately very wild, bold, and wicked living." One should have patience with the Anabaptists and not inflict the death penalty on them. The dangerous leaders should not be expelled into other countries, for they would thus spread their doctrines into neighboring regions, but be kept in prison on meager fare, which "might serve to their correction and conversion by the grace of God." But other Anabaptists, who are not so skillful "in seducing," should if admonition, prison, and public humiliation do not avail, be banished (Bossert, 53 f.). The duke issued orders to confiscate the property of all unmarried Anabaptist exiles. He who is banished without oath and returns shall receive either corporal or capital punishment; he who is banished under oath, shall receive both corporal and capital punishment (Bossert, 60). But capital punishment was never inflicted. When the councilors explained that banishing the Anabaptists from one country to another merely spread their doctrine, Duke Ulrich gave the order on Dec. 15, 1544, to have the preachers instruct the prisoners and persuade them to recant; at the next diet he would suggest a conference to decide "how to deal with such wrong and stubborn people" (Bossert, 101). His successor, Duke Christoph, also issued a mandate on June 25, 1558, ordering the proscription of dissenters (Bossert, 171). In 1614 an Anabaptist from Dettingen was refused permission to stay in the country unless he "abstained from his error" (Bossert, 854).

Under Catholic jurisdiction exile was the exception. In the Palatinate it was adopted after executions had reached their height (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 32). In Bohemia the estates raised a protest against the execution of Anabaptists in 1529, in effect calling for other punishments such as exile.

In Moravia the Landtag at Znaim consented to the banishment of Anabaptists in 1535. A large number of fugitives were captured in neighboring lands, especially in the bishopric of Passau (q.v.). The repeated demands of Ferdinand that the Moravian estates expel them (in 1540, 1546, and 1550) indicate that numerous Anabaptists were still being protected by the more benevolent barons or hiding in subterranean passages (see Lochy). Martial developments occupied the king's attention, pushing the persecution of Anabaptists into the background. Later it revived. In 1563, when Ferdinand sent his son Maximilian to Moravia, the estates requested Maximilian to influence his father to permit the Anabaptists to stay, in view of the labor shortage, since there were among them "neat and artistic craftsmen in all fields," who had done not a little work in Moravia. Maximilian answered evasively, but did nothing against the Anabaptists. But when he assumed the government, and Pope Pius V threatened to depose him if he permitted Protestantism free exercise of religion, he ordered the expulsion of the Hutterites by the end of the year at the Landtag in Brno in 1567; if they returned they faced death. The estates protested that exile was impossible, for the Anabaptists "would not want to leave. And they would not know whither to go; they would rather be killed than expelled." In reply to the request of the estates that the king inform them what steps to take if the Hutterites refused to go, he king said he would consider the problem. But there was no further word, nor did the problem come up for discussion at any future Landtag (Hruby, 21 ff.).

When in a humaner era the death penalty for deviation of religious ideas was no longer possible, it was gradually replaced by exile, which was in its turn gradually abandoned too. In France a mandate of Louis XIV, Aug. 13, 1712, decreed that Mennonites must leave the country, but it was only partially enforced. The last major exile of Anabaptists on religious grounds was the expulsion of the Hutterian Brethren from Transylvania when police conducted them to the Polish border and left them to their fate in the mountains, under penalty of death if they returned, because they had refused to become Catholic (see Kuhr, Joseph). However, as late as 1780, Bishop Johannes Nafziger of Essingen in the Palatinate was sentenced to be exiled from the Palatinate because he had baptized two former Amish Mennonite orphan girls who had been reared in a Catholic orphanage.

In the Netherlands there were during the rise of Anabaptism (about 1532) a few cases where Anabaptists were banned from a city. In 1535-50, those were usually banished who attended Anabaptist meetings, but confessed that they had not been rebaptized, and did not agree with the Anabaptist principles. After persecution was over and the Reformed Church established, there were only a few individual cases of exile; for example, Hans de Ries (q.v.), who was banished from Middelburg in 1578; Ucko Walles (q.v.), who had to leave the province of Groningen in 1637, and Foecke Floris (q.v.), who in 1683 was banished from the province of Friesland.

Exincourt, a village near Montbéliard, France, where a Mennonite school enjoyed a brief but active existence. Isaac Rich, who had received his education at Wadsworth (q.v.), founded it to provide religious instruction for the Mennonite children of the vicinity who had to attend Catholic schools. Gradually, however, the care of orphaned and neglected children became its more important task. They were accepted regardless of creed and supported without charge or for a small sum contributed by friends until they reached the age of 14 years. At first the school was located at Etupes, a village 15 minutes from Exincourt; then Rich leased the stately manor house in Exincourt and transferred the school into it.

Through the energetic interest of the founder, who frequently attended the conferences of the Hessian-Palatine Mennonites to promote his cause, the school received generous financial support from the Mennonites of France and South Germany, though it was not accepted as a charge of the general conference. The school flourished. Six years after its modest beginning it supported 40 children and had an annual expenditure of 12,000 francs. Then there was a sudden collapse. On the night of June 28, 1876, Rich was suddenly arrested on account of moral lapses and was sentenced for life to

New Caledonia, where he died penitent on May 6, 1878. (Gbl. and Menn. Bl., 1870-76; DB 1872, 111-16; ML I, 622.) NEFF.

Eyckenplancken (Oak Planks), nickname for Mennonites of the Netherlands, presumably because of their steadfastness or perhaps for their simplicity in manners and dress. The expression is found in a writing of Franciscus Lansbergen (q.v.), Van de vremde ende onschriftmatighe maniere der Wederdoopscher Leeraren heymelycke gebeden, . . . (Rotterdam, 1596). Which group or denomination of the Mennonites was meant is not clear. (DB 1897, 79.) vdZ.

Eyebrow (Sask.) Mennonite Brethren, which belongs to the Herbert District Conference, was organized in 1927, with approximately a dozen members. A number of families left for British Columbia; hence there has been no increase in the membership. The founder and leader was John Heinrichs (still serving in 1953) and the 1953 membership was 16. Eyebrow-Tugaske Mennonite Church (GCM), located about 50 miles northeast of Moose Jaw, Sask., and 6 miles west of Eyebrow, was established in 1926 by settlers from Russia. In 1929 this church became a member of the Canadian Conference, but the first meetinghouse was not built until 1946. The first minister was Johann Martens. In 1953 there were two ministers: David Bueckert, leader, and Gerhard Fedrau, with a membership of 50. J.G.R.

Eymann (Eiman, Eyman), a Bernese Mennonite family which migrated to Alsace, France, in 1671-1711. Three Eymann families are named by Ernst Müller (Berner Täufer) in his list of Mennonite families in the Palatinate, Germany, in 1672. The census of 1940 by Franz Crous lists 87 Eymanns in South German congregations, 23 of whom were members of the Weierhof congregation, 28 of the Monsheim congregation, and 31 of the Sembach congregation. Peter Eymann (q.v.) was a South German Mennonite active in political affairs, being elected to the provincial diet at Munich in 1848. Mennonites from Bavaria established a settlement in Ashland Co., Ohio, in the 1830's. Living in this settlement was Jacob Eyman, who in 1851 with his family moved to Lee Co., Iowa. Among the Amish and Mennonite immigrants arriving in America on Sept. 9, 1749, was Jacob Eiman. The Eiman family was already represented in the Ontario Amish Mennonite community in the late 1830's. Representatives of the Eiman family now live principally in Iowa, while members of the Eyman branch have lived in Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan. M.G.

Eymann, Peter (1788-1855), a South German Mennonite who entered political life and was at the same time active as a leader in his congregation. He was born Nov. 13, 1788, at the Lohmühle tanning mill in the community (Gemeinde) of Langmeil in the Rhenish Palatinate; died at his mill in Diemerstein on March 14, 1855. In 1833 he was elected mayor of Frankenstein, and with one brief exception, held this office until his death 22 years later. In spite of a limited education he was quite successful in this office. Politically he favored a republican government. In 1848, the year of the revolution, he was elected as a delegate from the district of Kaiserslautern-Kirchheimbolanden to the Bavarian diet at Munich. He was the first German Mennonite to hold this position. The diet convened in January 1849. On May 15 the republic was proclaimed in the Palatinate, and on May 29 the diet at Munich was dissolved. Eymann went home a sick and broken man following this. Prussian troops restored order in the Palatinate.

Eymann served after 1816 as an assistant minister of the Mennonite congregation at Sembach, but avoided this work as much as possible. As a result of his earnest efforts the first salaried minister was installed at Sembach. (ML I, 623.) M.P.

Eysenburg, Johann, one of Melchior Hofmann's 16 prophets, who was persuaded by Martin Bucer to join the Reformed Church and was then used by him with Peter Tasch (q.v.) to try to persuade the Anabaptists, and especially Hofmann, to come into the church. On May 5, 1539, they had their first interview with Hofmann, which lasted six hours. Four others of five hours each were held before May 26; but they were not successful. On May 22, 1539, the Strasbourg authorities sent a letter to the Speyer council, requesting them to receive the two to convert the Anabaptists at Speyer. NEFF.

Eyssen, Pieter, a Dutch preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam, chosen July 28, 1664, and an ardent antagonist of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), the prominent leader of this church. When the congregation was divided by the schism of the Lammerenkrijg (q.v.) into a more liberal Lamist (q.v.) congregation (Galenus Abrahamsz) and a more conservative Zonist congregation (Samuel Apostool, q.v.), Eyssen joined the latter, serving as a preacher until 1670. In this year, together with his copreacher Isaac van Vreede and a number of members, he left the Zonist congregation because of a conflict and founded a new congregation called De kleine Zon, which however returned to the Zonist mother church in 1679. Eyssen died in 1681. vdZ.

Eysvogel, Johann, of Cologne, supposedly a former member of the Hutterite brotherhood who returned to Catholicism in the 1580's, and to justify this step wrote a slanderous pamphlet against his erstwhile coreligionists. He called it Ein Ander schön neues Lied darin der Betrug und arglistige Art der Hutterischen Wiedertäufer wahrhaftig und eigentlich vor Augen gestellt wird. Allen gutherzigen frommen Christen zur notwendigen Erinnerung und getreuen Warnung gemacht und in Druck gegeben durch Johann Eysvogel von Cöln, gewesten Hutterischen Wiedertäufer Bruder zu Austerlitz in Mähren . . . 1581 (written in form of a popular song). It is a booklet very similar in type and spirit to that of Hans Jedelshauser (q.v.) of the same year, which was published by Christoph Erhard (q.v.). Whether the publication of Eysvogel's pamphlet had the same connection is not known, but Erhard reprints this poem in his Gründliche . . . Historia (1589), pp. 35-38.

It contains, so to speak, all the arsenal of hostile arguments against the Hutterites which ever were launched against them. Eysvogel attacks the educational system of the Brethren (q.v.), their community of goods (q.v.), their somewhat unusual marriage system, and their legendary wealth (see Economic History of the Hutterites). He says they buy up all crops in Moravia so that no one else may have them; they spoil all the trades and rob people with the prices they charge for their products. In short, they chase after money and drive prices higher and higher. In their dress they show a studied modesty but wear only the very best of materials. They act puffed up like noblemen, have the best farms and the best horses, on which they ride around in the manner of the lords.

Das Brot tun sie abschneiden
Dem Armen wohl vor dem Maul.

Worst of all (in Eysvogel's opinion) is the fact that they pay for all their purchases with cash, and thus dominate markets and fairs. (Incidentally, this is a reproach which occasionally may be heard even today, mainly in Canada.) They are wealthy but hide their treasures from the world, etc. The argument of tense economic competition by these large-scale Hutterite enterprises is repeated time and again, and becomes the standard polemical slogan in all subsequent attacks on the Brethren.

Small as the pamphlet was (and who can say whether it was original or merely fabricated as in the Jedelshauser case), its arguments had a major influence upon another representative of the growing Austrian Counter Reformation (q.v.), Christoph A. Fischer (q.v.), who repeated them almost verbatim about 20 years later. Also the government in Vienna availed itself of the same arguments in its ill-famed General Mandate (edict) of 1601, reprinted by Fischer. LOSERTH, R.F.

Eyte (Ayte), a former Dutch Mennonite family living in the Zaan district near Amsterdam, of which a number of members were preachers. Pieter Pietersz belonged to the Waterlander denomination. Having preached in the congregation of Menniste buurt near Zijpe and returning by boat to Zaandam, on Nov. 10, 1664, he was fatally struck by the falling mast when his boat collided with another boat. His three sons, Gerrit Pietersz Eyte (1656-1728), Dirk Pietersz Eyte (1663-1736), and Pieter Pietersz Eyte (1664-1744), all served as preachers of the Nieuwe Huys united Flemish and Waterlander congregation at Zaandam in 1680-1728, 1692-1736 (?), and 1692-1744, respectively. vdZ.

Ezinge, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, where Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 20 or 25 persons in 1561-63. This number suggests that a Mennonite congregation may have existed here; but since there are no traces of such a congregation, we must assume that the newly baptized joined a congregation in the neighborhood, presumably Oldehove (q.v.). vdZ.

Ezra (Esdras), Fourth Book, also called Second Ezra, a pseudepigraphical book of semi-canonical dignity; in the Latin Vulgate Bible it stands at the end of the entire book, after the New Testament, although it definitely belongs to the class of Jewish Pseudepigrapha of the inter-testamental period. The latter are books published after the conclusion of the Biblical canon under the alleged authorship of some Old Testament writers, such as Ezra. The book is actually one of the numerous late Jewish apocalypses couched in such terms that this literature could become acceptable also to the rabbinic Judaism of the period after the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem by the Romans in A.D. 70. Thus it is assumed that the Fourth Ezra was written around A.D. 100 by a Jew who tried to comfort his coreligionists and to make them hope for a glorious future, that is, salvation under the expected "Son of Man" or Messiah. The influence of the school of the great teacher Shammai is noticeable.

The book became exceedingly popular in the early church, and soon was expanded. Chapters 3-14 are original, while chapters 1 and 2 (sometimes called Ezra V) and 15 and 16 (also called Ezra VI) are Christian additions of the second century after Christ. The Vulgate has all 16 chapters. The Church Fathers often used the book, and thus also the Reformers. Luther knew it well, and Leo Jud, the collaborator with Zwingli in Zürich, translated it from the printed Vulgate.

The numbering of the Ezra books is somewhat intricate: the Vulgate counts four such books, including Ezra, Nehemiah, and (as No. III) a sort of summary of both plus Chronicles, so that the apocalypse becomes the fourth book of that name. In modern Protestant scholarship and editions our book is called "Second Ezra," since here only the original Ezra and our book are counted.

The Anabaptists seemed to have been rather fond of the book: Michael Sattler quotes a lengthy section from it (2:34-37) in his well-known letter to the congregation at Horb (1527). Peter Riedemann in his Rechenschaft of 1540 refers to it at many places but strangely enough used texts only from chapters 3:4-24 and 7:20-56.

The Mennonites of Northern Germany also seem to have been rather fond of Ezra in earlier days. Georg Hansen (q.v.) quotes Ezra IV in his Glaubensbericht für die Jugend, 1671, using chapters 7 and 8 (Friedmann, 131), and Gerhard Roosen quotes it in his Christliches Gemütsgespräch (q.v.) (1702), in the section "Concerning the Fall of the Human Race," question 65. Here we read the rather famous passage: "Oh thou Adam, what hast thou done! For though it was thou that sinned, thou art not fallen alone but we all that come of thee" (Ezra IV, 7.48) (Friedmann, 145). It is not unlikely that more such references would be found if a thorough study were made.

One should not forget that the Anabaptists were rather fond of both the apocryphal literature (Apocrypha, q.v.), such as Jesus Sirach or the Gospel According to Nicodemus, and the pseudepigraphic books, which include, besides Ezra IV, the very popular Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs, with its "wisdom"-emphasis.

The Ezra IV book teaches that but few will be saved either through divine compassion or through good works (whence the Catholic doctrine of meritorious works). It is a genuine apocalypse: Rome is called "Edom," the author has visions like Daniel (of the Son of Man, of an Eagle, etc.), and he describes the signs preceding the end of the world. Chapters 1 and 2 comfort Christians because the days of distress are near, but there is also hope for the glory envisioned. The book knows the doctrines of original sin (see above 7:48)—otherwise foreign to Judaism—, and the consequent suffering of all men. But, while Paul teaches release from sin for all who believe, Ezra IV still remains within the framework of Jewish nationalism, both in suffering and in its expectations.

Chapter 2 (the "Christian" supplement) promises that "the Shepherd is nigh at hand. Be ready for the reward of the Kingdom. . . . I asked the angel: Sir, what are these? and He answered: . . . those who have put off mortal clothing and put on the immortal, and have confessed the name of God. Now they are being crowned and have received palms. . . . And He [A Youth of great brightness] is the Son of God whom they have confessed in the world. Then I began greatly to commend those who stood so staunchly for the name of the Lord." (This is Sattler's text, somewhat abbreviated.) R.F.

Ezumaburen and Ezumazijl, hamlets in the Dutch province of Friesland. Leenaert Bouwens baptized 7 persons in Ezumaburen in 1563 and 25 in 1568-82; and in this latter period he baptized 7 persons in near-by Ezumazijl. There was, however, no Mennonite congregation here. The Mennonites living here were no doubt members of some neighboring congregation, perhaps Anjum (q.v.) or Dokkum (q.v.). vdZ.

Faber de Bouma, Gellius (Jelle Smit), was a Catholic priest at Jelsum near Leeuwarden, Friesland, who left his home community at the same time as Menno Simons in 1536, but joined the Reformed Church and became a minister at Norden and in 1538 at Emden. In 1544 he took part in the disputation between Menno Simons and á Lasco (Jan. 21-31). He died on June 2, 1564.

In 1552 Gellius Faber published a booklet of 78 pages presumably in reply to an Anabaptist writing of 1550. The Faber book (no longer in existence) had the title, Eine Antwert Gellij Fabri dener des hilligen wordes binnen Emden op einen bitter hönischen breeff der Wedderdöper . . . (Magdeburg). Menno Simons, who felt that not only his co-workers but he himself had been unjustly attacked, wrote a response in which he closely followed the outline of Faber's booklet. Menno defends the calling of the Anabaptist ministers, their baptism, the Lord's Supper, the ban, their view regarding the church, and the Incarnation. The book was entitled Een Klare beantwoordinge, over een Schrift Gellii Fabri . . . and appeared in 1554 very likely in an Anabaptist print shop in Lübeck. In this, the longest book that Menno produced, can be found his "Conversion" or the "Renunciation of the Church of Rome," which he presented in connection with his defense of the calling of the Anabaptist ministers. This account is both very important biographical information and a jewel of Menno's writings and has been reprinted many times. C.K.

Faber, Engelbert (d. 1580), born near Cologne, Germany, was ordained as minister in P. Dathenus' refugee church of Frankfurt in 1561, was a Reformed minister at Wolfsheim near Alzey in the Palatinate, in the Lower Rhine region, and in the Netherlands. In a letter to H. Bullinger dated April 23, 1562, at Alzey, he said concerning his contacts with the Anabaptists along the Lower Rhine, it "was a bitter thought that he could not present his word in an appropriate manner while these simpletons accept Anabaptist heresies in masses, and yet he could not be silent." He reported that he had now found a copy of the book by Bernhard Buwo (q.v.), Een frundtlyke thosamensprekinge . . . (1556, in Low Saxon; in 1557 a Dutch edition appeared), directed against the Mennonites, which he had translated into German, asking Bullinger whether he found it appropriate to have it published. Bullinger's reply must have been favorable. In 1563 in Heidelberg his book entitled Dialogus: Das ist, Ein gespräch zweyer Personen, von dem Tauff der jungen Kinder . . . appeared. He was a participant in the Frankenthal (q.v.) disputation of 1571. In 1575 he became a pastor in Gau-Odernheim, and in 1580 he died at Venlo on the Maas. C.K.

Faber, Johann (Heigerlin) (1478-1541), the son of a blacksmith. He studied law and theology at the universities of Tübingen and Freiburg i. Br. It appears to be an ancient misconception that he was a Dominican. He was more or less closely associated with outstanding leaders like Erasmus (q.v.), Vadian (q.v.), and Zwingli (q.v.). Faber advocated church reform, but only to the extent that it might remove abuses in the Catholic Church. His complete break with the Reformation occurred in Rome, whither he had gone in the fall of 1521, presumably to interest the pope in his work against Luther: Opus adversus nova quaedam et a christiana religione prorsus aliena dogmata Martini Lutheri (Rome, 1523). Luther had his young friend Justus Jonas write the reply; he did it with wit and humor (Adversus J. Fabrum . . . Justi Jonas . . . defensio. Item M. Lutheri ad eundem Jonam Epistola, 1523).

In Germany Faber engaged in an untiring struggle against the reformers, in writing, in preaching, and in dealing with authorities and rulers. His feud with Zwingli followed. He says that he attended the Zürich disputation of Jan. 29, 1523, as a counselor. Faber then wrote his popular booklet, Ain warlich underrichtung, wie es zu Zürich ergangen, to which Zwingli countered with his friends' highly spiced Das Gyrenrupfen.

Faber was employed by Duke Ferdinand (q.v.) in many offices, chiefly at diets and disputations. In 1528 he was in Vienna to prepare a German translation of the Bible to replace Luther's. His attempts to win Erasmus of Rotterdam (q.v.) for the declining University of Vienna and his former friend Melanchthon back into the Catholic Church failed.

In 1528-30 he did his most permanent work against the Reformation. His first effort was to suppress the growing Anabaptist movement in Moravia and Austria. When Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) lay in prison in Greizenstein (Kreuzenstein), afflicted by sickness and discouraged, he requested an interview with Faber, who had once been his friend. Ferdinand gave his consent.

The interview took place in the last days of 1527, lasting until after midnight on the first day. They discussed the proper interpretation of the Bible, tradition, and infant baptism. On the second day they began at 6:00 A.M. and discussed communion, the intercession of the saints, and purgatory, and Faber gave Hubmaier his booklet against Zwingli on the adoration of the saints. On the next day they discussed faith and good works, the satisfaction of Christ, Christian liberty, freedom of the will, the worship of Mary, the end of time, repentance and confession, fasting, the teachings of Luther and Zwingli and the councils.

The interview with Hubmaier was published at Leipzig in 1528 under the title, Doctoris Joannis

Fabri, adversus Doctorem Balthasarum Pacimontanum Anabaptistarum Nostri saeculi, Primum authorem, orthodoxae Fidei Catholicae Defensio. It was reprinted at Leipzig in 1537 in Faber's Opuscula under the following title: Disputatio episcopi Viennensis (which he was not yet) Joannis Fabri de praecipuis rebus orthodoxae religionis adversus Balthasarum Pacimontanum Anabaptistam. Copies of both works are in the Goshen College Library. A copy of the 1537 folio volume of sermons, containing the sermons against the Anabaptists, also is in the Goshen College Library. A copy of the 1528 work is in the Bethel College Library.

At the conclusion of the talks Hubmaier declared his intention to present his confession of faith to Ferdinand. He wrote a booklet which Faber called Liber Retractationum, thanking the king for sending Faber to him, and saying that Faber had been kind to him. Although Hubmaier declared himself willing to yield on every point except baptism and communion, which he would leave to the decision of the council, there could be no thought of saving his life. These two points were actually the most important of all, and Hubmaier's former political attitude in Waldshut was also reckoned against him. He died at the stake in Vienna, March 10, 1528.

On the following day a polemic sheet of nine pages, entitled Ursach warumb der Widertauffer Patron und erster Anfenger Doctor Balthasar Huebmayr zu Wien auf den zehnten Martii Anno 1528 verbrennet sey (Landshut, 1528), was published by Faber with a dedication to the Duke of Saxony. Faber said he had not written these things because Hubmaier's death gave him pleasure; he had faithfully warned him in prison and in all Christian humility dealt with him, as is seen in Hubmaier's letter; but because it might be said in some places that he had not received justice and was, like John Hus, a martyr in God's sight, he (Faber) testified to the truth.

On April 24, 1528, he dedicated his next work, Sermones doctoris Joannis Fabri . . . adversus Anabaptists (printed in Opuscula, Leipzig, 1537), to the bishop of Olmütz (Olomouc). On his journey to Moravia with the king he so pitied these poor misled people that he preached these sermons at Znaim; since the Moravians did not understand German he had them translated into Latin. There are six sermons; here, as also in the Ursach, he names Hubmaier as the originator of Anabaptist doctrine, and calls the Anabaptists "water bathers."

As a reward for his zeal in persecuting the Anabaptists he asked the Innsbruck government and King Ferdinand to acquit his brother of the debt of 200 guilders. In 1530 he was made Bishop of Vienna. In 1529 he attended the Diet of Speyer as the representative of the Bishop of Constance, and at the Diet in Augsburg in 1530 he was a coauthor of the refutation of the Confession of Augsburg and of the Confessio Tetrapolitana.

In the following years Faber was preocccupied with the work of his episcopate, which he carried on along three lines: (1) He sought to preserve Catholic doctrine by resisting all innovations; he set a good example to his frequently uncouth clergy, taking part in the religious instruction in his diocese by many sermons and writings, and providing capable pastors. (2) He attended the diets of the empire even in the last years of his life. In 1536 Faber wrote a valuable description of church conditions in Germany with advice on the attitude to be taken. (3) His work for the University of Vienna was outstanding. He wrote an extraordinary number of sermons, doctrinal works, and polemics in German and Latin. Not all of them have been printed. The sermons and other theological works he published in folio volumes (Cologne, 1537-41), to which Johannes Cochlaeus (q.v.) added a supplementary volume (Leipzig, 1537). One of his oldest tracts, Declamationes divinae de humanae vitae miseria (Augsburg, 1520), takes a very pessimistic view of human life. Most of his writings are polemics, as his Malleus haereticorum (Cologne, 1527), the tracts against the Picards and Hussites, and De actis ac mandatis imperatorum et regum . . . adversus haereses et earundem autores liber unus (Leipzig, 1538), and against the reformers, Luther, Zwingli, Oecolampadius, Bullinger, Schwenckfeld, Hubmaier, and Denk. During his lifetime Faber collected a library of 3,800 volumes, unusual for that time, most of which is now in the Hofbibliothek in Vienna.

Faber died after a long illness, May 20, 1541, and is buried in the cathedral of Vienna. (See Hubmaier.) NEFF, LOSERTH.

Faber's polemic of March 1528 on Hubmaier's death is found in the Munich Staatsbibliothek (4 H. ref. 735); K. Schottenloher, Die Landshuter Buchdrucker des 16. Jahrhunderts (Mainz, 1930) 50; excerpts were printed with comments in B. F. Hummel, Neue Bibliothek von seltenen Büchern I (1775) 218; see also J. O. Pr. Fabri, Doctoris Johannis Fabri adversus Doctorem Balthasarum Pacimontanum (Leipzig, 1528) ML I, 624 f.; II, 361.

Faber (Fabri), Johannes (1504—after 1557), of Heilbronn, Germany, a Dominican and polemic-ascetic author, canon at Augsburg, author of the book Christenliche undterweisung an die Widertauffer von dem Tauff der Jungen Kindlein. Und von der Gaistlichen und weltlichen Oberkait an die Widertauffer (Ingolstadt, 1550), which violently attacks the Anabaptists. He also wrote the pamphlet: Von dem Ayd Schwören. Auch von der Wiedertauffer Marter. Und woher es entspringe, dass sie also fröhlich und getröst die pein des Tods leiden. Und von der Gemeinschaft der Wiedertäufer (Augsburg, 1550), in which he involuntarily gives them great praise when he says, "Whence does it come that the Anabaptists so joyfully and confidently suffer the pain of death? They dance and jump into the flames, see the flashing sword without dismay, speak and preach to the spectators with laughing mouth; they sing psalms and hymns until their soul departs, they die with joy, as if they were in a merry company, remain strong, confident and steadfast until their death. Persisting defiantly in their intention, they also defy all pain and torture." Faber explains this phenomenon as the work of hell's dragon. Copies of the 1550 booklets are in GCL. NEFF.

Fabricius, Jakob (1560-1640), a Protestant clergyman in Schleswig, Germany, held a public disputation with the Mennonites of Eiderstedt (q.v.), Sept. 13-15, 1608, which brought him "much honor." Neff.

Fabricius, Johannes (Montanus), a Reformed divine, b. 1527 at Bergheim in Alsace, a nephew of Leo Jud, who was Zwingli's co-worker, was made pastor in Chur (q.v.) in 1557. Here he attacked the Swiss Brethren, who held their meetings in the home of a local citizen. In 1560 he disputed with one of the Swiss Brethren before the city council and in the following year he arranged a colloquy with the Swiss Brethren, in which he was announced as victor (Schiess, Bullingers Korrespondenz mit den Graubündnern II, 33). On the other hand, his attempts to convert an imprisoned Anabaptist failed (see Grisons). (ML III, 162.) Hege.

Fabricius, Theodor (Dietrich Smit) (1501-70), a Lutheran theologian, studied theology and Hebrew at the universities of Cologne and Wittenberg. He returned to Cologne in 1527 to teach Hebrew, but had to flee from the city before the end of the year because he had sided with Clarenbach (q.v.) and Fliesteden (q.v.). He fled to the duchy of Jülich, and was there received in noble families and associated with the "Wassenberg preachers (Predikanten)," especially Campanus (q.v.) and Klopreis (q.v.). It was probably Fabricius who freed Klopreis from prison in Cologne on New Year's night 1529 and took him to Wassenberg, where Klopreis was ordained in the house of the bailiff.

In 1533 Fabricius was in Kassel. In November Philip of Hesse (q.v.) sent him with Johannes Lening, the pastor at Melsungen, to Münster to promote the Protestant cause. Day after day he spoke in St. Lambert's Church. At the same time Fabricius was commissioned to define Luther's doctrine as over against that of the Anabaptists; the document was drawn up by Fabricius and Dr. Westermann of Lippstadt. On Nov. 15 they reported that they had reached an agreement with Bernhardt Rothmann (q.v.) on all points but infant baptism. In his sermon on the following day Fabricius stated that there was disagreement only in the matter of the proper time for baptism, and this was a minor issue on which difference of opinion was admissible. But in the end the unification failed and the Hessian clergymen returned home. But Fabricius remained at his post in spite of hopeless prospects until he was expelled in 1534. In November Philip sent him back to Münster to negotiate with the Anabaptists for peace. This mission also ended in failure.

Once more Fabricius was used by Philip to convert imprisoned Anabaptists. In August 1538, when he was pastor at Allendorf, he and Noviomagus, a professor at the University of Marburg, repeatedly cross-examined the Anabaptists held at Wolkersdorf, and tried to lead them from their faith, but without success. When Fabricius protested against Philip's dual marriage, he lost his freedom and his possessions. He returned to Wittenberg, where he took his degree under Luther May 29, 1544. In 1570 he died as superintendent at Zerbst. Neff.

Faes Dirks, an Anabaptist martyr, a chairmaker of Gouda in the Dutch province of South Holland, was received into the Mennonite Church by baptism in 1569, at the age of 30. On April 7, 1570, he was seized, on May 27 "tyrannically tortured," and three days later burned at the stake in Gouda. Van Braght gives the records of three trials he was subjected to. He confessed his faith frankly and steadfastly. On the rack he named several fellow believers, who had been baptized with him and were now in the city. He had been baptized in an attic in Rotterdam. The death sentence, which is given verbatim, gives a shocking insight into the cruel mind of the Catholic Church of the time. The populace was evidently horrified by his execution, for when the city was conquered by William of Orange, they took the bones of the martyr from the place of execution and placed them with those of his cruel judge, a priest. (Mart. Mir. D 508 f., E 846 f.; ML I, 450.) Neff.

Fagel, Caspar (1634-88), a Dutch statesman, studied law at the University of Utrecht 1648-53, practiced law in The Hague, then became clerk of the States-General of the Netherlands 1670-72 and finally grand pensionary (secretary) of this body. He was a member of the Reformed Church, and a champion of religious tolerance, especially on political grounds. The intercession of Fagel with the Dutch Stadholder Prince William of Orange brought about the release of Foeke Floris (q.v.), a Mennonite preacher at Oostzaan, from persecution for "heresy." On Nov. 1, 1688, the Mennonite Lamist congregation at Amsterdam and a number of churches in the neighborhood of Amsterdam sent a letter of thanks to Fagel, because he had declared that he would maintain absolute freedom of conscience wherever he could. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 455; N.N.B.Wb. III, 382.) vdZ.

Fagel, Francois, a Dutch statesman, nephew of the above and like him a defender of religious toleration, who did much for the Mennonites in Europe. He was born at The Hague in 1659, died there in 1746. In 1690-1744 he was clerk of the Dutch States-General. François Fagel threw himself into the cause of the oppressed Mennonites in the Palatinate, Switzerland, and Prussia. At the insistence of the Dutch Mennonites, especially the congregations of Amsterdam and Rotterdam, and in accord with the resolutions of the States-General, Fagel, who warmly promoted this intercession, induced Prince William of Orange to write a letter to Elector Johann Wilhelm of the Palatinate in 1694, and again in 1697 in favor of the Mennonites living there, who were suffering many hardships. On March 15, 1710, Fagel in the name of the States-General made a strong protest (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1758) to the republic of Bern, Switzerland, in behalf of the persecuted Mennonites, many of whom had been thrown into prison and others sold to Venice and elsewhere to serve on the galleys (q.v.). It was Fagel who proudly declared that the Mennonites, who were being forcibly shipped by the Bern government to the English colony of Carolina in America in 1710, would be set free when passing the Dutch border (which indeed happened), because this country did not allow suppression or persecution for the sake of religion (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1763, 1768). And when the King of Prussia, Frederick William I, adopted harsh measures against the Lithuanian Mennonites in 1732, it was again Fagel who, at the request of a number of Mennonite congregations in Holland, moved the States-General to instruct the Dutch ambassador in Berlin to make a strong protest against this persecution. The Mennonite archives at Amsterdam contain a large number of letters exchanged between Fagel and the Dutch ambassador in Switzerland, Johann Ludwig Runckel (q.v.), who by order and at the expense of the Dutch States was active in the cause of emigration of the Swiss Brethren. Of special interest is a document of March 22, 1710 (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1764), which states that the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs thanked François Fagel for promoting the intercession for the Mennonites of Bern. It was Fagel too, who in 1720 successfully intervened with the Duke of Jülich on behalf of Wilhelm Grahe (q.v.) and other Dompelaars (q.v.), who had been imprisoned. Fair Grove (Mich.) Mennonite Church (MC) was listed as a member of the Ontario Mennonite Conference at least as early as 1907, when it had 11 members. As early as 1905 the name of Daniel Lehman appeared under the Fair Grove address, among the Michigan ministers. Although the church is listed for 1913-16, the membership and the minister are no longer given by the Mennonite Yearbook and Directory. (ML I, 627.) M.G.

Fairbanks (Tex.) Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, now extinct, was organized in 1897 with 30 members by Henry A. Koehn. Peter A. Friesen and John Schlabach also served as pastors. This congregation was dissolved by 1906, although a few members remained longer. The Galveston flood of 1899, which destroyed their crops, contributed to the dissolution. I.K.F.

Fairfield County, Ohio (county seat, Lancaster), formed in the east central part of the state by governor's proclamation in 1800, was the home of a large Mennonite congregation southeast of Bremen during the first half of the 19th century. The first settlers came from Montgomery and Lancaster counties in Pennsylvania after a short sojourn in Rockingham Co., Va., and a still briefer stay in Greene Co., Pa. The first Mennonites settled southeast of Bremen in the first decade of the 19th century. In the early years German-speaking pietistic groups like the Dunkards and Evangelicals made serious inroads on the membership. The lure of better farming opportunities along the Ohio-Erie Canal a few miles to the west and of cheaper land in northwestern Ohio further depleted the membership. The Civil War hysteria led many young men of Mennonite families to volunteer for military service. Entire congregations of other faiths in this county are now composed of descendants of former Mennonites. Mennonite emigrants from Fairfield County forsook their rugged hillside farms to form congregations in Franklin, Allen, Putnam, and Logan counties in Ohio. Those in Franklin and Logan are now extinct. After the emigrations and defections of the mid-century, the two congregations, one at Pleasant Hill near Bremen and the other at Turkey Run, south of the border in Perry County, suffered from poor leadership and a conservative spirit that opposed English preaching and Sunday school. The Pleasant Hill meetinghouse was abandoned and sold and the one at Turkey Run nearly suffered the same fate but has enjoyed a mild revival during recent years, having 36 members in 1955. Fairfield County was the early home of bishops John M. and George Brenneman and of Elder Daniel Brenneman, founder of the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church. Other prominent names in the congregation were Blosser, Culp, Funk, Stalter, Stemen, and Sherrick.

An Amish congregation flourished in Fairfield County not far from Colfax during the middle decades of the 19th century. Members of the congregation, in search of cheaper land, moved to Logan and Champaign counties, Ohio, during the middle of the century; others moved farther west to Noble Co., Ind., near Topeka, and to Johnson Co., Iowa, where they helped to found a flourishing congregation. The last minister, Jonathan Zook, moved to Holmes Co., Ohio. Prominent names in the congregation were Bontrager, Gingerich, Guengerich, Hartzler, Miller, Kempf, Plank, and Stutzman. J.S.U.

Fairfield Amish Mennonite Church, an independent congregation not under the Conservative Amish Mennonite Conference, located in Bureau County, near Tampico, Ill., was organized in Shelby Co., Ill., with 42 members under the leadership of Levi C. Hostetler in 1933, and was moved to Henry County in 1938 and to Bureau County in 1944. In 1953 there were 144 members. H. Ho.

Fairfield Bethel Mennonite Church (GCM), in Beadle Co., S.D., 11 miles north and 2 miles west of Huron, a member of the Northern District, was organized on July 13, 1927, under the leadership of Elder P. P. Tschetter. The congregation had 53 members in 1955, with Wm. H. Dahlenburg serving as minister. I.A.D.

Fairfield Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Adams Co., Pa., was formed in 1925 by a schism in the Mennonite (MC) congregation at Mummasburg, Pa., because of the question of insurance.

Those carrying insurance, contrary to the regulations of the Lancaster Conference, to which the congregation belonged, organized the Fairfield Church with A. W. Geigley as pastor, and with 40 charter members. In 1955 it had 68 members, with Lamont Woelk serving as pastor. The congregation remained independent until 1941, when it joined the Eastern District Conference (GCM).

Fairmount Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, now extinct. In 1883 Mennonites from Henry Co., Iowa, located south of Fairmount, Prairie Co., Ark., and organized a Mennonite Brethren in Christ church, with John Krupp of Iowa serving as the first minister. Christian Bechler was an influential member of the congregation and many of the meetings were held in his home. The congregation had approximately 50 members in 1891 but was discontinued in 1899. Fairview, Mich., is an unincorporated village (pop. ca. 150) in Oscoda County, in the north central part of the state. The village is the center of a farming area, largely surrounded by forests, settled by Mennonites in 1900-12. The Mennonite congregation (MC) of over 400 persons is the only church body located near Fairview. A small General Conference Mennonite congregation is located at Comins, a village five miles north of Fairview. Despite the handicaps of geographic isolation, poor soil, and a rigorous climate, the community has developed into one of the strongest congregations of the Indiana-Michigan Conference District. Fairview, Okla., is a village of 2,400 inhabitants in the north central part of Major County. Approximately 600 adult Mennonites live within shopping distance of the village. Mennonites settled in the county in 1894 and now have four churches in the area. They are members of the Mennonite Brethren, Church of God in Christ Mennonite, General Conference Mennonites, and Church of God (Penner's). J.J.M.

Fairview (Okla.) Church of God (Gemeinde Gottes) is a branch of the Apostolische Brüdergemeinde (q.v.), which was originated in Russia by Hermann Peters, in close connection with the origin of the Mennonite Brethren. Only a few families of this group came to America in the great migration of the 1870's. Among these was Peter Gaede (q.v.), who came to Hillsboro, Kan., from the Kuban Mennonite settlement, where he originally was a member of the Mennonite Brethren. Because of disagreements in the Kuban he started a new group in cooperation with Jaeckel brothers. Through their zeal and missionary activities, the group found followers among Mennonites and non-Mennonites.

After Gaede's arrival in Kansas he organized near Hillsboro a group consisting mostly of former Mennonite Brethren and Volga Germans, which became known as the "Gaede Church." However, Gaede soon was won to the Seventh-Day Adventists, taking with him a number of his members. Most of the remaining members moved to Oklahoma near Fairview and Orienta, where a Church of God was organized. A. B. Penner, son of Bernhard Penner, was ordained minister Dec. 21, 1898, by Heinrich Peters, brother of Hermann Peters, the founder of the Church of God in Russia. Heinrich Peters was a leader of another small congregation of this group at Mt. Lake, Minn. A. B. Penner died in 1937, having ordained his son Aron A. Penner as his successor on April 4, 1926.

The meetinghouse of the Fairview group, erected around 1914, was originally located near Orienta. In 1952 a church was erected in the town of Fairview. The group consists of some 20 members and those that fellowship with them. Its minister visits smaller groups and families affiliated with his church at other places in Kansas and Canada. The small group has had some great losses in membership. After Gaede left the church near Hillsboro, Abraham Loewen was its leader until he too joined the Seventh-Day Adventists. D. K. Esau left the group in Oklahoma with a number of families and moved to Alberta.

The group emphasizes conversion, baptism by immersion, nonconformity, church discipline, footwashing, head covering for women, wearing of beards for men, the holy kiss, the greeting "Peace be unto you" instead of the regular greetings, and traditional Mennonite practices. The worship services are mostly in German. Sunday school is held on Sunday afternoon, and evening worship on Sunday. Common names in the group are Penner, Koop, Flemming, and Unruh. The North American families of this group were formerly in contact with their mother church in Siberia, the Crimea, and Kuban. The present minister is Aron A. Penner. C.K.

Fairview Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, organized in 1895, is situated four miles southeast of Fairview, Major Co., Okla. Worship services were held in the homes until 1901 when a church was built, which was enlarged in 1920, and again in 1944, so that it now seats 350. The 1953 membership was 235, in the charge of George M. Nichols, assisted by Dan Smith, Fred Penner, Sam W. Koehn, and Elmer Boehs. Weekly Sunday morning and evening worship services, Sunday school, and midweek meetings are being held.

Fairview City Mennonite Brethren Church, formerly North Fairview M.B. Church, a member of the Southern District Conference, is located in the city of Fairview (pop. 3,000), Major Co., Okla. In 1893, when the Cherokee Strip was opened for homesteading, a number of Mennonite Brethren families, who had previously settled in Kansas, filed claims. The group, which in 1900 had about 100 baptized members, met under the leadership of Jacob Kliewer and William Hergert. To accommodate families living at a distance two churches were erected in 1895, one four miles south and one four miles north of Fairview. In 1896 Jacob Kliewer was ordained leader of the North Fairview group. Members of both churches met for union services and communion once a month until 1900, when each group began to meet independently. When the congregation decided to build its new church in the city, membership rose from 106 in 1947 to 217 in 1949, most of the increase coming from the South Fairview Church. The new church, with a seating capacity of approximately 400, was dedicated May 7, 1950. On Sept. 1, 1951, David J. Wiens was installed as pastor of the Fairview Church. The membership at that time was about 260. On Oct. 7, 1951, the entire membership (135) of the Süd-Hoffnungsfeld Church was received into the fellowship of the Fairview City M.B. Church. The membership in 1954 was 415. D.J.W.

Fairview Conservative Amish Mennonite Church is a part of the Upper Deer Creek-Fairview congregation, located 4 miles north and 2 miles east of Kalona, Iowa. To serve members living in this area a meetinghouse 42 x 60 ft. was built in 1936. Ministers serving this congregation are Elmer G. Swartzendruber, bishop; Albert S. Miller, Jacob J. Miller, and Morris Swartzendruber, ministers; and Noah S. Miller, deacon. The 1954 membership of the congregation was 470. (See Upper Deer Creek.) E.G.S.

Fairview Mennonite Church (MC), located in the village of Fairview, Oscoda Co., northeastern Michigan, a member of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite Conference, was organized with 35 members on Feb. 2, 1904. Eli A. Bontrager was the first pastor. In 1953 the church had a membership of 391, under the leadership of Bishop Harvey Handrich. Other ministers who have served the congregation are Menno Esch, N. Z. Yoder, L. A. Kauffman, Moses S. Steiner, and Floyd Yoder; the deacon in 1953 was Otis J. Bontrager. Menno Esch served as bishop 1909-52. M.Es.

Fairview Mennonite Church (MC), a rural congregation near Minot, Ward Co., N.D. A group of 22 members organized a congregation, having ordained I. S. Mast, one of their number, to the ministry in March 1903 in the Kishacoquillas Valley of Pennsylvania. They arrived in Surrey, N.D., on April 2, 1903, built the church, and dedicated it on Thanksgiving Day of 1905. In 1908 the first church conference was held and I. S. Mast was ordained bishop. In 1911, 12 members withdrew and joined the Nazarenes. In 1914 L. S. Glick was ordained a minister and served until 1930. The congregation has sponsored two mission Sunday schools. L. A. Kauffman served as pastor 1930-45. In 1931 R. E. Myers was ordained deacon and served until 1939. In 1942 Floyd Kauffman was ordained minister and S. K. Zook deacon; both are still serving the congregation. In 1944 Floyd Kauffman was ordained bishop. The congregation has besides the regular meetings a quarterly Sunday-school meeting, and a summer Bible school. The membership in 1955 was 52. F.E.K.

Fairview Mennonite Church (MC), located 6 miles southeast of Albany, Ore., a member of the Pacific Coast Conference, was organized in 1895 with 12 members. Church services were held in a Dunkard church building approximately 8 miles southeast of Albany until 1911, when the meetinghouse was built at the present location. Jacob Roth served the congregation as first minister and as bishop until 1903. Christian R. Gerig, who came to this community from Iowa, was ordained bishop in 1904 and served until 1930. Since May 1938 Nick M. Birky has served the congregation as bishop. In 1954 the ministers were Henry Gerig and Ivan Headings, and the deacon was Verle Nofziger; the membership was 372. The congregation was a member of the Amish Conference until the Amish and Mennonite Church Conferences were united into the Pacific Coast Conference. Immigration from midwestern states has been an important factor in the growth of the church. A.L.

Fairview Mennonite Home, Preston, Ont., a home for the aged, owned and operated by the Mennonite (MC) Conference of Ontario, was dedicated on Feb. 10, 1956, with John A. Cressman as superintendent. It has a capacity of 92 beds, 75 for guests and 17 for staff. A bed-patient wing provides facilities to care for 20 chronically ill or convalescent patients. It is the successor to the former Braeside Home (q.v.) at Preston. H.S.B.

Fairview Old Order Mennonite Church, located in Lebanon Co., Pa., was started in 1915, when a group who had settled experimentally in Osceola Co., Iowa, came to Lebanon County. They worshiped in a schoolhouse, and John A. Weaver of the Pike Mennonite Church, Hinkletown, Pa., preached the first sermon. In 1917 they entered larger quarters two miles north of Myerstown. On Jan. 1, 1928, most of this group joined the Old Order Mennonites, with Moses Horning as bishop. Since the price of land in Lancaster County was very high, the O.O.M. (Martinites) congregation in Lebanon County increased in numbers. Beginning in January 1938 they rented the Royer Brethren Church, and in the summer of 1943 built a commodious brick meetinghouse two miles south of Myerstown. Milo Lehman was ordained to the ministry on June 1, 1944, and Aaron Horning on Dec. 1, 1954. Joseph Hostetter had the bishop charge. The membership in 1954 was 250. I.D.L.

Fairview Street Mennonite Mission (MC), Reading, Pa., grew out of a need for more room at the Twelfth Street Mission. A small number of families who had been attending the Mennonite services at the Twelfth Street Mission moved to the southeast end of Reading. Since there was no church of any denomination in the immediate area, and many children wanted to attend Sunday school, a dwelling was rented for that purpose in 1932.

The Fairview Street Mission was opened under J. B. Gehman, who was then in charge of the mission work in Reading with its center at Twelfth and Windsor streets.

After the work had grown a few years preaching services and congregational life were established. The double house in which the Sunday school had been held was bought and renovated. It now has a roomy chapel in the first floor, Sunday-school rooms, and living quarters for mission workers. Luke L. Horst, minister, his family, and two workers, Elsie Gehman and Ireta Gassman, have been living here and assisting regularly at all three of the missions in Reading.

The Sunday school is the largest regular activity, usually about 125. The summer Bible school has the largest attendance, usually reaching 200.

Faith Memorial Mennonite Church (GCM) of Filer, Idaho, a member of the Pacific District Conference, was organized on March 6, 1955, with 19 members. A church with a seating capacity of 140 is in process of building, based on a former Dutch Reformed church. The minister (1956) is W. Harley King.

Faith Mennonite Church (GCM) is located 1 mile west and 3½ miles south of Greensburg, Kiowa Co., Kan. After conducting Sunday school and church services in a schoolhouse for about two years under the leadership of Dennis Smith, the congregation organized in 1948 with 18 charter members and joined the Western District Conference. Curt D. Boese, the first resident pastor, began his full-time service on Sept. 1, 1950. A frame church with full basement was built and dedicated on July 27, 1952. In 1955 the membership was 35, with Vernon Lohrentz as pastor. C.D.B.

Fak (Fack), a Dutch Mennonite family, originally from Flanders. From about 1630 they are found in Vlissingen, Dutch province of Zeeland, while at the end of the 17th century some members also lived at Rotterdam, where Hieronymus Fack was a deacon of the Waterlander congregation. vdZ.

Fälber, Leonhard (erroneously called Föller), an Anabaptist leader who was known by various names. It is probable that the names Lenaert van Ysenbroeck, Leonhard of Eschenbroich (Rembert, 450; DB 1909, 117 f.), Leenaert van Maastricht (Hochhuth, 638), Leonhard (Lenhart) von Fritzlar (Lenz, 321), Leonhard in Geldern (Bouterwek, 56, 78), and Leenaert Unusels (q.v., DB 1909, 117 f.) designate the same person. Krohn (338) erroneously identifies him with Leonhard Jost of Strasbourg.

Leonhard Fälber was a native of Brackel (Brachelen), a village in the duchy of Jülich, Germany, where he left his wife behind. He was "of small stature and wore a black coat." As an apostle of the Anabaptists he was especially active in Hesse. In the duchy of Jülich in 1536-41 he baptized at Dieteren, Born, Sittard, and Dremmen. In Brackel he organized a congregation. One of his most prominent converts was Johannes Kesselflicker (q.v.) in 1541. He was probably a man of some education. "He liked to speak," says Noviomagus, "of the power of the living Word that leads a man from the evil to the good and completely renews him. His sermons reveal dialectic skill and rhetorical rhythm; quite moderate in form, he did not, however, conceal his contempt for the established church and its dead word, which nowhere put an end to the sinful and contaminated life of its adherents" (Wappler, 72).

In 1536 he was seized with about 30 other Anabaptists at a meeting in an abandoned church near Gmünden on the Wohra in the district of Kassel and put into prison at Wolkersdorf and then at Marburg, where they were for a while lightly confined. They could leave their prison for weeks and preach in the community. Repeated attempts were made to change their views. The chancellor Feige had already despaired of any success and when an interview on Oct. 15, 1538, again ended in failure, he expressed the opinion "that Fälber, if he had an opportunity, would conduct himself like the Münsterite king." Bucer (q.v.) was more successful when he disputed with them on Oct. 30 and Nov. 1. Hochhuth (638-42) presents the conversation between Fälber and Bucer verbatim. On Dec. 9, 1538, they presented to the Landgrave a document prepared by Peter Tasch (q.v.), and signed by Fälber and eight companions, entitled "Bekenntnis oder Antwort etlicher Fragstücke oder Artikeln der gefangenen Täufer oder anderer im Lande zu Hessen." It is not a true recantation, but rather an essentially modified confession of their faith; Bucer and the Hessian clergy were not entirely satisfied with it, but nevertheless were willing to pardon them and receive them into the church (Hochhuth, 612-26). Their position on separation, the oath, and attitude toward government they surrendered. Concerning infant baptism they said they would not condemn those who baptized their children, because they thought such baptism was based on the Scripture, but neither could they yet recognize it as God's plan.

Leonhard Fälber apparently joined the Protestant Church with the others. Nothing more is heard of him. Neff.

Falder (Het), usually called 't Falder, now a part of Emden, Germany, consisted during the 16th century of the two villages, Gross- and Klein-Falder. By 1557 it was outwardly a unit with Emden and in 1574 Edzard II incorporated it with Emden. Anabaptists were found here from 1529, and Dirk Philips died here in 1568. Of the more than 600 individuals baptized by Leenaert Bouwens in 1551-82 in East Friesland, 320 are listed under 't Falder and only some 90 in Emden (1551-54, 42; 1554-56, 67; 1557-61, 27; 1563-65, 184). It is likely that in the two villages the Anabaptists enjoyed greater toleration. There was no congregation here; the members belonged to the congregations of Emden (q.v.) and Emderland (q.v.). Much of their activity no doubt took place in this part of the town of Emden (q.v.). Even today old Emden citizens point out a place where the Mennonite Vermaning (meetinghouse) was located. 't Falder was not as severely damaged as the interior of the city in World War II. This section of the town is clearly visible from the balcony of the present Mennonite church. C.K.

Falk, Jakob, an Anabaptist martyr of Gossau in the district of Grüningen, canton of Zürich, Switzerland, one of the most zealous and faithful followers of Conrad Grebel. He was imprisoned in 1525 at Appenzell with Heini Reimann. On a Sunday of May 1526 they took part in a meeting in the Herrliberg forest between Rubikon and Wetzikon, which was surprised and broken up by the magistrate (Amtmann) Berger. They told Berger fearlessly that they had been baptized and had baptized others, although they knew it was punishable by death to do so, and intended to continue. The magistrate and the Zürich council now expected the Grüningen authorities to inflict capital punishment on them in accord with the mandate of the Zürich council issued on March 7. The authorities refused to do this, on the basis of an ancient privilege granted by Austria. The dispute was referred to the courts in Bern. The matter was not decided until 1528, when it was placed in the hands of the Zürich council. After an imprisonment of more than 18 months because they "remained obstinate"—Falk declared that he would continue to baptize, strengthened only by the Son of God, who would never leave him—they were sentenced to death and drowned at Zürich at 1:00 on the afternoon of Sept. 5, 1528. This was the second Anabaptist execution in Zürich. His brother Hans Falk, a tanner, was also a zealous Anabaptist, with whom Berger also had much trouble. NEFF.

Falkenstein, a market village in Lower Austria, southeast of Nikolsburg, acquired special interest in Mennonite history through the surprise on Steinabrunn (q.v.), where the Anabaptists were seized and taken to the Falkenstein castle in chains. The castle is now in ruins. In the vicinity there were many Anabaptists, according to the books of Christoph Andreas Fischer (q.v.). About 1550 the priest Niklas Woisch reported to the authorities that four or five of his predecessors had had to deal with Anabaptists. He himself is reported to have joined them. At any rate, all that Fischer relates about affairs in Veldsberg applies also to Falkenstein. LOSERTH.

Falkenstein was the name of the first Mennonite settlement of Galicia, Poland. It was established in 1784 by seven Mennonite families from Falkenstein in the Palatinate, Germany. The families were Michael Bachmann, Christian Ewy, Daniel Ewy, Peter Krehbiel, Josef Mündlein, Johannes Schrag and his son Jakob Schrag. Johannes Schrag, Peter Krehbiel, and Josef Mündlein with others left Galicia in 1796, joined the Hutterites at Vishenka, Chernigov, Russia, whence they went to Volhynia and became the progenitors of the Swiss-Volhynian Mennonites of Kansas and Dakota.

The village of Falkenstein was settled in the shape of a cross. It consisted of 36 homesteads, of which 29 were settled by German Lutherans and the seven in the western part of the village by Mennonites. This settlement project was sponsored by the Austrian government, which paid a part of the transportation and prescribed the building plans, each farmer receiving 35 acres of land.

Descendants of the Bachmanns, the Ewys, and other settlers emigrated to America in 1882. In 1934 only two of the original Mennonite farms were still owned by Mennonites and there were altogether five farms owned by Mennonites in Falkenstein. (See Galicia, Poland.) C.K.

Falling Spring Reformed Mennonite Church, near Chambersburg, Franklin Co., Pa., had a membership of 14 in 1948. The first members were baptized in 1841 and the first meetinghouse, on the Falling Spring road, was built in 1847. The present edifice was constructed in 1903. J.L.K.

Falls Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, was located in Niagara Co., N.Y., near Sanborn village about 10 miles east of Niagara Falls. According to D. K. Cassel, Hans Witmer and Abraham Witmer came here from Lancaster about 1810. David Habecker (1791-1889), who came from Pennsylvania in 1832 and was ordained in 1834, was the only minister. A meetinghouse on his property came into use soon after settlement. J. Treichler (d. 1897) was the first deacon. This congregation never was strong.

Regular communion services continued until 1870, and preaching appointments were recorded until 1884. With Jacob Krehbiel active in the neighboring Clarence community for the General Conference group and the inactivity of the aged Habecker, the scattered members lost interest in the Falls congregation. On the flyleaf of Habecker's Bible is found the statement that he had read it more than 50 times. He studied it with the aid of a Greek lexicon.

Familists, the members of the "Family of Love," a brotherhood founded about 1540 by Hendrik Niclaes (q.v.). It had a pantheistic mystic character. The leadership lay in the hands of a bishop, assisted by 12 elders and 4 classes of priests. The priests were required to give up all personal property, and lay members to tithe. The brotherhood found adherents in Holland, where they are last mentioned in 1649, and especially in England, where it existed until the end of the 17th century. They were often associated in the popular mind with the Anabaptists. Even Samuel Cramer called them "without doubt, real Anabaptists" (BRN VII, 286). But they had nothing in common but their discipline and their demand for a "holy" church. "It is a peculiar mixture of spiritualistic mysticism, Catholic hierarchy, and the Anabaptist brotherhood ideal, together with a strong emphasis on the perfection and oneness with God of the original creation which is to be re-established" (Troeltsch). Family. The Mennonite concept of the family is closely related to other Protestant groups, although there are some differences. An early characteristic among the peaceful Anabaptists along these lines was the emphasis on a union of heart and mind and a common loyalty to God. This emphasis on the devotion to a common cause, ideal, and community, transcending the personal preferences, was an outstanding feature of early Anabaptist family life. Only if this is realized can other characteristics be understood. The individual who entered into a covenant with God and joined the church of believers owed his first and supreme allegiance to God. For this reason marriages outside this covenant (church) were not desirable nor permissible. If a member of the church transgressed and was consequently banned, the marriage partner within the church was expected to conform to the regulations and standards of the congregation to the point of "shunning" the marriage partner outside the fold. The body of Christ and its members and their well-being were considered primary, and personal matters, even in family life, secondary. For this reason a member of the church severed his relationship by marrying outside the church. In many instances this was even the case when a person from a conservative group married into a more tolerant branch of Mennonites. All this is in line with Roland H. Bainton's observation regarding the characteristics of marriage and family life during the days before the Reformation and also afterwards. The Middle Ages emphasized the sacramental nature of marriage and family life. Love and companionship were not prerequisites for marriage. In a more "romantic age" love was emphasized, although not necessarily as a prerequisite for marriage. It was during the Reformation and particularly among the Anabaptists that a third stage came about. This was the idea that it is essential that marriage partners have the same ideals and thus become life companions.

Attention must also be called to a much advertised and exaggerated development among the Münsterite Anabaptists (1534 f.) pertaining to marriage and family life. Although originally the Anabaptists and Münsterites were strictly monogamic with high ethical ideals based on the covenant idea, through Jan van Leiden's example and the introduction of the Old Testament pattern for an Anabaptist kingdom at Münster polygamy was introduced, partly to take care of the women whose husbands had been killed during the siege of the city. This occurrence on the periphery of Anabaptism during the 16th century has been exploited by the opponents of the movement and used to "prove" a lack of ethical conduct in all Anabaptists. With the fall of Münster this development came to a close without finding imitation anywhere in Mennonite history.

Literature and illustrations emphasize a strong family life among Mennonites. It is true it was patriarchal in the early days (see picture by Aurèle Robert, "The Anabaptist or the Bernese Farm," Lausanne, Switzerland). The basis for an integrated harmonious and strong family life lies in the emphasis on common ideals for which families and groups were willing to sacrifice property and homes and even their lives, migrating from country to country. Hardships experienced in isolation not only tied the members of one family closer together, but also united groups of families. Living in closely knit small groups in isolation and practicing nonconformity to the world over longer periods of time not only emphasized and strengthened family relationships, but also caused marriage among relatives. Although there seems to have been strong opposition to this practice and conferences have been held to discuss this matter (ML I, 516), the practice could hardly be avoided as long as Mennonites were opposed to outside marriages and lived in small isolated communities. Gustav E. Reimer, who studied five Mennonite congregations in America, mostly of Prussian background, has shown that marriage among first and second cousins has been quite common among Mennonites, particularly of rural groups. He found that in the Whitewater Mennonite community of 93 young men, 15 were related to less than half of all the girls in the community, 24 to more than half, and 6 to more than three fourths. Fifty-three boys were related to 44 girls. However, Reimer suggests that there probably have not been more consanguine marriages among Mennonites than among other similar rural groups. He also comes to the conclusion that the results of consanguinous marriages in the number of defective offspring do not seem to be greater than in families where the marriage partners are not related. Such marriage tends to double in children certain traits common to both partners, both desirable and undesirable. It seems, however, that some of the children with weaknesses tend to remain unmarried and that endogamic marriages cause the group to withdraw from society and that the chances for successful outside contacts are weakened.

The practices of proposing for marriage among Mennonites were in harmony with earlier concepts of marriage and family life and differ considerably from our day. Among the Swiss Anabaptists and their conservative descendents (Amish), the practice was based literally on Genesis 24. The deacon (q.v.) or Steckelmann (q.v.) among the Swiss and the deacon or Umbitter (q.v.) among the Prussian Mennonites were entrusted by the family of the young man with the task of presenting the proposal to the chosen girl's parents. After this initial contact he himself came to the home of the girl of his choice. D. Chodowiecky's "The Mennonite Marriage Proposal" and Cornelis Troost's illustrations to Asselijn's Jan Klaasz (Mauritshuis, The Hague) have featured this event. This practice was also observed among the early Anabaptists of the Netherlands. The Wismar Articles of 1554 define the views and practices along these lines. It was stated that children should not marry secretly, should consult their parents before taking steps along these lines, but that they should be given an opportunity to make their own decisions (Brons, 99). This was again stressed in the Twelve Articles of the Frisian Mennonites which were presented annually to the congregations in 1639-1716, stating that young people should not marry without the consent of the parents, that boys and girls should not associate too freely, that the approaching marriage should be properly announced, and that weddings should not be too elaborate, but "in the fear of the Lord and according to the example of Tobit" (Brons, 130). In 1765 regret was expressed in the Danzig congregation that the good old practice of having the Umbitter present the proposal was gradually being given up (ML I, 516).

The engagement was announced from the pulpit, after which the young couple visited day after day with relatives of the community. The marriage usually took place two weeks after the announcement of the engagement, to which occasion not only all relatives, but often the whole community was invited. The weddings were plain but all guests were served a regular full meal, and friends and relatives from a distance stayed for a number of meals.

For a long time the Mennonite ministers had to struggle to obtain permission to marry their own church members and to have the officials recognize such a marriage. In Germany the last barriers were not removed until 1918. In the Netherlands this was achieved at an earlier date. In Russia and in America Mennonites never confronted any problems along these lines.

The Mennonite family has been traditionally large. In Russia the population doubled within a generation (25 years), which is still the case among the Old Colony Mennonites in Mexico. In 1926 the Manitoba Mennonite settlement in Mexico had a total population of 3,340, and in 1949 it had increased to 7,706, which indicates that it did not even take twenty-five years to double their number. Similar increases can be found in conservative isolated rural Mennonite settlements. In Galicia the increase was 30 per thousand annually and among the Hutterites it was 45.9 per thousand in 1946-50, which is almost double the national rate (24.2). Reimer found that the average number of children of the Mennonite community of Whitewater, Kan., was 7.45 in 1876-84; 6.11 in 1885-1900; 6.21 in 1901-10; 7.11 in 1911-18; and 3.5 in 1919-24. The average for the Amish of Elkhart Co., Ind., was about 8 and for the Hutterites about 10. The age of marriage for men at Whitewater was 28.2 and for girls 22.85 in 1885-1900; for men 28.16 and for girls 22.74 in 1901-10; and for men 28.65 and 23.78 for girls in 1911-18. Statistics for the Mennonites of Prussian background in Nebraska were similar. The age of marriage among the Amish and Hutterites is lower. These statistics also correspond somewhat with those available regarding the Mennonites of Russia. From 1890 to 1910 the average number of children per family was seven; and in 1911-25 there was a gradual decrease to an average of five, which was mostly due to the impact of World War I, the Revolution, and other outside factors. By the time of the outbreak of World War II there was only one child per family. The main reason for this decrease was that most of the young men had been exiled (Stumpp, Tafel K.).

One of the striking observations regarding the old-fashioned Mennonite family of the Prusso-Russian background is that widowers would usually remarry soon after the death of a spouse. In this case they would quite often marry a much younger girl instead of a widow. Records prove that this observation is not an exception but a rule. As an example we mention Bernhard Harder (q.v.), whose wife died on Oct. 13, 1878, and who remarried on Feb. 13, 1879. This was comparatively a "long" period of mourning. Schmiedehaus reports that among the Old Colony Mennonites remarriage after a few weeks is common. (See also Birth Rate and Marriage.) C.K.

Some of the best descriptions of the Mennonite family and home of Prusso-Russian background can be found in Peter Epp, Eine Mutter (Bluffton, Ohio, 1932); Arnold Dyck, Verloren in der Steppe (Steinbach, Man., 1944-48); L. Family in Mennonite History and Life in America. Any attempt to describe the nature and significance of the family in Mennonite life and thought is unfortunately handicapped by a number of limiting factors. The more important of these limitations are:

(1) The paucity of sociological studies of Mennonites in general, and the Mennonite family in particular; (2) the highly subjective nature of many of the references to aspects of family life found in the existing literature on Mennonites; (3) the lack of adequate descriptive materials on the Mennonite family before the present century, with which present-day family patterns may be compared; (4) the marked differences in religious beliefs and cultural traits in the area of family life found between the various branches of Mennonites today.

In the last decade a few pioneer studies of an objective, scientific nature have been made of specific Mennonite groups. Notable among these studies, which give some attention to family organization, are (1) Walter Kollmorgen's cultural anthropological study of the Old Order Amish of Lancaster Co., Pa.; (2) an exhaustive study of the Hutterite colonies of the United States and Canada by a research team headed by Professor Joseph W. Eaton of Wayne University; (3) the study of the Mennonites in Paraguay by J. W. Fretz; (4) John A. Hostetler's studies on the Amish, particularly in Mifflin Co., Pa.; (5) extensive research on Mennonite settlements in Mantitoba by E. K. Francis; and (6) the Mennonite family census conducted in 1950 by the Mennonite Research Foundation.

It should also be noted that several Mennonite church historians have included brief but helpful descriptions of Mennonite family traits in their historical works. These include John C. Wenger's history of Franconia Mennonites, Melvin Gingerich's study of the Mennonites of Iowa, and John Umble's study of the Amish Mennonites of Union Co., Pa. Limited studies of family size, marriage, and birth and death rates have been made on Mennonite groups in a few local areas. It is obvious that the foregoing isolated, though valuable, studies of Mennonite life can present at best only a fragmentary picture of family organization among Mennonites as a whole. A more complete analysis of the Mennonite family must await additional years of painstaking research by qualified scholars both within and without the Mennonite faith.

The fourth limiting factor mentioned above refers to the cultural variations between existing Mennonite bodies. Although there is general subscription to the central doctrines of Anabaptist-Mennonite faith by all Mennonite branches, the practical applications of these doctrines vary markedly. At one end of the cultural continuum are the very rural, conservative Amish and Hutterite bodies with their many distinguishing overt cultural traits. At the other end of the continuum are the most "progressive" or "liberal" bodies, such as the General Conference Mennonites and the Mennonite Brethren in Christ, whose overt cultural traits are not so easily distinguishable from the dominant American cultural pattern.

Cultural variation among Mennonite bodies is clearly reflected in family traits and organization. Courtship patterns, marriage ceremonies, authority patterns, family size, attitudes toward divorce, attitudes toward birth control, and other aspects of the family vary considerably between Mennonite bodies. For that reason, generalizations about the "Mennonite family" are frequently difficult and sometimes impossible. Frequent reference must be made to specific groups, and differences noted between them.

Because of the limited nature of information available, this article deals almost entirely with five American groups: Old Order Amish, Hutterian Brethren, General Conference Mennonites, Mennonites of Paraguay, and the Mennonite Church (MC). The omission of other Mennonite groups is due solely to lack of materials.

As in all cultures, the family is the primary social institution among Mennonites. In the Mennonite culture, however, the family has been especially significant. This is true in part because the Mennonites fortify the family institution with a literal interpretation of the Scriptures, and in part because in the more than four hundred years of their history they have been largely agrarian. Mennonite culture patterns have frequently been forged in frontier settlement conditions, such as in Russia, United States, Canada, Mexico, and Paraguay. The rigors of pioneering have always made great demands on the institution of the family.

Mennonites believe in the words of God when He said concerning Adam, "It is not good for man to be alone" (Gen. 2:18). Considerable social pressure is normally exerted against the bachelor and "old maid." With regard to size of family Mennonites tend to accept literally God's command to Noah, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth" (Gen. 9:1).

The Mennonite family is strictly monogamous. Marriage is regarded as a sacred union to be consummated only "in the Lord" and to be sustained "until death do us part." Divorce occurs very rarely, and is strictly taboo except for reason of adultery as permitted in Matthew 19:9. Among the Amish, divorce, desertion, or separation does not exist. Any party to such a marriage dissolution would become the object of severe social disapproval. This is slightly less true in certain sections of the most liberal Mennonite bodies, where not only has an occasional divorce occurred, but where there have been a few instances of the remarriage of divorced persons, such persons at the same time retaining church membership. A 1952 study of 52 mission stations maintained by the Mennonite Church (MC) revealed that six persons on membership rolls were divorced. In rare cases a divorcee may be found on the roll of an established congregation in the Mennonite Church (MC). The remarriage of a divorced church member would not be permitted in any Amish or Mennonite (MC) congregation. Only one divorce and two separations have occurred among the Hutterites since their settlement in the United States over 70 years ago.

Courtship and mate selection practices vary considerably along the conservative-liberal Mennonite continuum. Amish young people begin to "run around" at about 16 or 17 years of age. Dating is carried on more secretly than openly, and its purpose is solely to find a mate. The American pattern of extensive "casual dating" (that is, dating different persons without intent to court), carried on very openly and with a great amount of romantic sentimentality, is simply not found among the Amish. Amish young men and women have frequent opportunities for mingling, but "pairing off" takes place largely at the close of an evening social event, and couples rarely appear in public together until near the time of the wedding.

In the less conservative Mennonite branches, the conventional American dating and courtship practices prevail. A considerable amount of casual dating takes place. After a period of from several months to several years of "going steady," the successful courtship eventuates in engagement. Traditionally among American Mennonites and Amish Mennonites engagements have not been announced (see (Courtship), but this custom is changing.

Among the Mennonites of South America "young people may fraternize informally at times of church gatherings such as weddings, funerals, and religious holidays, but the idea of a young man or woman dating many different individuals is as unfamiliar to the young people in the colonies as it was to our grandparents" (Fretz, chapter IV).

In the Mennonite colonies of South America it is customary for the minister to announce engagements at the close of a Sunday morning worship service. Among the Amish, engagements are not announced, but "publishing the banns" is required. Publishing the banns is also customary among the Hutterites and, in general, among most European Mennonites, including those who have immigrated from Europe in recent decades. The practice is found also among some conservative congregations in the M.C. group. However, in most present-day M.C., G.C.M., and related branches, the custom has been dropped.

Data from the M.C. family census (1950) show that for M.C. males first marriages have occurred at the average age of 24.8 years. The corresponding average for females was 23.3 years. The median age at marriage for Mennonite women was 21.7 years. For all persons married for the first time in the United States in 1950 the median age at marriage was 20.3 for women and 22.8 for men. The median age at marriage in 1950 for Hutterite marriages was 23.5 for men and 22.0 for women. For the Amish, Hostetler reports that "on the average, girls marry at 22 and boys at about 24. The normal age for marriage ranges from 18 to 26." These data suggest that Mennonites tend to marry at slightly older ages than the United States population as a whole, and that the age span between husband and wife is somewhat less. Eaton and Mayer discovered that the age at marriage has been increasing among Hutterites. For the United States, age at marriage has been decreasing. Trend data are not yet available for other Mennonite groups.

Data on marriage rates are available only for the Hutterites. Eaton and Mayer discovered that Hutterites have a very high marriage rate. By the age of 45 less than 2 per cent of all Hutterites remain unmarried. For the United States as a whole, 8 per cent of men and 7 per cent of women had not married by the age of 45, a rate which is high compared to other countries.

In many congregations (MC) known to the writer the number of unmarried women of marriageable age is considerably larger than the number of unmarried men of marriageable age. It is probable that greater numbers of young men than of young women leave the church, causing an excess of unmarried women. An investigation should be made as to whether this may be a general pattern for Mennonites, and if so, how it may affect the female marriage rate.

Available data indicate that Mennonites (MC) have larger families than is true for the United States as a whole. The average completed family in the United States today has 3.1 children. The average completed Hutterite family has 10.4 children. For Paraguayan Mennonites the figure is 8.4 children. In a Pennsylvania Amish community the average completed Amish family was found to have 7-8 children. The family census study indicated that completed M.C. families have 4.9 children. The data also indicate that there is a direct relation between Mennonite conservatism and large families. Of four Mennonite groups studied in Elkhart Co., Ind., the G.C.M. had the smallest families, and the Amish the largest. Since urban families in general have fewer children than farm families, the rurality of the conservative groups no doubt is a major factor in the larger family size. Birth control practice may partially explain variations in family size. Hutterite and Amish families shun all methods of birth control, whereas the more educated and urbanized Mennonite families frequently practice birth control. The more liberal groups do not oppose such practice.

As is usual in rural societies, the Mennonite family is the basic unit in other social institutions of the community. Parents seldom attend functions without their children. Only among the more urbanized, progressive families in recent times has "baby sitting" become more common. The entire family normally attends church services, weddings, funerals, picnics, and other social events as a unit. It is customary to bring infants to church as soon as they are old enough to be taken anywhere, not infrequently as young as six weeks.

The home also tends to be the center of social and religious events. Among the "house Amish," who have no meetinghouses, church services and all other events take place in the homes of the members. Among most Mennonite groups, family reunions, neighborhood get-togethers, and young people's social and literary events usually take place in homes. Among the more urbanized Mennonite congregations, however, such events tend to be scheduled outside the home either in church or community facilities.

Religion plays an important role in the Mennonite family. Grace at meals (usually audible, sometimes silent) is universal, and probably the most overt religious activity in the home. In addition, many homes have some type of family worship. In some cases family worship is perfunctorily routine with little variety or imagination. The extreme of this is where the father daily reads a passage of Scripture and leads in prayer. In other cases considerable variation in programing, in participation of all members of the family, and in the use of music is to be found. Church conference resolutions frequently call attention to the need for stronger and more extensive family worship programs in Mennonite families. Ministers periodically exhort parents to establish "family altars." Nevertheless statistics gathered through the Sunday schools in 1952 indicate that only about 30 per cent of M.C. families have some form of family worship.

Other religious traits found in Mennonite homes include religious wall mottoes, religious literature, and collections of sacred music on records. The latter item, however, would not appear in Amish homes.

More significant than material traits is the role that religion plays in the inner life of the family members. The Spirit of God, when manifest in the lives of family members, yields the fruits of the Spirit: love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, and temperance. It is by such spiritual qualities that the highest and noblest in human relationships is achieved, in the family as elsewhere. Mennonites have perhaps succeeded in manifesting these spiritual qualities in their interpersonal relationships to a greater extent than the bulk of the human race. This is not to overlook the fact, however, that some Mennonite families seriously lack these qualities, and give evidence of maladjustment, either between mates or between parents and children, or both. In marriages which are basically unhappy, the mates tend to endure each other, working out some type of accommodation rather than dissolve the marriage.

The recognition of family frictions has led the more progressive Mennonite churches to give attention to family life education. Through sermons, Sunday schools, Sunday evening services, and special conferences and institutes increasing attention is being given to the social, psychological, and spiritual factors which affect the success of family living. In 1952 the M.C. Commission for Christian Education prepared a series of popularly written booklets on courtship and family relations. Careful studies should be made of discipline methods, authoritarian controls, and other aspects of parent-child interaction in Mennonite families to discover their effect on the personality development of Mennonite youth.

With respect to authority, Mennonite families are patriarchal. The degree of authority exercised by the head of the family varies considerably among the Mennonite branches, and between families within a given branch. Patriarchal forms are most strongly evidenced among the conservative Amish and Hutterite groups. Traditional forms stemming from European culture of centuries ago have been fairly well preserved to this day among these groups. On the other hand, the M.C. in the United States and Canada, and particularly certain sections of the G.C.M., have assimilated many of the equalitarian, democratic, and individualistic values and ideals of the dominant American culture. Mennonites of recent immigration from Europe to Canada, Mexico, and South America reflect the more authoritarian patterns of Old World patriarchal family life.

Among the Mennonites of North America it should be noted that the process of assimilation is bringing about some notable changes in family organization. Among the more "modernized" Mennonite families the husband is likely to share much of the decision-making process with his wife and children. Family devotions may be on a more democratic basis. The wife has in some cases come to share in the management of family finances. She is likely to share with her husband in property ownership. She may have a joint bank account with him. She may assume more leadership in the church and community than was formerly thought correct. Sex differentiation tends to disappear in the seating arrangement in church. The wife, and even the mother, has in some cases taken a job outside the home and thus shares with her husband in the "breadwinning" process. The Amish mother, writes Hostetler, would be horrified by the thought of working outside the home and at the same time trying to raise a family. The Amish husband is still occasionally seen walking ahead of, rather than beside his wife. On festive occasions among the Amish the men are always served before the children and women. The women are expected to "keep silence in the churches" (I Cor. 14:34).

Concerning Paraguayan Mennonites, Fretz relates: "A North American visitor is likely to be impressed with the way the woman of the house plays the role of servant. In the writer's many home calls, the woman was seldom present during the visit, and in most instances, where the visit took place over mealtime, only the husband and guest were seated at the table. The wife generally served the food, but only in a few instances did she take part in the conversation."

Discipline in Mennonite and Amish homes is generally strict, and children are carefully taught to obey their parents and the rulings of the church. It appears that discipline may on some occasions be too strongly administered, resulting in the arresting of healthy personality development, and in the rejection of the authority of both the parent and the church he represents. On the other hand, there are instances where it appears that discipline is administered too lightly, or, what may even be worse, without consistency.

With respect to mate selection, Mennonites are endogamous. Here again the pattern varies from one group to another. For the Amish, "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers" (II Cor. 6:14) is literally interpreted as "Do not marry a person who is not Amish." M.C. district conferences have often declared that Mennonites should marry only "in the faith," implying within the Mennonite faith. Although basically endogamous, the more culturally liberal groups frown less on the intermarriage of a Mennonite with a member of some other Protestant (especially evangelical) denomination. Nevertheless in the liberal groups there is considerable teaching on the inadvisability of intermarriage. The research findings of Terman, Burgess Cottrell, and other family sociologists are cited in defense of this position. Furthermore it is always hoped that a person marrying outside the Mennonite faith will bring his mate into the Mennonite fold rather than vice versa.

In Mennonite culture the "kinship system" also operates. Grandparents, grandchildren, aunts, uncles, nephews, nieces, cousins, and in-laws are apparently more significant in the lives of Mennonites than in American society at large. This is no doubt partly due to rurality, but is also a result of familistic idealism together with rather highly developed in-group feelings. Much visiting of relatives is carried on. This, of course, diminishes where urban families settle some distance from the home community.

Among Amish congregations church services have been traditionally held only on alternate Sundays. This allowed the intervening Sundays to be used for visiting relatives. Visiting is, of course, very informal, often without benefit of prior invitation. Among the more assimilated Mennonites social etiquette would normally call for at least some advance notice that a family was coming for a meal, or to stay overnight. In most cases a formal invitation would necessarily precede such a visit.

Among the Amish, where familism is very strong, a modification of the "extended family system" may be found. In such a system grandparents, their children, and their grandchildren live together in one household, as for example in traditional China. It is customary for an Amish couple to remain on the farm as long as they live. If financially possible, the couple will obtain farms for the older sons when they marry. A younger son normally will remain on the home farm after he is married, continuing to live with the parents. Instead of all living in the same house, however, a "grossdawdy" house is constructed next to (and often attached to) the main farmhouse. The grandparents and any unmarried daughters occupy this smaller house, while the son's expanding family occupies the main house. The son gradually takes over complete responsibility for the farm.

In Hutterite society, an even stronger familistic system prevails. Over one hundred Hutterite colonies are located in South Dakota, Montana, Alberta, and Manitoba. Organized along communal lines, each colony consists of from 50 to 150 persons of all ages who are for the most part interrelated. The single family unit is, however, strong and clearly defined despite the fact that all property is held in common, all families work together under one management, and live and eat together in one location.

The aged in the Mennonite culture have an unusually secure position compared to aged persons in urban American culture. This is especially true in the Amish and Hutterite groups. The communal system of the Hutterites and the "extended family" relationships among the Amish provide the aged with a life guarantee of care and protection. The aged patriarch retains a role of counselor, if not direct manager, in the affairs of his kinship group. Thus he retains considerable social status in relation to others, a condition usually denied the urban resident, who is frequently forced to retire at an arbitrary age, thus losing the sense of usefulness and responsibility so important to human happiness.

No Amish or Hutterite aged person would be left to a government agency for care as a public ward. It is regarded as not only a disgrace, but also a sin for any child to allow his parents' needs to go unmet.

The same interest and concern shown for the aged also is evidenced in relation to all other defective or dependent persons, such as the physically handicapped and the mentally deficient and deranged. Medical care is normally sought when needed. However, the reluctance of these groups to submit their dependent members to the care of some outside agency has in a few cases resulted in a family's attempting to provide necessary care which they were incapable of giving. Especially among the Amish there prevail a number of superstitious practices and "home remedies" which have on occasion served to deny a family member the necessary physical or mental health care which modern medical and psychiatric practice is able to provide.

Among the other Mennonite branches the aged and dependent family members are also well cared for. As one goes in the direction of the more liberal groups among Mennonite bodies, there is increasing readiness to seek the aid of public and private health and welfare institutions. The inroads of urbanism and secularism weaken the familistic system, and the security of dependent persons is proportionately reduced. There are, however, few Mennonites who become wards of a government agency.

In conclusion it should be noted that the Mennonite family is not static but dynamic. It is true that among the Old Order Amish and Hutterite groups social change is occurring very slowly. Traditional family forms tend to persevere in spite of the unusually dynamic nature of the surrounding American environment. Even the modern inventions of the telephone, the radio, electricity, and modern household appliances have been resisted by the Old Order Amish group, thus offsetting the extensive social and economic changes which such inventions normally precipitate in the family.

The more progressive Mennonite branches have generally welcomed the new inventions which science has offered. While enjoying the conveniences and leisure which these inventions afford, they at the same time are subjected to subtle and fundamental changes, some of which tend toward family disintegration rather than integration. Perhaps no single invention has made a greater impact upon family life than the automobile. The automobile has shortened the time-distance to the hospital, the doctor, the market, the church, and distant relatives. At the same time it has multiplied the potentialities for breaking down the associational pattern of the family unit. Possibly the greatest threat to Mennonite family stability today is the increasing number and complexity of the activities which draw members out of the family into the community institutions and activities round about. Family recreation, for example, which once was about the only type of recreation available, now is maintained only at the price of concerted effort and planning. Even family worship suffers from the blows of irregular and activity-packed time-schedules. The lines of communication between Mennonites and the surrounding increasingly urbanized, secularized, and individualized culture pattern have been multiplied in number and intensity.

Time alone will reveal whether the strong Mennonite familism will withstand the disintegrating forces which increasingly face it. Shall additional Mennonite groups, bent on preserving their familistic culture, cut the lines of communication with surrounding cultures by migrating to the remote areas of the world's remaining frontiers? Or will the sturdy religious and moral convictions of past generations continue to meet the challenges of today? In past generations, Mennonite family stability has been protected partly by compact settlement in geographically and socially isolated rural communities. As this pattern gives way, increasing spiritual resources and a greater awareness of the issues at stake will be needed to meet the challenge of modern urbanization, individualism, and secularization.

Family Almanac, first published in 1870 by John F. Funk & Bro., Elkhart, Ind., was issued annually from 1870 to 1908. Since 1909 it has been published annually by the Mennonite Publishing House, Scottdale, Pa. The issues of 1902-12 inclusive were combined with the Mennonite Yearbook and Directory. Almanac calculations were made by Lawrence J. Ibach 1870-79, L. J. Heatwole 1880-1933, J. T. Sparkman 1934, Hart Wright 1935-55. Edited by Daniel Kauffman 1909-22, John L. Horst 1923-42, Ellrose D. Zook 1943-55. The 1949 issue, with 69 pages and a circulation of 7,000, contained the calendar, almanac calculations, religious articles, general information for the home, and a ministerial directory of the Mennonite Church (MC) and other Mennonite bodies. It was discontinued with the 1955 issue. E.D.Z.

Family History. The study of family history and genealogy, though an ancient and widespread enterprise in western culture, did not become a significant matter among Mennonites until the 20th century. It has had very little vogue in Switzerland, France, or Russia, and little more in Germany, though considerably more in Holland, but has grown to considerable proportions in North America, especially among the descendants of the early Pennsylvania Mennonite and Amish immigrants. The earliest known Mennonite family histories published in Europe are the following published in Holland: Teyler van der Hulst, Stamboek der Teyler's of Geslachtsregister der nakomelingen van Thomas Teyler en Trijntje van de Kerkhoven van 1562-1728 (Haarlem, 1728?); P. B.(eets), Stam-boek der Willingen of geslachtregister der nakomelingen van Jan Willink en Judith Busschers 1591 tot 1767 (Deventer, 1767). The first-known Mennonite family history published in America was The Genealogical Register of the Male and Female Descendants of John Jacob Schnebele now Snively (Chambersburg, 1858). For a complete listing of all known published Mennonite family histories see Genealogy.

In addition to genealogies family history has produced many interesting narratives of pioneer experiences and travels, as well as accounts of customs and practices, and religious and moral behavior. These materials, including other family records and genealogical data, have considerable value for general historical study, and also for specific Mennonite history. The often serious lack of group and congregational records coupled with a meager historical sense in the past seriously handicap the student of Mennonite history, theology, and piety. At times family history materials furnish important or even unique clues and traces, or major illumination. Some published genealogies contain significant historical materials in the introductory chapters.

The Mennonitischer Geschichtsverein of Germany has a section for Family History led by Kurt Kauenhoven. H.S.B.

Family Reunions, social gatherings of descendants of a common ancestor, usually lasting a half day, including an outdoor semireligious program and a picnic meal and often held in a public park, have been rather common among American Mennonites since the beginning of the 20th century. Sometimes the gatherings are small, but at times they develop into enormous meetings of 1,000 to 2,000 persons, and partake more of the nature of a clan gathering than a family meeting. The small reunions commonly meet annually, the larger ones every five years. Among the notably large family reunions of essentially Mennonite character (though with very many non-Mennonite participants) have been the two Stauffer reunions of Waterloo Co., Ont., and Lancaster Co., Pa., the Landis reunions of Lancaster Co. and Bucks Co., Pa., the Burkholder reunion held at Hershey, Pa., the Birky family reunion with meetings alternating between central Illinois; Manson, Iowa; and Kouts, Ind., and the Bender reunion of New Hamburg, Ont.

In Europe, where they are called "Familientag," family reunions have not been widely observed, although the strong development of family history studies in the Nazi period in Germany led to the establishment of a number of family organizations, called "Sippenverband," such as the Kauenhowen and Zimmerman organizations, which held occasional reunion meetings. The German meetings have been rather gatherings of specialists in family history, whereas the American reunions have been primarily for social fellowship and have emphasized appreciation and emulation of the religious and moral virtues of the ancestors. Both groups, however, have often subsidized research in family history as well as the preparation and publication of genealogies or even of family periodicals, such as Mitteilungen des Sippenverbandes der Danziger Mennoniten-Familien and Der Berg; Sippen-Zeitung der Sippe van Bergen, van Bargen. (See Family History.)

The American family reunions often flourish during the second and third and even fourth generation of descendants, to die out gradually as the sense of connection with the first ancestor fades out. The large reunions, often based on a common ancestor of 100-250 years back, usually flourish so long as a few older historians and genealogists with much leisure and some money carry the load of organization and promotion. Famine Relief, as distinct from emergency disaster relief or war sufferers' relief or general relief, has engaged the Mennonite action in three countries: India, China, and Russia.

India. Because of overpopulation and frequent floods and droughts resulting in full or partial crop failures, both India and China have had almost chronic famine conditions for centuries, with occasional extraordinarily extensive famines. The great famine of 1896-97 led to an extensive relief project by the Mennonite Church (MC) in 1897. The Home and Foreign Relief Commission (q.v.) was organized, with headquarters at Elkhart, Ind. A shipload (mostly Mennonite) of corn and beans was sent to Calcutta in early 1897, and George Lambert of Elkhart was sent to India to supervise distribution of this food and given approximately $20,000 in cash for further purchases and services on the spot. He did most of his work through local missions along the central line from Calcutta to Bombay. The establishment of the Mennonite (MC) Mission in the Central Provinces in India in 1899 was a direct result of this relief project, and one of the first mission institutions was an orphanage to care for famine orphans.

In 1899 the General Conference Mennonite Church organized the Emergency Relief Committee which in 1900 sent out David Goerz to India on a mission similar to Lambert's, with some 8,000 bushels of corn and several thousand dollars in cash. The G.C.M. India Mission was started later in the same year and benefited directly from the Goerz relief project, receiving some of the relief funds for distribution.

Both the above India missions continued famine relief at intervals throughout their history. In 1919-22 for instance the M.C. mission received over $56,000 for famine relief.

The serious Bengal famines of 1941-42 and later led to the organization of the Mennonite Relief Committee of India (MRCI, q.v.) on which all the Mennonite missions in India were represented. This committee had oversight of the relief work carried on by the MCC in India in the sending of both supplies and workers. The chief famine relief was in 1942-44. The MRCI was still in existence in 1954.

China. In China the recurring famines were due more to the great floods along the valleys of the main rivers; hence only those Mennonite missions directly in these areas did famine relief work. However, the G.C.M. mission transmitted famine relief money to the China Relief Commission in 1921-23 and leased two missionaries to this opening for relief work in the Yellow River flood area.

Russia. The great famine of 1919-20 led to extensive famine relief work (1) by the American Relief Administration (ARA—Herbert Hoover) (q.v.), which received a $40,000,000 appropriation for this purpose from the U.S. Congress, and (2) by North American Mennonites, as well as on a smaller scale (3) by the Dutch Mennonites. M. B. Fast and W. P. Neufeld took food and clothing to the Mennonites in Siberia in 1919, and the Mennonite Central Committee (MCC), organized in July 1920 specifically for this purpose, in 1920-23 administered relief in food, clothing, and medical supplies to the value of about $1,250,000 in addition to 25 tractor-plow outfits. (See American Mennonite Relief, AMR.) Some 60,000 Mennonites (and 15,000 others) received direct famine relief from the AMR. The Dutch Mennonites organized, also specifically for famine relief in Russia, the General Commission for Foreign Needs (Algemene Commissie voor Buitenlandsche Nooden) in November 1920. Their first supplies reached Russia in early 1922. They worked chiefly in the Molotschna and raised a total of about 400,000 guilders ($160,000) and also contributed seed grain and agricultural implements.

Farel, Guillaume (1489-1565), the ardent friend and co-worker of Calvin (q.v.). He was an unusually energetic pioneer in the Reformation in France, and was particularly enthusiastic in introducing it in Geneva, Switzerland, persuading Calvin to settle there, co-operated in Neuchâtel, and in Metz, France. At first his position was close to that of the Anabaptists; he agreed with them on adult baptism, but was unwilling to forbid infant baptism (letter of Sept. 7, 1527). Zwingli's ideas concerning the Zürich Anabaptists apparently influenced him, but he still defended the Anabaptists against unjust accusations. Later he accepted Calvin's views and took the same position as he against them. NEFF.

Farkenschin (Hungarian, Farkashida), a village an hour and a half from Trnava (Tyrnau), Czechoslovakia, which at the time of the expulsion of the Hutterian Brethren from Moravia belonged to Count Thurzo, who leased them a farm and a mill (1622). Four years later they suffered serious damage from marauding troops, and in 1627 they lost their leader, Uhl Müller, through death. After the devastation of the Thirty Years' War came the Turkish invasions. In 1663 the house was "completely burned down after suffering much larceny and plundering, and as the chronicles relate, our people were lost in the prolonged warfare, so that very few of the Farkaschin people remain; most of them died in continued flight. Thus we lost the house at Farkaschin, including people and possessions." (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 410, 431, 433, 506; ML I, 632.) LOSERTH.

Farm Machinery used by the Mennonites is usually the same as that used in their surrounding communities. Certain conditions have caused some exceptions. As pioneers in less civilized countries, the Mennonites found frequently that no farm machinery was available or that which was available was inferior in quality to what they had been used to in the country they came from. Thus they were compelled to continue making traditional and creating new machinery for the land they were tilling. This has been the case particularly in Russia, where they had an exceptional opportunity to invent and develop the agricultural machinery they needed. To some extent, this is again the case in Paraguay.

When the Mennonites settled in the steppes of the Ukraine at the end of the 18th century, they found only nomadic neighbors and possibly a few Russian peasants tilling the soil with wooden plows and harvesting their crops with a sickle and flail. They soon found the machinery they had brought with them inadequate for the large-scale farming in the Ukraine. Markets for better agricultural machinery were hardly accessible to them. Thus they were compelled to repair and replace their old machinery in their own smithshops, some of which gradually developed into factories for producing machinery more suitable and practical in the new environment.

One of the first implements thus invented was a multiple-share plow known as the "bukker," which appeared on the market before 1850 (Rempel, 248). The first bukkers were made with three or four plowshares. Later five-, six-, and seven-share bukkers became common. The single-share plow with the furrow of about 10 inches in width was, in many cases, replaced by a bukker plowing up to 36 inches and more. Later, about 1880 (Rempel, 251), this bukker was developed into a drill-bukker, a broadcast sower with a seeding box placed on the top of the plow dropping the seed into the open furrow.

The second advance enabling the Mennonites to farm on a much larger scale was the reaper which became known as the "lobogreika" (this Russian word means "brow-sweater"), invented and manufactured by Peter H. Lepp, Chortitza, during the sixties. The lobogreika spread very rapidly in the Mennonite settlements during the seventies and eighties, enabling two men, one as driver and another throwing off the grain in sheaves, to reap from 15 to 18 acres a day, whereas formerly they had reaped only 5 acres by hand. Because of the rapid spread of the lobogreika among the Russian population, this reaper was manufactured by a great number of Mennonite factories such as Koop, Hildebrandt, Neufeld, Klassen, Niebuhr, and Franz and Schröder. It was even produced by the International Harvester Company in Russia. With the coming of the binders at the beginning of the 20th century, the lobogreika was gradually replaced in Mennonite communities, and some Mennonite manufacturers changed to the production of binders. The first binder produced by Mennonites in Russia came from the factory of A. J. Koop in 1914. However, World War I and the following revolution and nationalization of all factories prevented the development and large-scale manufacturing of the binder among the Mennonites.

MENNONITES IN THE

A number of Mennonite manufacturers also produced the "Colonist" single-furrow plow, which found wide acceptance beyond the Mennonite communities. However, the German "Sack" and "Eckert" plows furnished a strong competition. Harrows, wagons, cultivators, drills, winnowers, corn shredders, chaff cutters, weeders, rakes, threshing machines, fanning mills, oil engines, etc., were invented, patented, and produced by Mennonite manufacturers, as well as by non-Mennonite Germans in Russia.

Although the tilling and harvesting machinery had been improved by the end of the century and was manufactured in large quantities, threshing was still primitive. The Mennonites were using a horse-drawn stone roller, running it over the grain on the threshing floor. These threshing stones, with grooves cut lengthwise along the outside, were transplanted to the prairie states and provinces and used in pioneer days (the threshing stone is the emblem of Bethel College). By the end of the century, they were gradually being replaced in Russia by horse-power threshers or, on the larger estates, by motor and steam threshers of English and German make. Mennonite manufacturers produced threshing machines on a large scale, not only for their own communities, but also for the Russian population.

Various types of wagons were produced in Russia since the middle of the past century. The common wagon with steel axles and a wooden box used on the farm became popular far beyond the Mennonite settlements. Spring wagons produced in Mennonite factories were also used by almost all Mennonite farmers. Some of these wagons found their way to the prairie states and provinces of North America, but were soon discarded. One is found in the Tabor College museum, Hillsboro, Kan.

In quality the Mennonite agricultural machinery was far above most of the Russian-produced implements. Some of the larger factories, employing 300 and more workers, were Hildebrandt and Sons, A. J. Koop, Lepp and Wallmann, J. G. Niebuhr, Franz and Schröder, and J. M. Janzen. In addition to these, a great number of small factories and shops could be found in most of the Mennonite settlements. The eight larger Mennonite factories alone produced nearly one tenth of the total Russian output of agricultural machinery, with a total output of 3,162,632 rubles with 1744 workers in 1911. The largest factories were located in Chortitza, Alexandrovsk, and in some of the Molotschna villages. (See also Industry, Agriculture in Russia, and Business in Russia.) C.K.

Farm Trainees. The year 1950 marked the inception of the Mennonite Central Committee European Trainee Program, and in the five years of its existence 123 young men and women between the ages of 18 and 25 have been brought into the United States for a one-year training period. They have come from Germany, the Netherlands, France, Switzerland, Luxembourg, and Japan. The program is officially approved by the Department of State, Washington, D.C., as a program for "practical training in industry, medicine, agriculture, or some other field of knowledge or skill" and in the specific interests of promoting better understanding between the peoples of the various countries represented and in the general interests of international exchange of knowledge and skills in these various fields. It is regarded as an important bridge-building project between the Mennonites of various lands, whereby they may strengthen each other and their faith.

Counselors located in each community assist in locating suitable Mennonite sponsors for the placement of the trainees and stand by with counsel to the trainees or sponsor as needed during the training period. Each trainee is placed with two sponsors, for six months each, in entirely different communities, to gain the widest possible contact and experience both occupationally and in the Mennonite church and community life. A midyear conference of the trainees gives them opportunity to evaluate the program and experiences, exchange ideas, discuss problems, and draw challenge from God's Word.

The program is financed through monthly payments by the sponsors to cover ocean and inland transportation, medical expenses, and overhead. In addition to maintenance, each trainee receives from his sponsor a nominal allowance as spending money. W.T.S.

Farming and Settlement. The Anabaptist-Mennonite movement in the Low Countries and Northwest Germany has from the beginning been predominantly urban in character, and has its strongest roots in the artisan and merchant classes. Only in the Dutch provinces of Friesland and Groningen was it predominantly rural. The Dutch Mennonites were therefore not typically farmers and have accordingly had no particular contribution to make in agriculture, although the Frisian Mennonite farmers have long been a sturdy and significant part of Dutch Mennonitism. By contrast the strong urban and artisan character of the earliest Anabaptists in Switzerland, Austria, and South and Middle Germany was soon displaced (by 1540 at the latest) by a strongly rural peasant type. In the area of East and West Prussia, except for the city congregations of Danzig, Elbing, and Königsberg, the Anabaptist-Mennonites were exclusively farmers from the beginning. Here they were, however, not peasants but occupants of larger farm units in the Vistula and Nogat delta lowlands which they made arable by skillful drainage operations, and which they were therefore allowed to purchase at a minimum price. The Hutterites were strongly agricultural, although their completely self-contained communal Bruderhofs included much more than farming in their economies.

Thus the Mennonites of history, in all places but Holland and Northwest Germany, have been farmers, and have almost universally produced outstanding achievements in agriculture. The following articles in this ENCYCLOPEDIA are designed to give thorough surveys of Mennonite farming in the various areas in which Mennonites have established permanent sizable rural settlements: Agriculture Among the Mennonites of Russia, Farming Among the Mennonites in France, Farming . . . in North America, Farming . . . in Germany, Farming . . . in Switzerland, Farming . . . in West and East Prussia; see also Migration.

The notable achievements of Mennonite farmers in the Palatinate and Baden-Württemberg gave them a reputation which made them eagerly sought after as renters and managers of the larger estates in South and Middle Germany, Alsace, and Switzerland. Toleration and protection by the noble landowners, and even by the rulers, often against the bitter opposition of the local state church clergy, was their reward. The grant of exemption from military service was often based upon the exceptional contribution of the farmer Mennonites to the community and to the country.

The widespread settlement of the Mennonites on such estates in South Germany, often widely scattered from one another, on the one hand lifted them above the village peasant class and aided in their cultural and religious isolation from the surrounding world, while on the other hand making an organized active congregational life very difficult and throwing much weight on family religion. It also made land ownership almost impossible, since large farms or estates were seldom available for sale because of the laws of primogeniture and entailment of inheritance, even after the early restrictive laws forbidding the ownership of land by Mennonites had been annulled, and the law of jus retractus (q.v.) abolished.

A noteworthy development among many of these South German Mennonites was the tradition that Mennonites ought not to own land, but, as strangers and pilgrims on the earth, should remain only renters. Among the few exceptions to the almost universal practice of renting have been the small Mennonite villages in the Palatinate and adjacent regions such as Weierhof, Ibersheim, Deutschhof, Branchweilerhof, Geisberg, and Kaplaneihof, where, by various fortunate opportunities, groups of 2 to 20 Mennonite families have been able to purchase large estates and divide the land among themselves in small or medium size farmsteads of 20 to 75 acres. In Alsace and Bavaria more outright purchase of farms both large and small has been possible.

In the Vistula Delta area the farm lands were early secured in full ownership by the Mennonite occupants, usually in relatively large farmsteads, so that the Mennonite settlers here were neither peasants nor villagers for the most part, and in some cases became very large-scale master farmers. However, here the Mennonites, as nowhere else in Europe except in Russia, could settle in relatively compact blocks, with but a relatively small intermixture of non-Mennonites, since the land had been previously unoccupied. Here also the Mennonites were economically and culturally on a considerably higher level than their neighbors, and received toleration and special privileges from the landowners and the rulers because of their economic contribution. The special privilege grants (called Privilegium) issued by the Polish kings are noteworthy.

The Mennonites in Russia constitute an extraordinary segment of Mennonite history in so far as their manner of settlement and agricultural achievements are concerned. It is not correct, as has been at times assumed, that special concessions were made to Mennonites to secure their settlement in Russia. The privileges of civil and cultural autonomy, freedom from military service, free land (160 acres per family unit), etc., were available to all German settlers coming to Russia, although it is true that a special privilegium was granted to the Mennonites by the decree of the Czar Paul in 1800. The opportunity in Russia to settle in large tracts or colonies was of unusual significance, not only at the beginning (1789-1820), but later on in the purchase of large tracts for "daughter" settlements. All these large settlements were in effect "colonies," i.e., cultural and religious islands in the vast Slavic empire. This Mennonite colonization in Russia is of fascinating interest from many points of view. Not the least interesting is the village type of settlement, which was almost exclusively the only type, except for a certain number of large estates owned by very wealthy Mennonite landowners. It was, however, not chosen by the Mennonites, who had seldom lived in villages in Prussia, but was ordered by the Russian government for purposes of governmental and social control and administration. This method of settlement, in colonies and villages, guaranteed cultural and religious isolation from the much lower Slavic environment, and thus protected the Mennonites from "the world" in a certain sense. At the same time it contributed largely to the development of a "culture Mennonitism," in which the Mennonites came to think of themselves at times, and to be thought of by others, as a racial and culture group rather than a religious group, and in which ultimately a considerable proportion of the population never even became members of the church. Thus the believers' church concept of the Anabaptist originators of the Mennonite church was gravely impaired. The consequences of this development have continued to pursue and plague the Mennonites who left Russia between the two world wars and who settled in Paraguay (and in part in Brazil) again in closed colonies and villages with cultural and civic autonomy and exemption from military service, as it had done earlier to some extent in Manitoba (and Mexico). Here again the problem of racial and cultural Mennonitism has been serious, with one third to more than one half of the population in some settlements not members of the church but counting themselves as Mennonites and claiming Mennonite privileges. The method of colonization and the cultural autonomy has, however, also here helped to protect the settlers from the corrosive effects of the much lower type Latin-American environment. The serious religious plight of most of the Mennonites (now almost 700) who left Paraguay to settle in scattered locations in urban Argentina, particularly in Buenos Aires, is a instructive comparison.

The relative isolation of the Mennonite settlers in Russia (and to some extent later in Manitoba, Mexico, and South America) contributed, along with other important factors, to their loss of a sense of religious mission, and a certain overemphasis on economic and cultural rather than religious achievements. There was, however, a considerable recovery from this in the later decades.

The Mennonite settlement in the United States was of an entirely different character. Since the settlers here for the first two centuries (1683-1873) came from Switzerland, South Germany, and Alsace, where there was no Mennonite village settlement and no cultural differentiation from the surrounding population, and since usually no large group settlement was possible in Pennsylvania, individual farmsteads were the prevailing settlement pattern (except Germantown, which was settled by urban weavers, not farmers), although in most cases settlement was made in fairly compact communities. Thus the early settlements, such as Franconia and Lancaster, though strongly and compactly Mennonite, had no autonomy, civil or cultural, and no isolation, and enjoyed no special Mennonite privileges granted by the government which were not available to all. The exemption from military service available in colonial Pennsylvania, and later in other colonies and states, was a constitutional privilege available to all conscientious objectors, such as the Quakers, Moravians, etc. The Mennonites were here again almost exclusively farmers, and highly successful. Their agricultural contributions in Eastern Pennsylvania have been widely recognized.

When the large movement of Russian Mennonites of 1874-80 to the prairie states of the United States and Manitoba took place, the Russian Mennonites sought at first to reproduce their European type of settlement and autonomy in their new homes. This was impossible in the United States, both because the federal and state governments would never have countenanced any autonomous political groups, and because the interspersal of railroad reserved sections of land (most land secured by the Mennonites in Kansas and Nebraska was purchased from the large railroad companies such as the Santa Fe and Burlington roads) made really exclusive Mennonite settlements on a universal basis impossible. This did not interfere, however, with large compact rural settlements similar to those in Eastern Pennsylvania of 100-200 years earlier. The few initial village settlements were soon abandoned. The Manitoba Mennonites by contrast did secure large compact blocks of land (East and West Reserves) and did establish closed and relatively autonomous colonies with the village type settlement, and with special privileges granted by the government. All this, however, after a generation or more ultimately had to be surrendered.

The earlier Manitoba pattern of settlement was reproduced by the emigrant groups from here who settled in Mexico in 1921 ff. and in Paraguay 1926 ff. In both cases the full Russian pattern was reproduced, with an extraordinary privilegium. The very serious effects upon the cultural and religious life of the Old Colony groups in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Mexico, and Paraguay are striking illustrations of the dangers of such a type of exclusive colony-type rural settlement and life, when long-continued isolation from the main stream of culture of the host land, and poor leadership, results in extreme introversion, regression, and degeneration. Even the agricultural effectiveness of such a group begins to decline, since the cultural isolation and extreme conservatism prevents acquisition or use of new and progressive methods, impoverishes education and personality, weakens health by poor nutrition and bad health practices, increases superstition, destroys individual initiative, and prevents any development of a sense of religious mission. Even their relatively better agricultural achievements, compared to those of the (very poor) neighbors, are bought at too heavy a price in body, soul, and spirit.

By and large, however, it can be safely asserted that the reputation of Mennonite farmers as good farmers, whether Swiss, French, Russian, American, or Paraguayan, is justified. The readiness, or even eagerness, of the governments of Canada, Paraguay, and Brazil to secure and admit them has been rewarded. The Mennonites' economic value continues to outweigh their minor threat to the unity and military strength of their host countries.

What has been the secret of Mennonite farming effectiveness? Certainly not book learning. Well could the noted Jung-Stilling, professor of agriculture at the University of Heidelberg a century and a half ago, advise his students to go to the farm of David Möllinger, the master farmer of the Palatinate, where they could learn more and better than their professor could teach them. There was reason for Klopfenstein's almanac of Belfort (1819 ff.) to call itself The Anabaptist or the Farmer by Experience. Mennonites have seldom studied farming in the schools, except in recent decades and in small numbers. Nor was it unusual Mennonite wealth which permitted large purchases of equipment and labor. Ernst Correll has sought the answer in part in their religiously based culture, and in part in the necessity resulting from persecution and the fight for survival. Frugality, simplicity, avoidance of dissipation of mind and body through indulgence in drinking and immorality, belief in the Christian virtue of work, large and well-integrated families, freedom from tradition because of their break with the state-church culture system, determination to make good agriculturally and thus countervail the condemnation of society, all of these no doubt played a role. Some of these Anabaptist-Mennonite virtues were no doubt intensified by good German traits, which were aided and carried by the German language and culture in which Mennonites had been immersed before they settled in foreign culture areas, and which they took with them. German culture-historians have long claimed Mennonite farmers and colonizers as a prize illustration of the German cultural contribution to the world, and rightly so. But they thereby overlook the fact that Mennonites have usually been and largely still are not essentially Germans but Christians with a uniquely determined ethical and cultural behavior pattern and a religio-centered group solidarity. Farming Among Mennonites in France. Until the present century, the Mennonite congregations of France have been exclusively agricultural. None of the urban congregations dating from the Reformation survived into modern times, with the result that the character of today's Mennonite society has been determined almost exclusively by successive immigrations of farmers, weavers, and millers from Switzerland.

Mennonites seem to have introduced some new drainage methods into the region of Ste-Marie-aux-Mines, according to the writer of "Promenades Helvetiques, Alsaciennes" (q.v. under article Alsace). Since in this mountainous area subsoil or tile drainage is out of the question, the reference is probably to the system, still in general use, of draining hillside pasture land by means of small surface ditches cut in the sod. The historical sources from other areas mention no special farming methods, but testify to a general reputation for honesty and hard work, and to a tendency to raise more livestock than other farmers.

This reputation for honesty permitted Mennonites to obtain leases on the best farms, which belonged generally to the nobility. The nobles would even rent to the lower bidder, if a Mennonite, because of their confidence in his industry and honesty. The Mennonites thus attained a favored position in comparison with the local peasant population, whose holdings were less profitable to farm. This privileged position, supported as it was by the unpopular nobility, led to a general dislike of Mennonites in some of these areas where they were most numerous (Montbéliard, Ste-Marie).

The industry and prosperity of Mennonites led in turn to a popular tradition according to which they had special gifts or farming secrets. This reputation led one Jacques Klopfenstein to publish at Belfort, beginning in 1812, a farmer's almanac entitled The Anabaptist or the Experienced Farmer (L'Anabaptiste ou le Cultivateur par Expérience). Of Klopfenstein nothing is known, though he was certainly of Mennonite origin. The idea of an almanac profiting from the Anabaptist reputation was followed by other publishers in Montbéliard and Nancy, although it is doubtful that Mennonites actually contributed anything to the editing.

The general pattern of Mennonite agriculture in history shows a steady rise in social and economic standing. Beginning on unwanted lands a refuge from persecution, Mennonite farmers came to hold, first as tenants and then sometimes as owners, some of the best land, especially those farms which being isolated from the villages, gave more social and religious freedom and more incentive for individual enterprise.

Mennonites (counting only those families which maintain some degree of church connection) now operate perhaps 300 farms in Eastern France, of which one fourth are in southern Alsace, one fourth in the Belfort-Montbéliard area, and the remainder scattered farther north and west, especially in Lorraine (see maps, incl. map in Menn. Life, July, 1952). The average size of Mennonite farms in the Territoire de Belfort, the only area where figures have been worked out, is about 50 acres, compared to an over-all average of 17 acres (it is to be borne in mind that many of the non-Mennonites whose holdings contribute to this low average combine their farming with factory work). This relationship may be assumed to hold as well in other parts of France, with the exact figures varying considerably with regional differences. In southern Alsace, where 52 per cent of all farms are smaller than 12 acres, the comparison would be still more striking. The average size of the Mennonite farms would further rise, to a degree incommensurate with the general pattern, in those areas where an especially large estate is operated by a Mennonite (Schweighof near Altkirch, Schopenwihr near Colmar, Schafbusch near Wissembourg, l'Epina near Verdun, Votrombois near Revigny, the Kennel farm at Ligny-en-Barrois).

On the other hand the percentage of Mennonites who own their own farms is noticeably lower than among non-Mennonites. Historically this has its origin in the period of persecution, when the changing political climate forced Mennonites to remain mobile and invest in livestock rather than land. After persecution ceased, a sort of conscientious scruple against buying land persisted until a generation ago, growing out of the "stranger and pilgrim" attitude with which the New Testament itself regards worldly security. This greater mobility was one of the factors which facilitated the 19th-century migrations of Amish Mennonites to America. There are however also material reasons for not acquiring farms. The larger estates, which Mennonites tended to seek out, belonged to noble or bourgeois families who had, and still have, little intention of selling, but who are happy to have their land farmed, if possible by the same family for several generations, by Mennonites. In addition, modern price and tax relationships make it more profitable for the tenant farmer on a large farm to invest in machinery than to attempt to acquire land.

Contrary to the pattern in some pioneer countries, Mennonites could not seek out the most fertile lands when arriving in France. The most fertile areas, Kochersberg in Alsace, and Xantois and Vermois in Lorraine, have practically no Mennonites, because the fertility had encouraged, before the arrival of Mennonites, the formation of a village-centered peasant-ownership structure which left no room for newcomers.

Parallel to the rise in economic and social standing of Mennonites, there can be observed a sloughing-off tendency resulting in the reabsorption of certain elements by village society and the mass (Catholic) Church. Mennonites unable to obtain larger farms, for reasons of land scarcity or limited management capacity, migrated to America, moved into areas where there was no organized congregation, or else gradually abandoned their Mennonite relationships, often through mixed marriage, in favor of integration in the surrounding society, in such a way as to maintain the pattern according to which Mennonites farm some of the best land and most of the isolated farms.

Except for woodcutting around Normanvillars, and flour-milling in a few Alsatian families, Mennonites generally carry on the same type of diversified agriculture as their neighbors. In modern times they have been among the first to adopt machinery, new crops, and scientific methods. Some are authorized to produce seed grains under government control or to test new varieties on an experimental basis.

Current crops in Alsace and the Montbéliard-Belfort area are wheat, oats, barley, corn (chiefly for green fodder and ensilage, the growing season barely permitting the grain to ripen), forage beets, potatoes, tobacco (in the plains around Colmar), rape (for oil), hay, and orchard fruits. Livestock is also diversified, with dairying (multipurpose cattle also fattened for beef), hogs, poultry, and rabbits. In Lorraine, where the soil does not permit use of the more demanding crops, farms are larger but devoted more largely to grazing of sheep or cattle and to small grains. J.H.Y.

Farming Among the Mennonites in the Netherlands. The first Anabaptists in the Netherlands were found both in the country and in the cities (Groningen, Leeuwarden, Hoorn, Alkmaar, Amsterdam, Leiden, Middelburg, etc.). Later on we find Mennonites in the cities and small towns engaged in business, as well as in the country. Mennonite farmers are found particularly in the provinces of Groningen, Friesland, and North Holland, and many of them have been promoters both of new methods in agriculture and of cattle-raising. The Mennonite farmers of the Netherlands never founded special Mennonite agricultural associations as they did in other countries, because the Dutch villages do not consist of Mennonites only (as, e.g., in Russia) and because most farmers do not live together in villages, but often have their farm buildings (boerderijen) on their own land. Special mention should be made of the flower-growers of Aalsmeer (q.v.) near Amsterdam. Here the world-renowned nurseries that export roses and other flowers all over the world have for many generations been to a great extent owned or run by Mennonites; e.g., Eveleens, Hilverda, and Keessen. vdZ.

Farming Among the Mennonites in North America. Nowhere in the world has rural life changed more rapidly and more drastically than in the United States. These radical changes are commonly referred to as the revolution in rural life. The changes have not been confined to technological areas, such as the tractor replacing the horse; the automobile, the buggy; and electricity replacing kerosene. The changes have altered the general structure. They have affected birth and death rates, population shifts, cultural patterns, and have even significantly altered religious and social values. American Mennonites, who have so predominantly an agricultural heritage, have been visibly affected by this revolution in American agriculture. With the exception of the Old Order Amish and the Old Colony Mennonites, North American Mennonites have, in principle, completely accepted the technological and scientific methods of farming. Only economic limitations seem to have prevented them from using the latest scientific methods and modern mechanisms. At a slower rate and somewhat less obvious, the impact of the agricultural revolution has been felt on the religious and social values and the cultural patterns of the Mennonites.

There are several factors in the history of Mennonites which explain their devotion to agriculture. Because of persecution many became pioneers in agriculture. Due to their emphasis on the virtues of thrift, diligence, frugality, and humility, they, in the course of time, learned to earn a living on the poorest soils where persecution often drove them. They learned to drain swamps, to improve the fertility of poor soil, and experiment with new ways of farming until, in the course of centuries, they developed both skills and a reputation as expert farmers. These aspects of the Mennonite heritage developed in them a deep-seated tradition as farmers. This tradition, plus their desire to perpetuate themselves as a peculiar people, resulted in church regulations which often prohibited residence in towns and cities and encouraged the pursuit of farming as a vocation or occupation closely related to farming. While the old prohibitions have been lifted everywhere with the exception of the most conservative American Mennonite groups, farming is still predominantly preferred as the occupation, about 80 per cent of the largest group being farmers. Thus we find American Mennonites scattered over the states and provinces of North America in compact settlements in the best farm lands. Many of these agricultural areas were developed out of raw prairie lands and others were improved after purchasing them from earlier settlers who had abandoned them in search of richer soils or other occupations. The largest numbers of Mennonites are found today in the states of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Kansas with smaller distributions in 29 other states. Others are scattered in Canada throughout the provinces of Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia. In both Canada and the United States, the Mennonite settlements followed the general pattern of a westward movement, from Ontario to British Columbia in Canada, and from Pennsylvania to the Pacific Coast in the United States.

Mennonites have made a number of significant contributions to American agriculture. Perhaps the most outstanding contribution is the general one of having developed prosperous agricultural communities composed of a large number of individually owned family-farm size units. If the key to a stable civilization is the stable family, Mennonites have contributed significantly because of their large families and their well-organized community life centered around the church. A more specific contribution of the American Mennonite group is the introduction, cultivation, and processing of hard winter Red Turkey wheat, which was brought from Russia to the plains states especially centered in Kansas and Oklahoma in 1874. This contribution has been widely recognized as a distinctive gift of the Mennonites and has been accepted as the one factor making Kansas the "bread basket" of America. It is not without significance that the Mennonites who migrated from Russia to America in the 1870's were successful wheat growers in Southern Russia, having produced as much as one-half million bushels of wheat as early as 1855. The hard winter wheat, introduced in the late 19th century, has now been generally accepted as the most preferable wheat for milling purposes. From it have been developed a number of other varieties of wheat.

A second significant contribution of the American Mennonites stems from the Swiss Mennonites. It is the method of farming by means of a systematic rotation of crops. By this means it is possible to preserve soil fertility by means of natural processes. The rotation consists of a three-, four-, or five-crop cycle. The cycle may begin with a legume crop such as clover or alfalfa, followed by corn, oats, and wheat. This natural method of maintaining fertility is also supplemented by the use of domestic and commercialized fertilizers. Common barnyard manure has long been considered by Mennonite farmers as a highly valuable soil builder. Perception of its value was one incentive to a cattle-feeding program which, in turn, produced additional quantities of manure and provided meat supplies and dairy products, both marketable, cash commodities. Pennsylvania Mennonites showed a preference for locating on limestone soils. They earlier discovered the profitable use of burnt lime as a valuable fertilizer. Today commercial brands of fertilizers are used in addition to lime and manure. Thus Mennonites have had a reputation of being good farmers because they preserved the productive capacity of their soils for centuries on end. This is one reason why farms have been kept in single families for as many as six or seven generations. The improvements of the fathers are handed on to the sons generation after generation.

A significant Mennonite contribution is the practice of various forms of mutual aid. This is a rural virtue, formerly very widely practiced, and today still common in Mennonite agricultural areas. It is especially dramatized in the Amish communities where insurance is taboo and where, if destruction to buildings is incurred as a result of accident, the whole community, consisting of as many as several hundred people, will rally to the festive occasion of reconstructing the destroyed buildings. Thus Amish farmers experience the cheapest possible type of insurance and yet the best because it is a voluntary assistance. In less conservative groups there are numerous mutual aid societies for the rendering of various functions. Within the United States and Canada there are at least 60 Mennonite mutual insurance societies, most of them covering risks incurred from fire and storms. These are all based on a simple assessment plan of mutually sharing the costs of the losses. Much informal mutual aid is still practiced in farming communities where farmers exchange work, share machinery, plow or harvest fields for neighbors who are incapacitated, and in some cases, even extend financial assistance.

An interesting contradiction among American Mennonite agricultural practices is the custom of raising tobacco. American Mennonites generally have come to discourage the use of tobacco. Nevertheless, among the Amish and some Mennonite groups in eastern Pennsylvania, large quantities of tobacco are still grown. The county of Lancaster in Pennsylvania is among the most highly productive farming areas in the entire country, and it is in this county that more Mennonites reside than in any other in America. In recent decades, this county has been the leading tobacco producer in the country and Mennonites and Amish are among the largest producers in that county. This is explained in part by the highly profitable nature of the crop and because it provides work during the winter months for the farm family. Many young farmers get their start by sharecropping several acres of tobacco in order to put up a cash reserve.

The following significant trends may be noted in Mennonite agricultural communities. Mennonite farmers have been generally prosperous. They have adopted the latest methods of farming, but interestingly, very few Mennonite farmers have had formal training in agricultural schools or colleges. Their skills have been acquired through home training and practice. Increasing numbers of Mennonites have joined farmers' co-operative organizations for the purpose of benefiting through corporate action in producing, buying, and marketing of their crops and necessities. There has been a trend in the more populated sections toward a declining size in farms and a more intensive agriculture characterized by specialization in farming, although preserving a large element of self-sufficiency and family-type enterprise. In the prairie states especially, there has been a noticeable trend in the direction of larger farms and operating units. This is accounted for in large measure by the increasing acreages that can be operated by modern machinery and by the high capitalization which must be offset by a greater volume of production. In some areas, there is a noticeable concentration of wealth in the hands of a few with the development of a landless or renter class of those who cannot establish themselves on farms of their own.

A peculiar problem confronting many Mennonite farmers is the question of co-operating with the government in various agricultural practices. The traditional opposition to participating in government is still contended for in theory but with the United States government becoming increasingly a welfare state, it is more difficult to maintain this sharp line of separation. Such governmental agencies as the Agricultural Adjustment Act, with its subsidy payments for reduced crop acreages, have found most Mennonite farmers co-operating. Many have borrowed money through the Farm Commodity Administration and the Commodity Credit Corporation. Participation in the federal crop insurance and Rural Electrification Administration programs, has further involved Mennonite farmers with aspects of a government program. Amish farmers who have resisted mechanization and electrification and have frequently refused AAA subsidies, have maintained a clearer witness than other Mennonites in this respect. Even many of them have accepted some parts of the government program. It appears that Mennonites would continue to co-operate rather than withdraw from government co-operation.

Since about 1930, there has been a growing self-consciousness among American Mennonite farmers. From colonial days until the recent past, Mennonites have taken farming very much for granted. Even during the heavy population shift from rural to urban areas in the late 19th and early 20th centuries, Mennonites resisted the trend although they were by no means unaffected by it. During this urbanward shift, farming came to be looked upon as among the less preferred occupations. Urban people, including the most lowly laboring men, tended to feel higher in social rank than the farmer. In the course of time, farmers came to sense this stigma and developed something of an inferiority complex. This general feeling was accompanied by difficult and unpredictable economic circumstances. Since 1940, about the beginning of World War II, the economic lot of the farmer has improved and so has his social rank. At the same time there has been a new effort to interpret the values of the rural community to rural people. Newly established magazines such as Mennonite Life and Christian Living along with articles in church organs and independent journals such as the Mennonite Weekly Review, have done much to interpret agriculture in a new light to urban and rural Mennonites alike. It is probable that the future will see American Mennonites clinging strongly to the land and maintaining their age-old tradition as agriculturalists.

Farming Among the Mennonites in South Germany. The Thirty Years' War (1618-48) devastated large areas of South Germany and decimated the population especially in rural areas. For this reason a number of the many territorial rulers were willing to admit and to tolerate the Mennonite farmers, who were being expelled from Switzerland. This was particularly the case with Charles Louis (q.v.), the Palatine Elector, whose domains at the time embraced large parts of the present Palatinate, but also extended to the other side of the Rhine, including Mannheim, Heidelberg, and even Sinsheim on the Elsenz. In 1672 about 359 persons were counted left of the Rhine, and 160 families right of the Rhine, who were registered as Anabaptists from Switzerland (Müller).

At this time the land was commonly cultivated on the traditional "Dreifelderwirtschaft"; i.e., in a sequence of three years the farmers in one part of a given area had to sow winter grain, those in another part summer crops, and those in the third part leave their land uncultivated, thus creating a pasture for the cattle of the area, which were cared for as a single herd by a village herder. This method of farming, however, checked the development of better methods of cultivation.

After the first great immigration of 1671, many of these Swiss refugee families, usually without financial assets, were assigned to smaller farms or estates (Höfe) for a term of usually 6-9 years (known as "Temporalbeständer"). But in a short time their industry, integrity, and their skill earned them such a good reputation that from 1680 they were permitted to lease larger estates without a time limit and with the right to pass such leases on to their heirs (known as "Erbbeständer"). These farms were usually outside the village land and were not subject to the rule regarding the common pasturing of cattle, but were under the control of the Hofkammer of the feudal lords. Thus these farmers had more freedom to experiment and develop newer methods.

Since the Mennonites had always practiced hospitality and their religious services were held in their homes, and they were thus separated voluntarily as well as by compulsion from the rest of the population, the knowledge acquired by one of them soon became their common possession and practice.

After the unfavorable consequences of the French War of Succession (1689-97) had been overcome, a marked difference became evident between the fields of the "Mennists" and the other lands. Following a fundamental rule of farming, viz., no feed, no cattle; no cattle, no manure; no manure, no crop, the Mennonite farmers, seeking new methods of raising cattle fodder, found them in the cultivation of new varieties of clover, which permitted them to feed the cattle in the barns even in summer. The agricultural authorities of that time ascribed the introduction of Esparsette (Esper) to the Mennonites and Waldenses (?). To what extent they were responsible for the introduction of Lucerne can not be determined; but this "everlasting blue clover" soon found entry into all Mennonite establishments. The first experiments with mineral fertilizers were made at this time by scattering ground gypsum over the clover fields. The results far exceeded expectations. The careful handling of manure, the preservation of the liquid manure, which were traditional practices brought from Switzerland, played an important part. The liquid manure keg (Jauchefass) is popularly attributed to the practical sense of the Mennonite farmers.

The culture of potatoes, tried experimentally by a Mennonite of Mannheim, was quickly adopted on Mennonite farms. These potatoes, not yet accepted for human consumption, were used commercially for the manufacture of brandy; this produced as a by-product an excellent feed for fattening cattle. Also the first cultivation of mangels is attributed to the Mennonites of the Palatinate; these beets were at first also used for distilled liquor products. Thus one advance led to another, finally producing a completely new method of farming and bringing it to a high fruition on exemplary farms. Where previously there was only one skinny cow with a poor udder there were now three fat cows with high milk production or three fat steers.

Outstanding leaders in the progress of South German agriculture were David Möllinger (q.v., 1709-87) of Monsheim, Johannes Dettweiler (b. 1738) of Kindenheim, his son Christian (1765-1838) of Wintersheim, Valentin Dahlem (1754-1840) of the Koppensteinerhof near Wiesbaden, and David Kägy (1767-1846) of Offstein. They were considered the best farmers of their time, and were cited as models by specialists and by the government authorities. Thus the reputation of the model Mennonite farms spread into wider and wider circles, and they were called into more and more distant areas, and even into foreign countries. Thus the Mennonites moving into remote parts were motivated both by economic and religious concerns.

In 1785 there were 250 Mennonites in the area of Usingen in Hesse-Nassau. In 1784 there were 28 Mennonite families among the settlers called into Galicia (q.v.) by Emperor Joseph II. In 1802 eight Mennonites families, upon the wish of their leaselord, settled in Donaumoos (q.v.) in Bavaria (q.v.). They were soon followed by others, especially from Alsace, but also from Baden and Württemberg, who later settled in various parts of Bavaria. Beginning with the French Revolution, which extended the French border to the Rhine, the sociological development on the two sides of the Rhine no longer followed a uniform pattern. The French expelled all the feudal lords on the left (west) bank of the Rhine and introduced the French civil law. The former estates of the rulers and lords, as well as those of the monasteries, were sooner or later transferred to the possession of the renters and divided. On the right (east) of the Rhine conditions generally remained as they had been, unchanged. Even though the "Erbbestand" farms were replaced by "Pacht" (lease) farms, with few exceptions due to local conditions the leasing of large farms remained the dominant form of Mennonite farming, many families remaining for decades or even a century on the same farms. With the beginning of the 20th century begins the transfer of large leased estates into Mennonite possession.

Even though since the middle of the 19th century the Mennonite farms have no longer been so sharply differentiated from those of non-Mennonites, the Mennonite farms are on the whole still considered the best managed and exemplary. No exposition of the German Agricultural Association passes without giving a prize or award to a Mennonite for achievements in the culture of plants or animals.

Outstanding for plant cultivation today are Hauter of Dreihof, Stauffer of Obersülzen (Palatinate), Hege of Hohebuch (Württemberg), Lichti of Herrlehof (Bavaria). As animal breeders there are Hauter of Herschweiler-Pettersheim, Stalter of Heckenaschbacherhof, Guth of Heyerhof (Palatinate), Hege of Hohebuch, Schneider of Eckhof (Württemberg). In leading positions in the German Agricultural Association are Dr. h.c. Hans Hege of Hohebuch and Dr. Erich Musselmann of Helmeringen (Bavaria).

Farming Among the Mennonites in Switzerland. The Swiss Anabaptist-Mennonites have always been almost exclusively farmers, in spite of the fact that the first stages of the movement in Zürich and Basel included many from other classes such as clergymen and artisans. By 1540, however, the urban phase of the movement was largely past and the survival of Anabaptism was the work largely of peasant farmers in the outlying rural areas, especially in the Emmental. A deep suspicion of all forms of trade and business and urban activity marked the later history of the movement down to modern times. Practically all of the modern Mennonites living in Switzerland descend from the original Emmental Swiss Brethren, who lived to a large extent on individual small farms in the region of Langnau.

Most of the Mennonites living in the Emmental and later in the Jura (q.v.) in Switzerland were primarily engaged in dairying and cattle breeding or horse breeding. They made a virtue out of necessity and became extraordinarily successful in these lines; otherwise they could not have survived. Wherever these Swiss Mennonite farmers went later on, as they emigrated into Alsace, the Palatinate, Pennsylvania, or elsewhere, they took with them and maintained their exceptional abilities as farmers. They developed new methods of fertilizing through the conservation and use of animal manure, and also in the use of water for meadows. They were known everywhere as the best farmers.

The Jura Mennonites, living on the 3,000-foot plateau of the Jura Mountains in northeastern Switzerland since 1700 as immigrants from the Emmental and Thun, had to succeed under exceptionally difficult conditions. The land of the Jura is stony and poor in water resources, as well as naturally infertile, but the experienced Mennonite farmers from the Emmental and neighboring territory succeeded in making farming here profitable through their extraordinary industry and rational methods of farming. Here they were compelled to devote themselves exclusively to dairying and cattle breeding, since their chief resource was the cheaper land. Here they developed also an exceptionally fine-flavored cheese called the "Jura" cheese, which found a good market as long as the Mennonites produced it. Until about 1900 the Jura Mennonites also engaged in weaving. Their half-linen clothes and bed linens, which furnished most of their own consumption of these items, were of good quality.

Since 1900 cattle and horse breeding has enjoyed an unusual vogue among the Jura Mennonites. They breed the Simmental cow and the Freiberg horse.

The modern Mennonite farmer in the Emmental has one of the most fruitful soils of all Switzerland to cultivate, although the soil is often so hilly that it cannot be cultivated with the usual machines, and the land which they own is in the foothills of the Alps, where there are many deep valleys. The exceptionally fine grass in the Emmental is one of the reasons for the world-famous Emmental cheese which is produced here. The Emmental Mennonites largely own their farms, which are usually small in acreage, whereas the Jura Mennonites long had to rent their farms and still are not universally owners of their land.

The Mennonite farmers in the neighborhood of Basel (q.v.), immigrants since 1780 from the Jura or from Alsace, live mostly on larger rented estates. Since the soil is fruitful and not so hilly as in the Emmental the farming of this region is largely mixed and very different from the other Mennonite areas. The Basel farmers, however, are just as outstanding in skill as those of the other two regions. Before 1890 no Mennonites in Switzerland owned their own farms.

The natural increase of Mennonite population in recent decades, together with the increase in land values and the limited number of farms available, has forced many young Swiss Mennonites into the cities and towns. This is particularly true in Basel and in the Jura watch-making areas, such as Tramelan and Chaux-de-Fonds. This is bound to have a significant effect on the future of Swiss Mennonitism, which hitherto has been almost exclusively rural. S.G.

Farming Among the Mennonites in West Prussia and East Prussia. Mennonites practiced agriculture for over 400 years in West and East Prussia, most of their families being farmers throughout the entire period of their occupancy 1534-1945. In West Prussia their historic location was in the lowlands of the Vistula Delta; in East Prussia it was in the lowlands of the Memel River near Tilsit, where they first settled in 1713. The chief and extraordinary agricultural achievements of the Mennonite farmers lie in the field of land-drainage. It was only their proved ability to make arable the land lying below sea level that secured the privilege of settlement in the Vistula Delta for the Dutch Mennonite refugees of 1534 and later, since the political sovereignty of the area at that time was in the hands of a strongly clerical and intolerant Poland.

The Teutonic Knights Order had, to be sure, built the great Vistula dikes and drainage establishments, but the skill of the century-old Dutch drainage techniques was necessary to drain completely the shallow lagoons and swamps of the Vistula Delta, much of which lay as much as six feet below sea level. Furthermore, after the disappearance of the Order there was no strong authority which understood how to operate for the common good. The drainage arrangements which had been built were scattered widely over the area. As a consequence the great breaks in the dikes in 1540 and 1545 inundated the whole territory of the Danzig Werder for years, reducing it to a watery waste which gradually became overgrown with reeds and rushes, since it lay below sea level. The Master of the Order, Konrad von Jungingen, stated in one of his documents regarding the inhabitants of the village of Petershagen near Tiegenhof, "They have only watery land and boundary dikes."

In 1547-50 the drainage of this entire low territory was begun in all three sectors of the Vistula Delta on a forty-mile front, from Drausensee through the Ellerwald area and the Gross-Werder to the gates of Danzig. It was a gigantic undertaking. The landowners of this territory, namely, the Polish king, the Catholic Church, the cities of Danzig and Elbing, and the Polish barons, leased blocks of land ranging in size from 250 to 2,500 acres to Mennonite leasing associations. These associations constituted at one and the same time village communities and drainage companies, and were obligated to pay the landowners a joint rent as well as to assume responsibility for the draining of the land. It is clear from the surviving drainage arrangements that the boundaries of the individual leaseholds were chosen with consideration of the natural elevations of the land which would make possible satisfactory diking, as well as in consideration of the possible channels for discharge of the water. The land area of each of the associations had to be diked off against the inroads of water from the outside, and accordingly the associations had to join each other in arrangements to dike in the channels for the discharge water. Then a windmill was erected at the lowest place in the land area at the outlet channel, which then was constantly worked to lower the water level of the polder which it served. Side channels then had to be dug out to make possible the steady flow of water to the windmill, since the drop in the land level was very gentle. These side channels were so arranged that the smallest parcels of land were from about 2½ to 7½ acres in size. These individual tracts then had to be so leveled off that there would be a slight drop in the surface. Water furrows were then marked at right angles to the plow furrows to make possible the rapid discharge of rain water, since the land in any case also suffered under a high ground water level. The land also had to be cleared of all bushes and grass. All this hand labor became a very severe burden to the families of the settlers, who seldom possessed any capital. An extraordinary skill was required to avoid unnecessary work in the erection of each drainage polder as well as in other drainage work if this enormous job was to be made possible for the weak labor resources available. In addition to all this there was swamp fever. It is reported that 80 per cent of the first settlers died from it.

This first and most difficult drainage work took three to four generations. The first fruit of the drainage was meadows and pastures with excellent grass. Since the drainage channels with their low dikes carried water which stood considerably higher than the surrounding land there was great danger in rainy seasons or snow thaws that the north wind would blow and drive the water of the Baltic back into the land and through the channels into the rear areas so high that the windmills would not dare to pump the water out of the polders, since in that case the dikes would have been immediately flooded. Consequently the polders were often flooded, and this was tolerable only for meadows and pastures.

The grassy pastures called for a very intelligent handling of the cattle to be pastured. The Prussian Mennonites therefore took up dairying. By careful breeding they were able to develop a high quality milk-producing cow which was popularly called the "Milk Boat." Until modern times it was proverbial among the cattle dealers of Germany to say, "The best milch cow of Germany grows around Neuteich," the settlement area of the West Prussian Mennonites. The Dutch Mennonite immigrants brought with them from Holland the knowledge and skills essential to the conquest of the pasture land and the successful improvement of milk production and the utilization of the milk. For this purpose they developed flat funnellike earthenware containers with a large surface area which aided the rise of the cream. They also developed churns and the art of cheese making. The very good Werder cheese was a special Mennonite product. The Mennonites of the Memel district also developed a special cheese even in the first years of their settlement there, of which they annually delivered tons to the markets in Königsberg and Tilsit. This "Tilsit cheese" became a famous product which found a market all over Germany and which has retained its reputation to the present day.

But the Mennonites of the Vistula Delta settled not only in areas which lay below sea level but also in swampy areas which lay above sea level but had poor drainage because of lack of discharge channels. In such areas they also succeeded in draining considerable areas of land through development of controlled discharge channels. On such land wheat and rape could be planted, in addition to the raising of dairy cattle. This combination of grain raising and cattle raising give the Mennonite farmers a considerable advantage above their other neighbors in the delta since they were able to use a considerable amount of animal manure at a time when artificial fertilizers were not yet available.

While the men achieved extraordinary results through their drainage work, the milking and conversion of the milk into other dairy products was the extraordinary achievement of the Mennonite women in comparison to the other farm women of the area. These achievements, due to the great industry of the Mennonites, were well known, as may be seen from the statement of the administrator of Marienburg at the 1676 Landtag when he said, "One can easily detect where a lazy drunken peasant or an industrious and sober Mennonite lives."

In the building of the barns and houses in the farms below sea level care had to be taken to locate the building area above high water. Since the earth necessary to build these elevated locations was scarce it had to be hauled in from considerable distances. For this reason the farmyards were small. This explains also why in small farms, up to possibly 45 acres, the dwelling house, stables, and barn were built together in a row under one common thatched roof, called "Reihenhof." In the case of larger farms this "row" would soon get too long and waste too much land for the approach. Consequently, an "angle" farmyard was developed, in which the dwelling house and stable were built in one row but the barn of approximately equal length was built on at a right angle. The farmyard was then located inside the angle. The exit road led around the barn and served at one and the same time as the rear exit from the barn and as the exit for the manure pile, which was located on the opposite side of the stable. When the farm exceeded 125 acres in size a cross-shaped farmstead was constructed. Here the barn was built crosswise to the stable and on both sides of it. By this manner of construction the shortest cut was achieved for the route to haul the hay and straw from the barn to the stable. This corresponds in a large degree to the recommended method of construction of a farmstead in our day.

It is noteworthy that the agricultural settlements of the Mennonites in West Prussia through the centuries remained intact longest in those areas where a systematic drainage of the land was an absolute necessity. The necessary communal task of drainage required a sense of community which was natural to the Mennonites. Furthermore, the originally unfruitful lands which they occupied were freed from many of the taxes and levies which other lands had to carry.

On the other hand, the Mennonites resisted with all their strength the labor which was required of them on the dikes and for the villages which had been established by the teutonic Order. Personal serfdom to other persons was an abomination to them, and they sought with every means at their command to keep their young people out of the low type of life which was common among the hired farm laborers, both men and women, of the larger peasant farmers in the villages.

A noteworthy characteristic of the Mennonite farms in Prussia was the well-ordered garden. Until the very end of the Mennonite settlements one could always determine where a Mennonite lived from the state of the garden.

With the development of the steam engine a change came into the drainage procedures in the Vistula Delta. The more powerful pumps of the steam engine were able to do so much better work than the windmill, and the circular pump was able to lift the water so much higher than the mill-wheel, that the smaller polders could readily be combined and the water level lowered still further.

The further development of motor power through the use of the big diesel motor, as well as the increasing interest of the state in aiding the agricultural development of its people, led to a still further consolidation of the drainage units and to a deeper drop in the ground water level. As a result the whole area of the Gross-Werder was finally consolidated into two great drainage areas lying on both sides of the Schwente. One of these areas lay along the Elbing Vistula and the other at the "Jungfersche Lake." They were protected by dams from flooding from the side of the Baltic. The last areas where there was swamp fever then disappeared, and wheat and sugar beets could be raised everywhere. This final consummation of the drainage work of the Mennonites was only achieved during World War II.

Because of the general rise in the standard of living and the consequent demand for meat in the second half of the century it became necessary to substitute a heavier, more meaty type of milch cow for the earlier purely milch (Werder) cow. This development was inaugurated by the Mennonite Cornelius Jansson of Tiege, who imported in 1852 a high-quality breeding bull of the black-and-white East Frisian type of Dutch origin. For the same reason the Mennonite Gerhard Wiebe of Gross-Lesewitz introduced breeding stock of the Holstein Wilstermarsch race. This East Frisian type with its greater milk production won out in the competition and led to the establishment of the West Prussian Registered Cattle Association. West Prussian Mennonites remained the leaders in this successful breeding association, both on the breeding side and the marketing side. The Mennonite Gustav Friesen of Klein-Lichtenau three times won the gold medal (1936-39) for the best milk production of any herd in the territory. His best herd production for one year was an average of 13,860 pounds of milk with 4 per cent butter fat per cow. The last president of the association was Ernst Penner of Liessau. Chairman of the cattle co-operative of Danzig-West Prussia, with an annual turnover of $9,000,000 in beef cattle and $1,000,000 in milk cattle, was Johann Driedger of Heubuden.

As a result of the expansion of the acreage of the Mennonite farmers in West Prussia following the lowering of the ground water level and the cancellation of the restrictive regulations against Mennonites, the creative activity of the Mennonites in the area of agriculture was considerably increased. The Mennonite Epp of Quadendorf produced a type of wheat in the second half of the 19th century which found wide distribution in West Prussia far beyond purely Mennonite farmers under the name "Quadendorf Epp Wheat." The Mennonite Ernst Wiens of Damerau achieved the highest ranking in 1930 in the money value per acre of the product of all the agriculture operations of similar character in the entire German national area. This was a result of his careful handling of his land. The biggest sugar beet producer in the Vistula Delta in 1944 was the above-named Mennonite Penner of Liessau, who harvested 30,000 dozen sugar beets.

The three top executives of the Dike Associations in the Vistula Delta who had the responsibility for the maintenance of all the river dikes and the supervision of the whole drainage process were always Mennonites on the basis of a free election, although the Mennonites did not have either by number or by area the majority. Farwendel, an Anabaptist elder at Kreuznach, Germany (according to the chronicles of the Hutterian Brethren a preacher in the Anabaptist congregation at Neustadt). In 1556 a violent dispute arose between him and Theobald, the elder at Worms, "concerning original sin and concerning the sin of the soul and the sin of the flesh." About 1500 brethren at Worms sided with Farwendel. Theobald apparently violently upbraided him. Two preachers were deposed. Presumably this quarrel was laid before the large conference in Strasbourg in 1557, where 50 elders wrote a letter to Menno Simons (DB 1894, 45).

In 1564 Farwendel was held as a prisoner in the tower at Oggersheim near Worms, where he defended his faith before the official preachers. Since he was subjected to many temptations, he summoned Klaus Braidl (q.v.), a missionary of the Hutterian Brethren, to strengthen him in the faith. After his release in 1565 he moved to Moravia with his family, and with other members of his former congregation in the Palatinate he joined the brotherhood there. K.V., Hege.

Fasser, Georg, an Anabaptist martyr, a preacher of the Hutterian Brethren, who with his wife belonged to Jakob Hutter's (q.v.) inner circle and after Hutter's death was closely associated with Leonhard Sailer (Lanzenstiel, q.v.). He was a native of Kitzbühel, Tirol, Austria. Nothing is known of his earlier life. His name is listed in the table of Anabaptists who escaped from Tirol and whose property was confiscated.

The statement in this list, that "Georg Fasser has no possessions," must refer to real estate. For in connection with the dissension between Jakob Hutter and Siegmund Schützinger in 1533 it is known that Fasser put all his possessions (beds, chests, etc.) into the common room; his wife, who tried to reserve some money for her children, was severely reproved and expelled from the brotherhood, but was later reinstated, as Hutter expressly states in his letter of November 1533.

Valentin Luckner (Urgicht, Oct. 6, 1533) reports that Georg Fasser conducted a service in the woods behind Michelsburg; 20 or 30 persons were present, among them the notable Anabaptist names of Hans Amon and Onophrius Griesinger.

Fasser was also a friend of Hieronymus Käls, who sent him greetings from prison. In 1533 he stayed in Moravia and watched the disagreement between Hutter on one hand and Philip and Gabriel on the other, and Hutter's ultimate success in creating order in the brotherhood. In the next two years he experienced the bitter persecution of the Anabaptists in Tirol and in Moravia; this did not, however, deter him in carrying out his mission as an apostle.

In 1536 he accompanied Lanzenstiel to Austerlitz in Moravia. In Neudorf, Austria, they found several sisters and other good persons; in the tavern, however, "an immoral crowd." They found another inn, and people from the tavern followed them with violent derision. "As far as we were concerned, the matter was easy; but when they began to blaspheme we were moved with zeal to call their attention to their rascality."

The two were then captured and on the following day taken to Mödling (south of Vienna) and tried under torture. To Hans Amon they wrote, "We gave testimony to the truth in such a manner that they were all shocked and answered not a word." In the prison they lay "with ungodly and shameful people, whose company was very repulsive."

From May 8 to June 9 they sent at least six letters to Amon, to which he replied with comforting expressions. From the first letter we learn that "a dear brother from Vienna" was with them. The second letter expresses their desire to hear the worst concerning their fate and to depart from this world. With the fourth letter Lanzenstiel sends Amon Jakob Hutter's washcloth, apparently a keepsake from Hutter, concerning whose end Amon had told the prisoners. The fifth letter they thought would be their last, for the judges and council were threatening them with torture if they did not recant. The next letter says if they had not mentioned that Hieronymus Käls and his companions were their brethren they would have been released. An important personage had been with them and told them they must renounce certain articles if they wanted to be free. On May 25 a rich merchant's wife had visited them and described Hutter's death to them.

The news of the capture of two such proved brethren as Lanzenstiel and Fasser filled the brotherhood with dismay, since they had recently been deprived of their most capable leaders. Therefore Amon wrote them four letters expressing his concern, and urging them to "fight bravely to the end, for our beloved Jakob (Hutter) and Hieronymus (Käls) are waiting with the elect." His second letter was disconsolate, for he had received no word from the Puster Valley. In the fourth he admonished them to be faithful and think of dear Jakob who was true through all the torture. Fasser's Ursula had recently fallen asleep and had entered into her eternal rest.

After Fasser and Lanzenstiel had been in prison almost a year and were prepared for death they were mysteriously released. They went first to Trasenhofen in Lower Austria near the Moravian border. Fasser at once gathered a congregation at Peckstall in Austria. But he was betrayed by a man pretending to seek instruction and he was imprisoned again. The chronicles give two conflicting accounts of his death. According to one he was killed with the sword after severe torture in 1537; according to the other he was burned at the stake in 1538. His converts joined the brotherhood in Moravia.

Fasser, Jörg (Vasser). A second person with this name, not identical with the above, for he came from Schwaz in Tirol not Kitzbühel, and having been a monk he was able to read and write, whereas the above could not. After leaving the monastery he was a technician in the mine at Schwaz. In the brotherhood he distinguished himself through his great zeal; this is indicated by the names "Jörg Tauffer" and "Principaltäufer" given him in the Tirol court records. A poster issued by the government against him April 2, 1528, describes him as a tall young man, with black beard and full face. Fasser was seized soon after, but escaped and made his way to Stams into the Petersberg district, then to Telfs and over the mountain toward Seefeld, leaving distinct traces of his work. All the efforts of the government to seize him were unavailing. He arrived safely in Moravia with his wife. Nothing more is heard of him. (ML I, 634.) LOSERTH.

Fast (Feste, Faast, Vast), a Mennonite family name in the rural Flemish congregations of West Prussia, rarely also in the Danzig Flemish and the Montau Frisian congregations. It was first mentioned 1582 at Wotzlaff, where an Arendt Feste appears in the record. The first appearance of the name Fast in a church record was at Danzig in 1669. According to records there were nine bearers of the name in 1727, all of whom had Dutch given names. The name was represented in such congregations as Ladekopp, Fürstenwerder, Heubuden, Elbing, and Danzig. Thirty-three families of this name were counted in 1776, 157 persons in 1910, 108 persons in 1935. Members of the family also migrated to Russia and America. Among the prominent leaders of this family were Daniel Fast, an elder of the M.B. Church in the Kuban 1877-1902; Gerhard Fast, a minister of the Heubuden congregation in 1903-32, leading in conference activities after World War I; Bernhard Fast (q.v.), an elder of the Orloff (Molotschna) congregation, and Martin B. Fast (q.v.), former editor of the Mennonitische Rundschau, last in California.

Ten M.B. ministers living in Kansas, Oklahoma, California, Manitoba, and British Columbia carry the name Fast. Four ministers in the E.M.B. Conference, and four among the G.C. Mennonites have this family name (1953). The Mountain Lake, Minn., telephone directory for 1949 listed 24 Fasts. Eleven Fasts served in Civilian Public Service. Well known is Henry A. Fast, Bethel College professor and vice-chairman of the Mennonite Central Committee; also Aganetha Fast, a missionary to China.

Fast, Bernhard, was born in Prussia, ordained minister in Russia in 1814, ordained elder Jan. 13, 1821, died 1860. Fast succeeded Jacob Enns as elder of the large Flemish Ohrloff Mennonite Church (q.v.) and became a very significant progressive leader of the newly established Molotschna Mennonite settlement. He was a supporter of Johann Cornies' endeavors, of the Ohrloff Vereinsschule, and of more progressive measures in promoting the Gospel and co-operating with other Protestant groups. Because of his progressive views he soon encountered opposition which led to a split within the congregation.

Some of the reasons for the division were: (1) some objection to Fast's decision to be ordained by a Flemish elder; (2) Fast had admitted a non-Mennonite missionary, Moritz, to the Lord's Supper in his congregation; (3) he promoted the work of a Russian Bible Society, a branch of which was organized in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement; (4) he supported the Ohrloff Vereinsschule; and (5) he favored the observance of the holidays according to the calendar in use in Russia.

Four of his co-ministers led in the opposition which culminated in the split of the congregation, leaving Fast only one fourth of the members (150 families). Jakob Warkentin was ordained elder of the conservative wing on Aug. 3, 1824. This congregation became known as the Lichtenau Mennonite Church (q.v.). The objectives which Fast promoted became generally accepted after one or two generations. It was unfortunate that circumstances in his day caused friction and division, but it was fortunate that he stood for a cause which paved the way for better education and a more meaningful practical Christianity. NEFF, C.K.

This episode of the Molotschna Mennonites has been dealt with at some length by various writers: Friesen, Brüderschaft, 77, 84, 113-19, 197, 305; Franz Isaak, Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (Halbstadt, 1908) 91-123; H. Goerz, Die Molotschnaer Ansiedlung (Steinbach, 1950) 58-60. Isaak and Friesen relate sources and express somewhat colored opinions; most objective is Goerz. The article in ML I, 634, was based on Friesen.

Fast, Bernhard J., Mennonite teacher and minister, b. July 23, 1857, Halbstadt, Russia, d. Oct. 17, 1917, in the Terek Mennonite settlement. Fast was a teacher for 27 years, and minister 10 years; he served as minister and leader of the Azov Forestry Service Camp for 5 years. He lived in village No. 7 of the Terek settlement and was killed by nomadic tribesmen. C.K.

Fast, Daniel, b. 1826 at Halbstadt in the Molotschna, Ukraine (Russia), d. at Wohldemfürst in the Kuban, in 1843 became village schoolteacher at Tiegenhagen and in 1862 at Blumenort, where he joined the Mennonite Brethren in 1864. Soon afterward he emigrated to the Kuban. Here he was ordained as preacher Jan. 14, 1870, traveling evangelist May 14, 1872, with an annual compensation of 200 roubles, and as elder May 5, 1877. Through his moderate, intelligent, and genuinely pious and sober attitude he exerted a wholesome influence on the young Mennonite Brethren wing and worked with great blessing until 1902, when he retired because of his age and ill health. Fast, Heinrich, a Mennonite (EMB) minister, born Aug. 23, 1849, in Gertuamalee, South Russia, the oldest of the five children of Johann and Sara Peters Fast. In July 1875 the family (with the exception of one sister) immigrated to Minnesota, settling on a farm six miles northwest of Mountain Lake. In 1876 Heinrich Fast married Maria Hamm (also from South Russia). They were the parents of ten children, six of whom lived to become adults, two of the sons, John and George, becoming deacons in the church. In 1910 he retired from farming.

Fast was also a minister for about 25 years in the Brudertaler Mennonite Church north of Mountain Lake, and also served as traveling evangelist (Reiseprediger) for about five years. He died on Feb. 27, 1930, having passed the age of 80 years, and was buried in the cemetery near the Brudertaler church. D.H.F.

Fast, Hermann, b. April 27, 1860, at Gnadenfeld, Molotschna, Russia, and died March 22, 1935, at Petrovka, Sask., was the thirteenth of fourteen children of Isaak Fast, who had come to Russia from the Marienburger Werder, Prussia. For four years he attended the Ohrloff Vereinsschule and received catechetical instruction under Elder Bernhard Harder. After this he returned to Gnadenfeld where he graduated, after three years, from the Zentralschule. In 1878-79 he taught school at Rudnerweide. The next year while teaching a Lutheran school at Berdyansk he experienced a conversion, after which he attended the Bible school of St. Chrischona near Basel for three years.

After his return to Russia in 1883, he taught for two years at the Musterschule of Halbstadt. In 1885 he went to Feodosiya, Crimea, where he preached in a Lutheran church and studied the Russian language. Here Countess Schonnenlov of St. Petersburg invited him to become the tutor of her grandson, which position he held from 1886 to 1894. On June 22, 1887, in the Baptist Chapel at Riga, he was married to Elizabeth Garinovitch, a Greek Catholic who had been a private tutor at Halbstadt while Fast was teaching there.

In 1892-93 he accompanied two English Quakers, Joseph Neive and John Bellow, to the Caucasus to visit exiled Evangelicals, serving as an interpreter. Because of this and other religious activities he was watched by the Russian police. In 1895 Fast and his wife, together with the widow of the poet N. A. Nekrassov, settled on an estate near Simferopol, Crimea, and lived there until 1897. Since the police were watching him here also, he accepted the invitation of F. W. Baedeker to go to Rumania, where he taught a private school in Constanta and served as a minister of a German Baptist church in Dobruya. In 1901 he went to Canada and settled in Petrovka, a Dukhobor village north of the Saskatchewan River. Here he and his wife continued their religious work among the Russians, carrying on farming, and teaching for a time in the Quaker-built school of Petrovka, preaching, serving as postmaster, etc. He also represented the British and Foreign Bible Society, traveling in various provinces of Canada. Elizabeth Fast died on Feb. 27, 1915. Of their five children, two sons died and three daughters are living, Maria Novikoff (Toronto, Ont.), Olga Good (Eugene, Ore.), and Constance Reusser (Deer Creek, Okla.).

Elder David Toews said at the funeral of Hermann Fast, "He served the Dukhobor village as organizer, counselor, and minister to the welfare of their souls. He was a true child of God, not bound to a denomination but in all races and tongues found brothers and sisters."

In Petersburg, Russia, Fast was a member of the Baptist Church, but in Canada he was a member of the Waldheim (Sask.) Mennonite Brethren Church. During the last years of his life he lived at Perdue, Sask. C.K.

Fast, Isaak, b. 1847 at Gnadenfeld, Molotschna, Russia, was a leader and elder of a group of Mennonites which separated from the main body and established a new church known as the Alexandrodar Mennonite Church of Jerusalemsfreunde (q.v.) in the Kuban region in 1868. When a controversy arose during the sixties regarding the Bruderschule of Gnadenfeld, Molotschna, Isaak Fast joined the brothers Johann and Friedrich Lange (q.v.), who had been influenced by the chiliast Christian Hoffmann (q.v.) of Württemberg. All the petitions and correspondence in this case reprinted by Franz Isaak in Die Molotschnaer Mennoniten (207-59), bear the signature of Isaak Fast. Fast became a minister of the group in 1884, and elder in 1902. He also taught the school at Alexandrodar. At the Molotschna he had been a teacher of the Ohrloff Vereinsschule and in Russian schools. Little is known about his life and later activities. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 456, 728; ML I, 26.) C.K.

Fast, Isaak P., father of Hermann Fast (q.v.) and Abraham Fast of Jerusalem, was born April 4, 1815, son of Peter Fast of Neumünsterberg, Danzig, where he received his elementary and secondary training—the latter in the school of Lange (q.v.) at Rodlofferhufen—after which he taught school. On Aug. 10, 1836, he left Prussia and went to Gnadenfeld, Ukraine, where he married Elisabeth Dück and taught school in various Mennonite communities and opened a bookstore. A booklet containing a preface by Hermann Fast, the autobiography of Isaak P. Fast, and a sermon preached by Heinrich Dirks at his funeral was published by A. J. Fast (Winnipeg, 1932) under the title Züge aus meinem Leben. C.K.

Fast, Isaak P., the son of the well-known teacher Peter Fast of Tashchenak-Friedensfeld, South Russia, was born on Feb. 4, 1856, and died November 1908. Among the pioneers of the Memrik settlement in the district of Bachmut, which was purchased by the Molotschna settlement for its landless families in 1885, there were 28 members of the M.B. Church of Rückenau. One of these was Isaak P. Fast, who settled here with his wife and family. In the fall of 1885 Fast was ordained to the ministry to lead the young church (affiliated with Rückenau). On Sept. 11, 1900, the church became independent and on this occasion Fast was ordained as an elder. Under his leadership the Memrik (Kotlyarevo) M.B. Church grew, reaching a membership of 350 by May 1902. A.H.D.

Fast, Johann, a Mennonite missionary, b. Jan. 23, 1861, at Ohrloff in the Molotschna, Russia, the son of Gerhard Fast. He attended the Zentralschule at Ohrloff and the Teacher's College at Berdyansk. After teaching in the Crimea for a time, he attended Chrischona Bible School near Basel for two years and entered the Dutch Mennonite mission of Java in 1888. In 1890 he married Jakoba A.M. Jansz, the daughter of missionary Pieter Jansz. They had five children, two boys and three girls. The oldest, Johann, became a medical missionary of the Neukirchen mission 1928-36, after which time he had a private practice. He died in a Japanese camp at Tjimahi, Java, on Jan. 4, 1945.

The missionary Johann Fast returned to Russia in 1898 for a furlough and spent another term, 1901-09, on the mission field, and then returned to Russia because of poor health. Here he promoted missions, taught Bible in the Zentralschule of Spat, Crimea, and after the Revolution worked in a dairy. In 1920 he returned to Java via Holland as a missionary at Kaju Apu until 1928, after which he lived in retirement at Salatiga, and died Oct. 15, 1941. E.F.

Fast, Johann J., a nephew of Daniel Fast (q.v.), was born in South Russia in 1834, and through reading and independent study he became a well-informed and powerful minister in the M.B. Church of Russia.

Five sons and one daughter reached maturity: Johann, Peter, Bernhard, Isaak, and Justina stayed in Russia, most of them perishing behind the Iron Curtain, while Daniel came to Canada in 1904, entered the teaching profession, and now lives in Vancouver, B.C.

Johann J. Fast began with a prosperous lumber business, but when this was destroyed by fire, he gave himself more and more to the ministry of the Gospel. Although he lived in several villages of the Molotschna, he settled in Rückenau, close to the church, where he worked in close fellowship with the renowned M.B. Bible expositor, J. W. Reimer. In his preaching Fast was not particularly dramatic but the fervency of his spirit and the excellent testimony of the purity of his life gave his presentation of the Gospel a dynamic impact. He made a particular contribution in the work of house-visitation and personal contacts with neighbors and friends, and thus led many to the saving knowledge of Christ. He died in Rückenau in August 1898, his last admonition being, "Brethren, cover up and forget." (ML I, 635.) NEFF, J.J.T.

Fast, Martin B., K.M.B. author and editor, was born Jan. 6, 1858, at Tiegerweide, South Russia, the son of Peter and Aganetha Barkmann Fast. Here Martin attended elementary school. At 19 years of age he joined the Mennonite Church at Rückenau. With his parents he came to America in 1877 and settled near Jansen, Jefferson Co., Neb., where he was converted, baptized, and received into the fellowship of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, May 23, 1880. He married Elizabeth Thiessen of Jansen on Feb. 24, 1884. In 1887 he became a United States citizen. He served as editor of the Rundschau (q.v.), Elkhart, Ind. (later Scottdale, Pa.), 1903-10, and as the first editor of Der Wahrheitsfreund (q.v.), Chicago, Ill., 1915-17. In 1908 he made a trip to Russia, visiting relatives and friends in the Molotschna settlement and elsewhere. In June 1919 he made a trip to Siberia with clothing and money for the relief of the poor, and later sent many food drafts for Russian relief. In 1929-33 he served the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Conference as chairman of the Board of Foreign Missions; and for some time he was secretary of the Mennonite Aid on the west coast. He died March 15, 1949, at Reedley, Cal., following a brief illness, at the age of 91 years, and was buried in the Zion K.M.B. cemetery, Dinuba, Cal.

Fast was correspondent to various German papers, and wrote numerous booklets, including Mitteilungen von etlichen der Groszen unter den Mennoniten in Russland und in America (1935); Meine Gedichte vom Jahre 1880 bis jetzt (1943); Reisebericht und kurze Geschichte der Mennoniten (1909); Geschichtlicher Bericht wie die Mennoniten Nordamerikas ihren armen Glaubensgenossen in Russland jetzt und früher geholfen haben (1919). C.F.P.

Fast, Peter P. (brother of Hermann Fast?), graduated from Ohrloff Zentralschule and teacher-training course at Halbstadt, taught elementary school at Rudnerweide, graduated from the University of Moscow, and taught for a number of years at the Halbstadt Zentralschule and the Gymnasium of Feodosiya. In 1909 he succeeded A. A. Neufeld as the director of the Realschule of Berdyansk, and he taught there until the end of his life. C.K.

Fasting. Did the Mennonites ever have the practice of fasting, as for example the Roman Catholics? It is not very probable that they did; nothing is found about fasting in the writings of their leaders such as Menno Simons and Dirk Philips, though they occasionally insisted on sober eating and drinking, as did also Galenus Abrahamsz, the well-known preacher of Amsterdam, at the close of the 17th century.

But there was a three-day fast in the Anabaptist congregation of Amsterdam in 1534, ordered by "the prophets and preachers of the church." This curious fact is found in the Confession of Jannetgen Thijsdochter on Jan. 23, 1535 (published by Grosheide, Verhooren, 180). In 1754 among the Groninger Old Flemish, after eight preachers had finished their preaching tour of all the congregations (see Cremer, Lubbert Jansz) a day of general fasting and prayer was proclaimed by the elders before a new elder was chosen.

That fasting was practiced by the Mennonites in colonial Pennsylvania is shown by references in a notebook of Hans Tschantz, one of the earliest (serving ca. 1717-45) bishops of the Lancaster County Mennonite settlement in what is now the Strasburg and Willow Street congregations. He refers to two fast days, one in the spring and one in the fall. It is probable that these fasts were observed in connection with the communion services. The observance of such fasts, usually the breakfast on Saturday before communion, was continued into the 20th century in the Lancaster Conference, and has only recently fully died out. It was longest observed by the bishops.

A similar observance of fasts before communion is still fully maintained by many Old Order Amish communities. Although the exact day for the observance has varied, it has always been limited to a breakfast fast. Most commonly the fast has come on the Sunday before communion Sunday, when the preparatory service or "inquiry" meeting is held. The morning of Good Friday is also observed as a fast. Some churches of Amish background have fasted the Friday or Saturday morning before the communion Sunday.

P. M. Friesen (Brüderschaft, 82) reports that the Gnadenfeld-Alexanderwohl (Molotschna) joint confession of faith, first drafted in 1787 by Jacob Wedell of Przechowka near Schwetz, contained a statement regarding a "right evangelical fasting according to the teaching of the Holy Scriptures." vdZ.

Faukelius, Hermann, b. about 1560 at Brugge, Belgium, studied theology at the universities of Gent and Leiden. In 1585 he was made preacher of the secret Reformed congregation in Cologne, and June 27, 1599, at Middelburg, Dutch province of Zeeland. He refused a call to Amsterdam. In Zeeland he was a zealous member of the synod and energetically attacked the Mennonites and Remonstrants. In 1617 he published a new Dutch translation of the New Testament. He was a delegate to the national synod in Dordrecht (1618-19). In addition he was a member of the committee on the affairs of the church in the East Indies. He was one of the translators of the well-known "state translation" of the Bible. He died May 9, 1625, at Middelburg. He incurred the disfavor of the Mennonites with the publication of his book, Babel dat is verwerringhe der wederdooperen onder malkanderen, over meest alle stukken der christelycke leere. Met een kort verhael van de oorspronk, verbreijdinghe, menigerley verdeelinghen ende scheuringhe derselven van malkanderen (1621). It was reprinted later. Two Mennonite preachers wrote a reply to it. Claes Claesz (q.v.) published Bekenntenisse van de voornaemste stucken des Christelyken geloofs en der Leere (1624), and Anthoni Roscius (q.v.) wrote Babel, d. i. Verwerringe der Kinderdooperen onder malcanderen (1626). Faukelius' Babel is a libel; but as the author used several books that have been lost or are very rare, it contains some historical accounts that are not without value. He could not refrain from relating some offensive facts that, though greatly exaggerated, contain a germ of truth. K.V.

Fauquier County (Va.) Old Order Amish congregation was organized in October 1945 under the leadership of William A., Simon, and Rudy Byler. The first settlers moved there from Delaware and were joined by others from Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Iowa. The settlement is located 45 miles south of Washington, D.C., near Warrenton, Va. In 1953 the 55 members were led by Bishop Daniel Nissley. M.G.

Faustendorf, formerly a Mennonite congregation in Baden, Germany, now called Adelsheim (q.v.).

Fayette County (Ill.) Old Order Amish community, now extinct, was located near Brownstown and Vandalia in 1894-1906. The community at its largest consisted of about 25 families. John A. Miller was the first minister, and he was joined by Mose Yoder of Howard Co., Ind. Sam Bender was ordained minister and bishop of the church. Joe Bontrager, who lived in the community for about two years, also assisted in preaching.

Probably because of internal difficulties the Amish began to scatter, and by 1906 the settlement was completely gone. Many returned to Iowa, others went to Douglas County, and to Oklahoma and Mississippi. There remains a small cemetery of 14 graves five miles northwest of Brownstown.

Fayette County, Pa., Mennonite churches. There are no official church records known to be in existence for the first one hundred years of the Mennonite settlement in northern Fayette Co., Pa. Land was acquired in this western Pennsylvania county by four Mennonite families in 1789-91. The first minister and bishop was Abraham Stauffer, who came from Lancaster Co., Pa., and in 1790 purchased 278 acres of land in Tyrone Twp., Fayette County. Early settlers came from Lancaster County and Washington Co., Md.

Tradition states that the first meetinghouse, about one mile west of Pennsville, was erected before 1800. Rebuilt in 1852, it served almost continuously until membership dwindled and after 1903 it was no longer used. Throughout most of its existence the congregation held biweekly meetings. It alternated with the Stonerville meetinghouse (q.v.) five miles across Jacobs Creek in Westmoreland County. The Pennsville meetinghouse (q.v.) and burying ground became property of the Scottdale congregation (formerly Stonerville and Pennsville) which in 1903 authorized the disposal of the property. Throughout its existence the Pennsville membership was one with the Stonerville congregation and the combined memberships numbered at most 200.

After 1850 a decline set in and by another 50 years the combined membership at the two meetinghouses had declined to 20 persons or less. However, later years witnessed a growth and revival in the Scottdale (q.v.) congregation as it became the congregational center of the church's publishing plant. Aaron Loucks played a leading role in this work.

It is believed that the Masontown Mennonite (MC) Church (q.v.) in southern Fayette Co., Pa., was the second oldest Mennonite congregation west of the Alleghenies. Settlers came from eastern Pennsylvania before 1800 and perhaps as early as 1790. They were the Longeneckers, Johnsons, Bixlers, Fretzes, Honsakers, Saylors, and Leckrones.

What is thought to have been the first Mennonite Sunday school in the United States was held here in 1842 when Bishop Nicholas Johnson began teaching the Bible to children of this church. In 1872 John F. Funk and Daniel Brenneman held revival meetings for four weeks. These meetings were among the first, if not the first, revival meetings in the Mennonite Church. J. N. Durr (q.v.) was an important leader in the congregation for many years. The 1954 membership of the congregation was 112.

In 1951 the Kingview Mennonite (MC) Church (q.v.) was built in East Scottdale in Fayette County, the outgrowth of extension work that began in this territory in 1906. G.M.S.

Feddriks, Douwe, van Molqueren, a Dutch Mennonite minister of whose life little is known. He may have been a native of the little town of Molkwerum (q.v.) in Friesland, as his name indicates. At the end of the 17th century he was minister of het kleine hoopke (the small group) at Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, which had separated about 1696 from the main body of the Flemish congregation in this town. Later on he was preacher at Emden, East Friesland. He was extremely conservative and a champion of the authority of Mennonite confessions. He is especially known for his writings. In 1698 he published Der Mennoniten Leere of onderwijsinge voor de Doopsgezinde Christenheid; waarin de leerstucken van hunne belydenis . . . aan den dag gebragt worden en met de Schriftuur verrijkt . . . (Amsterdam). After Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) had published his Korte Grondstellingen (1699) Feddriks, who thought Galenus was introducing the heresy of Socinianism (q.v.), was instructed by the Zonist (q.v.) Sociëteit, meeting on May 1-12, 1700, to draw up a refutation; accordingly he published Mennonitisch Ondersoek op de Korte Grondstellingen, Die van Dr. Galenus opgestelt zijn . . . (Amsterdam, 1700). Now Feddriks was attacked by Jan Klaasz van Grouw (q.v.), who published De leer der Doopsgezinden verdedigd . . . (Amsterdam, 1702). Thereupon Feddriks answered by his book De Rechtsinnigheyd van de Leer der Mennoniten opgestelt . . . tegen de vreemd gemaakte misduydingen van Jan Klaassen van Grouw . . . (Amsterdam, 1703). Feddriks' writings and his opposition to the Socinian doctrines were highly appreciated not only by Zonist Mennonites like L. Bidloo, H. Schijn, and E. A. van Dooregeest, but also by the Reformed in the Netherlands. Feddriks left behind an unpublished manuscript, "Harmonie of Overeenstemminge der vier Evangelisten."

Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, an official federation of the national bodies of most of the larger and some of the small evangelical Protestant churches of the United States, designed "to manifest the essential oneness of the Christian churches of America in Jesus Christ as their divine Lord and Saviour." The General Conference Mennonite Church joined the Federal Council in 1908, the year it was organized. With the war in 1914, growing militarism caused opposition to affiliation, which led to Mennonite withdrawal in 1917. However, at that time the majority report of the investigating committee of the General Conference actually favored continuing the relationship. Since that time the alienation from the Federal Council has been more complete, particularly in view of extensive attacks upon it by American fundamentalists. During World War II the Mennonite Central Committee had functional relationships to the Federal Council committee on conscientious objectors, and sent representatives to several meetings sponsored by the Council's Commission on International Good Will and Justice. In 1950 the Federal Council was merged with several other interdenominational bodies to form the National Council of the Churches of Christ in America. D.E.S.

Feenstra, an old Mennonite family of Friesland in the Netherlands, which has produced a number of preachers. The oldest of these was Wepke Feenstra, preacher at Franeker 1773-79. His son Thys became mayor of Leeuwarden; another son of Wepke Feenstra, Pieter Wepkes Feenstra, b. 1792 at Franeker, d. Aug. 23, 1858, at Sneek, was called in 1792 to Holwerd, and from 1797 until his retirement in May 1842 he was the pastor at Sneek, where he dedicated a new church on April 10, 1842. He published a sermon for the day of thanksgiving and prayer, Feb. 22, 1809. Under his leadership the union of the two branches in Sneek took place. One of his daughters was married to J. Kuiper, pastor of the IJlst congregation, another to the notary Kuiper of Bolsward. A son of the latter was Taco Kuiper (q.v.), a Mennonite minister of Amsterdam, the father of A. K. Kuiper (q.v.), also a preacher of Amsterdam, and of K. Kuiper (d. 1922), professor of Greek language and culture. A third daughter was married to P. H. Veen (q.v.), minister at Bovenknijpe, whose grandson became the pastor of Monnikendam, also P. H. Veen, and whose daughter married J. Oosterbaan, a Mennonite minister of Makkum, whose son became preacher at Hilversum. (Biogr. Wb. III, 28 f.; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 731.)

Pieter Wepkes had three sons, two of whom, Wepke and Pieter Feenstra, should be mentioned. Wepke, a physician in Holwerd, was the father of Pieter Wepkes Feenstra, b. 1831, preacher at Dantumawoude 1854-70, and at Leeuwarden 1870-97, d. 1919 at Rolde, father-in-law of J. Wuite, minister at Leyden. He wrote the ceremonial address for the bicentennial of the founding of the Friesche Doopsgezinde Sociëteit (DB 1895). Pieter was also prison chaplain at Leeuwarden and active in the Maatschappij tot Nut van 't Algemeen (DJ 1921, 19-28).

Pieter Feenstra, b. in 1800, was pastor of the Mennonite congregation at Sappemeer 1824-30, at Leer 1830-37, and again at Sappemeer-Hoogezand 1837-71, father of Pieter Feenstra, Jr. (q.v.). He was one of the founders of the Groninger and Oostfriesche Sociëteit, and died in retirement on Jan. 5, 1886. (ML I, 635.) K.V.

Feenstra, Pieter, Jr., son of Pieter Feenstra, the Mennonite pastor at Sappemeer, b. there Oct. 18, 1850, d. Aug. 16, 1936, married A. M. C. Tjeenk Willink (d. 1920), studied at the Athenaeum and the Mennonite seminary in Amsterdam, and became a candidate for the ministry in 1872. Introduced by his father, he delivered his first sermon on March 16, 1873, at Witmarsum and Pingjum. In 1881-91 he served as minister at Nijmegen, and from that time until his retirement on Jan. 30, 1916, at Amsterdam. He died in Amsterdam, Aug. 16, 1936.

Feenstra was one of the leading Dutch Mennonite preachers in the 20th century. To his influence many congregations owe their institutions for the strengthening of the brotherhood. In Witmarsum he dedicated a new church in December 1877. On the site of the "Menno Simons church" he had a monument of Menno unveiled, for which many contributions came in from the churches. A memorial booklet was issued of this celebration (later reprinted in the publication of the Doopsgezinden in de Verstrooiing, No. 37). Feenstra's study on Menno Simons, published in his Pro Sancto (Haarlem, 1899), was one of the best characterizations of Menno published to that time. In the field of religious instruction he rendered meritorious service in publishing two handbooks, one in co-operation with the Mennonite minister J. Sepp, and one with J. H. Boeke (1898). He also published his memories of J. G. de Hoop Scheffer (q.v.) and a biography of A. Loosjes (in the Biographies of the Society for Dutch Literature). Outside Mennonite circles he was chairman of the Dutch Protestant union and was active in the Association of Modern (Liberal) Theologians, in which he gave addresses in 1895 and 1898.

He was coeditor of Teyler's Theologisch Tijdschrift, in which he published a number of papers, among them a thorough study on De godsdienst en de Fransche revolutie (edited as a book at Haarlem, 1926). He was one of the six members of Teyler's Godgeleerd Genootschap (Theological Association), and held other positions of honor.

When the Zondagsbode (q.v.) was on the point of expiring at the close of its seventh year, he revived it and conducted it with notable success 1894-1916, writing many articles of all kinds for it. As curator of the Mennonite seminary in Amsterdam he became acquainted with practically all the students who became preachers after 1891. He was presented with the gavel as honorary chairman in 1914 at the centennial of the E.T.E.B.O.N. (q.v.) (students' association of the Mennonite Seminary).

From 1890 to 1935 he was a member of the Board of the A.D.S. (q.v.) and several times he served as its president. In 1923 he effected an important modification of the rules of the A.D.S. (Dutch Mennonite general conference). (De Zondagsbode, Aug. 23, 1936; DJ 1937, 17-24 with portrait; ML I, 635-37.) K.V., vdZ.

Fehr, Kornelius A., an elder of the M.B. Church, born Sept. 24, 1846, in Alt-Kronsweide, Molotschna settlement, Ukraine, the oldest son of Abram Fehr. He received only an elementary school training, but through diligent study, wide reading, and participation in courses for ministers he acquired a good knowledge of the Scriptures as well as of life in general. His marriage to Margaretha Koslowsky was childless, but they adopted an orphan girl. As a young man Fehr joined the M.B. Church, in which he soon began to serve in various capacities: choir leader, Sunday-school superintendent, and deacon. Up to 1901 the Fehr family remained in the Ukraine (Morozovo), where he was also known as a progressive and prosperous farmer. In the spring of 1901 Fehr and his family moved to Orenburg, in northeast Russia. Here he was ordained as elder of the M.B. Church for the Orenburg district on July 17, 1901, by Abram Martens of Neu-Samara. His charge included the Kamenka, Klubnikovo, and Karaguy congregations. With great faithfulness and self-denial he served his church from 1901 to 1917. He was also a member of the school board for the Pretoria Zentralschule, which served the Orenburg settlement, and of the Foreign Mission Board. He was a man of vision and determination, and did much for the material and spiritual progress of the Orenburg colony in its pioneer years. In the last days of December 1919 both Fehr and his wife became the victims of a postwar epidemic only 28 hours apart. Fehr willed one third of his estate to foreign missions. I.J.T.

Feisser, Johannes Elias, b. 1805 at Winsum, d. 1865 at Nieuwe Pekela, both in the Dutch province of Groningen, studied literature and theology at the University of Groningen, received his Th.D. degree in 1828 and became a Reformed pastor, serving Lekkum 1821-31, Winschoten 1831-33, and Franeker 1833-38. In 1838 he resigned because of bad health. In the same year he "experienced a new conversion." In 1839 he again went into the ministry, serving the Reformed Church of Gasselter Nijveen. In 1843 he was involved in a conflict with the Church Board because he required Scriptural discipline against offenders and because he refused to baptize children, having come to the conviction that infant baptism is unscriptural. He now was dismissed. He then came in contact with J. G. Oncken (q.v.), the father of the German Baptist movement at Hamburg, and was won over to the Baptists (q.v.). He was baptized in a canal near his house by Köbner, one of Oncken's assistants, together with six of his former Reformed members. This incident marked the founding of the first Baptist congregation in the Netherlands (Gemeente van Gedoopte Christenen). In 1849 he moved to Nieuwe Pekela. Here he also founded a Baptist congregation which thrived under his pastorate, attracting also a small number of Mennonite families who joined the Baptists. Feisser published a number of edificatory writings and the history of the founding of the first Baptist congregation in the Netherlands. vdZ.

Felbinger, Jeremias, frequently erroneously listed as a Mennonite by older historians, b. at Brieg in Silesia, was a Socinian (after 1642) educator and writer who spent the last years of his life in poverty in Amsterdam. He was for a time rector of a school at Köslin in Pomerania, and later an educator in Helmstadt, Bernstadt, Greifswald, and Wratislav in Poland. For a time he lived at Strasswitz near Danzig as a member of the Socinian congregation there. His only common doctrine with the Mennonites was his rejection of the oath. His most noteworthy writing was the Christliches Handbüchlein (1661), published in Dutch at Rotterdam (1675) as the Christelyke Handboeksken. (ML I, 637 f.) NEFF.

Felbinger, Klaus (also called Schlosser, meaning "Locksmith," after his trade), an outstanding Hutterite martyr, died in 1560 in Landshut, Bavaria, Germany. We know nothing of his origin and earlier life. The Hutterite chronicles give his name for the first time when he was chosen Diener des Worts (preacher) in Moravia in 1558. Soon afterwards he was sent out as a missionary to Bavaria, most likely his native country, together with a brother. But in 1560 the two men were seized near Neumarkt in Lower Bavaria, and soon thereafter brought in chains to Landshut, a well-known fortress and castle. Here they were kept in the dungeon for over ten weeks. The Catholic clergy vainly tried all means of persuasion to make him recant. Then he was racked to the point where even the executioner pleaded for him. But Felbinger still remained firm in his faith. From prison he sent two extensive epistles (Sendbriefe) home to the brotherhood in Moravia, in which he gives a detailed report of his many debates with the clergy and other officials, and from these documents we learn his extraordinary knowledge of the Bible and his skill in defending his position. His opponents were obviously amazed. Two learned clergymen came expressly from Munich to convert him, but it was to no avail. Their rational theology was one thing, his living faith in Christ and His commandments another. At the end we read in one of his epistles the following episode: "You cannot convince me," said Felbinger to his inquisitors, "for you do not stand in the Truth, and therefore I intend to stay in the simplicity of Christ." To this the chancellor answered, "I do not think that you are so simple. [Note that the word 'simplicity' is here used in a double meaning. Felbinger means plainness, absence of sophistication, while his opponent thinks of ignorance.] I think there is not one in a hundred who could defend himself as well as you do. For I do not think of you as a fanatic (Schwärmer) as are found everywhere and have no reason for their beliefs." To this Felbinger added, "God made him admit this, a comfort for me" (Loserth, 309-10; Chronik, 402). Felbinger had also drawn up a brief tract, his Confession of Faith (or Rechenschaft) which he submitted to the lords of Landshut. But they were not willing to deal leniently with sectarians. The mandates were applied, and on July 19, 1560, he was beheaded in Landshut, together with his brother-companion.

His confession as well as his epistles circulated widely among the brethren and did not fail to strengthen them in their faith. When the Hutterite brother Veit Grünberger (q.v.) was examined in Salzburg in 1573, he had this to say: "They may do with us as they wish. We will bear it with endurance, for I have carefully read the Rechenschaft of Claus Felbinger and of Hans Mändel, more than once, so that I know that our faith is well founded in God's Scriptures."

We have from Felbinger these two epistles: (a) Sendbrief an Leonhard Sailer, 1560 (published by Loserth, "Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer in Mähren," Ztscht f. Allg. Gesch. I, 1884, 451-54); (b) Ein Sendbrief Klaus Felbingers geschrieben aus seiner Gefenknus an die Gemein Gottes in Mähren im 1560. Jahr (published by Loserth in "Der Communismus der mährischen Wiedertäufer," Arch. f. österr. Gesch. LXXXI, 1894, 292-310). This epistle contains the details of his debates, and is strongly dogmatic. There exists also his confession, Abgeschrift des Glaubens welchen ich, Klaus Felbinger, zu Landshut den Herrn daselbst für mich und statt meines mitgefangenen Bruders zugestellt habe (this is his Rechenschaft oder Verantwortung). This document has not yet been published but exists in several Hutterite codices.

Felbinger is also the author of five well-known hymns, four of which are published in the Liederbuch der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) 647-49, and (out of place) 441-46. The fifth hymn is known only from European codices. R.F.

Felger (Alberta) Hutterite Bruderhof of 25 souls (1951) near Lethbridge, Alberta, was founded in 1928. D.D.

Felger (Mont.) Hutterite Bruderhof was founded in 1946 by Paul Walter, preacher of the Felger Bruderhof near Lethbridge, Alberta. It numbered 18 souls in 1947. D.D.

Felistis Jans (official name Felistis Resincx), a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, originally from Vreeden in the Münsterland, Germany, but living for eleven years in Amsterdam, where she was arrested in 1552 with many others. Obviously she was an elderly woman. During the trial she admitted that she had lodged some Anabaptists in her house and attended Anabaptist meetings, where she had heard Gillis van Aken preach. She repudiated the Roman Catholic doctrine of the Mass, and related that she had learned to read two or three years ago, "in order to know the truth." She had also taught other persons. Remaining steadfast even in cruel torture on Jan. 2, 1553, she was sentenced to death with confiscation of her goods. On Jan. 16, 1553, she was burned at the stake at Amsterdam. vdZ.

Fellmann (Fellman), a Mennonite family of Swiss origin, now numerous in the South German Mennonite congregations. Concerning the family in Switzerland no particulars are as yet known. The Palatine lists of Mennonites in the archives at Karlsruhe first name a Fellmann in 1717; Melchior Fellmann, living in Bruchhausen near Heidelberg, and a Jakob Fellmann in Rohrhof near Heidelberg. The Mennonite archives of Amsterdam contain a family list of 1731, which gives the same information (but says Rohrhof near Mannheim). The Fellmanns are named as preachers of the Mennonite congregation of Bruchhausen. At this place there was also a Hans Fellmann, a member of the congregation at Eckerhof near Wiesloch. The later Mennonite lists of the Baden archives of 1738, 1743, 1752, and 1759 contain additional references to Fellmann families in this area. The Mennonitisches Adressbuch of 1936 (Karlsruhe) gives a complete oversight of the modern status of the family (residence, vocation, members of families), which is found principally in Baden, Württemberg, and Bavaria. Walter Fellmann is a retired minister who served the Monsheim congregation. W.F.

Felsenthal, a large Mennonite estate on the Molotschna River in South Russia, founded in 1820 by David Reimer, the father of Jakob R. Reimer (q.v.). It took its name from the granite ridges that follow the valley, through which flows a stream fed by a perpetual spring. Felsenthal was known for its orchards and nurseries, which sold trees everywhere. For a time this estate was the center of a mystical group which engaged in a life of contemplation. They were incorrectly called Quakers. The name "Gichtelianer" describes them better. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 132; ML I, 638.) NEFF.

Femmetgen Egberts, an Anabaptist martyr. She was captured at Hoorn in the Dutch province of North Holland with three brothers and a sister and, remaining steadfast, was drowned with them on June 7, 1535. (Mart. Mir. D 36 f., E 443; ML I, 507.) NEFF.

Fenneken, a Dutch Anabaptist martyr, wife of the revolutionary leader Jan van Geelen (q.v.), was drowned in the IJssel River at Deventer, province of Overijssel, on April 17, 1535 (not Feb. 6 as is stated DB 1917, 114). She had been baptized by Jacob van Antwerpen (q.v.) and remained in Deventer, while her husband went to Münster. (DB 1917, 114; 1919, 10-11.) vdZ.

Fennema, a Dutch Mennonite family, living at Sneek, Friesland, one of whom was Enno ten Cate Fennema (1849-1929), a notary public at Sneek and a pillar of the Mennonite congregation in this town; he was also a member of the First Chamber of the Dutch States-General. In 1898, when the law for compulsory military service was passed in the Netherlands, abolishing the system of substitution which has since 1796 made it possible for the Mennonites (and others) to avoid military service, Fennema voted against this law, because many Mennonites still had objections to military service. Ferdinand I (1503-64), Archduke of Austria, with residence in Vienna (after 1521), after 1526 also King of Hungary and King of Bohemia (by inheritance), and after the abdication of his brother, Emperor Charles V in 1556, Holy Roman Emperor 1556-64. He had been brought up as a staunch Catholic, and vigorously defended his church in the great struggle of his time. And yet he could not stem the rising tide of Lutheranism, either in Germany or in his own domain (Erblande) of the two Austrias, Tirol, Styria, Carinthia, etc. Eventually he had to tolerate it de facto, particularly in view of the ever threatening danger of Turkish invasion which made the help of the Protestant estates indispensable. The Peace of Augsburg of 1555 with its formula "whose region his religion" (cuius regio eius religio) would have entitled him to re-Catholicize all his domain, yet political circumstances prevented him all his life from carrying out this plan. Thus Austria remained predominantly Protestant until well toward the end of the century.

With so much the more vigor Ferdinand fought the Anabaptists, who were being denounced as archheretics by Catholics and Protestants alike. A great number of mandates (q.v.) were promulgated by Ferdinand against "sectarians and heretics." The first one, dated Aug. 20, 1527, was particularly harsh against the Anabaptists because of "their misuse of the tender corpus Christi" and their custom of "renewed baptism." With this mandate a ruthless persecution set in, in which Ferdinand took a personal lead. One of his first victims was Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.); the baron Leonhard von Liechtenstein was asked to deliver this man from his refuge in Nikolsburg. He was condemned, however, officially not because of his Anabaptist faith but rather because of his connections (remote though they were) with the Peasants' War of 1525 in Waldshut. On March 10, 1528, he was burned at the stake in Vienna. In 1527-28 a number of trials against Anabaptists were carried out in Upper Austria (Steyr with six executions, Freistadt, Enns, also Gmunden and Wels); but in view of the tremendous spread of Anabaptism everywhere from Tirol to Moravia, this method appeared to Ferdinand to be too slow and ineffective. He therefore appointed the nobleman Dietrich von Hartitsch as special "Profos" (commissioner) against all Anabaptists with authority to proceed against them the short way. Von Hartitsch was active particularly in Lower Austria, where within a short time Anabaptism became nearly extinct. Persecutions were ordered in all areas under Ferdinand's jurisdiction, even in the outlying Hapsburg districts (Vorlande) of Alsace, Breisgau, and Württemberg. Everywhere special commissions were set up to make any further spread of Anabaptism practically impossible. The stakes (pyres) burned everywhere; according to one source, in the Inn Valley in Tirol alone no fewer than 1,000 Anabaptists were burned between 1527 and 1530. In Linz (Upper Austria), for a short period a center of the Brethren under the vigorous leadership of Wolfgang Brandhuber (q.v.), 70 Brethren were put to death in one procedure, including the afore-mentioned "bishop" Brandhuber (1529). In Bruck on the Mur River (Styria) nine brethren were beheaded and three sisters drowned in 1528.

The mandate of the Imperial Diet of Speyer in 1529 against the Anabaptists, ordering death by fire for all heretics throughout the Holy Roman Empire, intensified these persecutions still further and gave them a legal basis. Ferdinand published the corresponding mandate for his domain on May 10, 1529. It is amazing to what minute details Ferdinand himself devoted his attention in this matter. When, for instance, he learned that some noblemen in Lower Austria employed simple "Anabaptists" as farm hands during the season of haymaking, he sent strong reprimands to these lords and ordered them to stop this practice at once. The correspondence with the provincial government of Tirol in Innsbruck is very detailed as to the proper procedures against the Anabaptists. No mercy of any sort was permitted, and leniency by local judges (many had been quite in sympathy with these earnest Christians) was strongly disapproved, even in cases where members of the lower nobility were involved (see Freyberg, Helene).

The events of Münster 1534-35 prompted even more intensified persecutions. Now Ferdinand had the "argument" that such revolutionary dangers must be prevented by any means; once Anabaptists were in power they would certainly act this (Münsterite) way, all denials of imprisoned Brethren notwithstanding. Tirol had been the very center of Anabaptist activities at that time, and here persecutions were the most ruthless. Eradication of this "heresy" seemed at first nearly hopeless, all the more so since the Brethren were supported by sympathizers in all the remote mountain valleys. In 1528 the two outstanding leaders, Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.) and Hans Schlaffer (q.v.), were put to death (see Inn Valley). But soon Jakob Hutter (q.v.) was to fill the gap, tireless in working for his new faith. As life in Tirol had become so precarious, Hutter began to lead an exodus to Moravia, then the only country in Central Europe where freedom of religion was practiced by the nobles. Here in Moravia (part of the Kingdom of Bohemia) the power of Ferdinand was rather restricted, and Ferdinand's mandates were but very little obeyed. The medieval independence of proud feudal lords still lingered on, giving the Anabaptists the unique chance of a safe refuge. To Ferdinand it was a point of particular grief. In 1535 he gained a temporary success, and for a short time the Brethren were driven out of their places. Some sought refuge in near-by Slovakia; others returned to Germany (see Philippites). But soon the former privileges were restored, in spite of Ferdinand's sharp mandates of 1545, 1548, and 1554, requiring the expulsion of the Brethren. More peaceful development now became possible in Moravia, and for the Brethren began their "Golden Age" (ca. 1550-90).

Elsewhere, however, in the Austrian domain Anabaptism slowly died out by the middle of the 16th century, due mainly to Ferdinand's tireless activities and detailed attention in this direction. Only now and then do we learn of new victims of persecution, such as, e.g., the migrating Brethren from Kaufbeuren, Bavaria, to Moravia in 1545, who were intercepted in Vienna and soon executed there.

In 1551 the Jesuits, champions of the now rising Counter-Reformation (q.v.), arrived in Vienna; soon thereafter they came also to Prague, Innsbruck, and other places in the Hapsburg realm. However, new conflicts with the papacy (Paul IV) prevented any radical acts by Ferdinand. Thus Lutheranism was still rather strong in Austria at the time of the death of Ferdinand I. Though he had tried hard to create a stronger central government in Vienna, the time was not yet ripe to overcome the particularism of the feudal lords or the relative independence of the thriving cities. Ferdinand II (1578-1637), grandson of Ferdinand I (q.v.), Holy Roman Emperor 1619-37 during the first part of the Thirty Years' War. It is his sad reputation to have almost completely destroyed Protestantism (Lutheranism) in Austria. Educated by the Jesuits of Ingolstadt (see Jesuits,), he soon became the very symbol of the inexorable Counter-Reformation (q.v.). Prior to his becoming emperor, he had already begun this trend as ruler of "Inner-Austria" (i.e., Styria, Carinthia, Carniola), with mandates of 1598 ff. With the tremendous victory of the Imperial army over the Protestants at the Weissenberg, outside Prague) on Nov. 8, 1620, the fate of all non-Catholics in the Hapsburg realm was sealed. While up to this point the "Kingdom of Bohemia" (part of that realm) still could enjoy a certain (though restricted) liberty of religion, this old privilege was now wiped out altogether, and no opposition by the Protestant nobility was any longer even remotely possible. Thousands of Lutheran nobles, city people, and peasants emigrated to other parts of Germany, thus seriously injuring the economy of Bohemia and Moravia.

In Moravia (q.v.), the erstwhile refuge of the Hutterites and other sectarian groups, the activities of Cardinal Franz von Dietrichstein (q.v.) had made it harder and harder for the Brethren to carry on, and the number of Bruderhofs was reduced every year after the turn of the century (1600). Only a shift to near-by Slovakia could save the remnants of the Brethren. But now the imperial edicts of Sept. 8 and 17, 1622, made even a precarious foothold in Moravia impossible. All Hutterites without exception were expelled; it was the end of a period of 90 years of sojourn in this country. All their property was lost (valued at more than 300,000 florins), and no Protestant lord could extend any help. (For bibliography see Ferdinand I.) G.M.

Fernheim Agricultural Co-operative (Sociedad Civil Cooperativa Colonizadora Fernheim), located in Colony Fernheim in the Paraguayan Chaco, was officially organized on Nov. 20, 1944, in Filadelfia, Colony Fernheim, in the presence of all village administrators and the colony leader as well as representatives of Paraguayan courts, with a total membership of 311. It sold 10,000 shares valued at 25 guaranies, thus having a total operating capital of 250,000 guaranies, the shares being paid out of net proceeds of the co-operative. Its operating capital on Dec. 31, 1949, was 525,000 guaranies and its 1949 turnover 1,920,721.77 guaranies. Of the yearly earnings, 10 per cent are paid into the reserve fund and 10 per cent into the social security fund, which monies are used for the support of the old and ill in the colony as also to cover school deficits and other colony undertakings of this nature. The co-operative was organized for the purpose of facilitating all buying and selling for its members and also to establish and operate small basic industries within the colony such as sawmill, oil press, woodwork shops, cotton ginning, creamery, and extraction of essential oils. Also it manages the colony cattle herds and arranges all land purchase transactions. Among its primary difficulties have been the long distances to markets with inadequate roads and the instability of markets. Like the other Mennonite colony co-operatives in Paraguay it is legally recognized by Paraguayan Law No. 13, 635 of 1942 and its managers are responsible to the colony administration. Its first president was Bernhard J. Wall and its present one (1954) is Heinrich Dürksen.

The 1944 co-operative organization is the lineal descendant of the earlier Fernheim Co-operative which was established in 1931, in the second year of the colony's history. All the other Mennonite colonies in Paraguay also have co-operatives founded as follows: Menno 1936; Friesland 1942, reorganized 1947; Neuland, Volendam, Sommerfeld, Bergthal, 1947 and 1948. C.J.D.

Fernheim Colony, located in the Paraguayan Chaco, South America, was founded on April 26, 1930. The first group of Mennonites having fled from Russia to Germany were given temporary refuge by the German government largely because of the intervention of B. H. Unruh of Karlsruhe, Germany, and upon the promise that they would not stay in Germany. The entire group hoped to move on to Canada, but that country refused to admit them. Consequently the Mennonite Central Committee at its meeting held on Jan. 25, 1930, decided to assist this group in resettling in the Paraguayan Chaco. Plans were made accordingly, and 374 families (1,853 souls) prepared to leave. A smaller group went to Brazil. The first group left camp Mölln (q.v.) in Germany for Paraguay on March 15, 1930, followed by seven other groups in the following order: Group 1, 61 families under Johann Funk; Group 2, 68 families under Gerhard Schartner; Group 3, 67 families under Nicolai Siemens; Group 4, 69 families under Abram Klassen; Group 5, 5 families under Gerhard Isaak; Group 6, 14 families under David Thielmann; Group 7, 10 families under Heinrich Willms; Group 8, 80 families under Jakob Siemens. Travel and financial arrangements were made by the German government and the MCC.

Friends and German Protestant churches helped to equip the Mennonites before their departure and much household equipment and tools and clothing were collected under the slogan Brüder in Not. The MCC purchased agricultural implements, and other equipment for them.

In Paraguay the MCC had made arrangements with the Corporacion Paraguaya for the sale of land by that company to the immigrants. On April 11, 1930, the first group arrived at Puerto Casado and immediately went on to the interior where their land lay. At the railhead, Station Fred Engen, they were met by the Canadian Mennonites already living in the Chaco since 1926, and taken to the colony site. Temporary shelter was provided by tents. Whereas that entire movement was permitted to enter Paraguay on the basis of Law 514 of July 26, 1921, which gave the original Privilegium to the Canadian Mennonite group, a delegation from the colony arranged for an amplification of this law to include this new group known as "Colony Fernheim," which was granted under Decree No. 43,561 of May 4, 1932, and which also included the benefits of Law 914 of Aug. 29, 1927, passed to permit the entry of other Pacifist groups to the Chaco. According to the privilege of self-government, the colony was first administered by the leaders of the first three groups, Franz Heinrichs later being elected the first administrator (Oberschulze). Each village has its Schulze and his assistants (Zehntmänner). Fernheim has had six administrators to the present: Franz Heinrichs, David Löwen, Jakob Siemens, Julius Legiehn, Bernhard Wall, and Heinrich Dürksen. Elections are held annually, and all colony citizens are allowed to vote. The colony has its own registrar's office, insurance and pension bureau.

Three weeks after the arrival the initial land surveys were completed and lots were drawn for the village sites, as also for the individual farm sites within each village. Fernheim colony today has 20 villages besides Filadelfia: Schönbrunn, Schönwiese, Friedensfeld, Friedensruh, Rosenort, Landskron, Wüstenfelde, Kleefeld, Blumental, Lichtfelde, Gnadenheim, Waldesruh, Wiesenfeld, Blumenort, Karlsruhe, Schönau, Auhagen, Orloff, Hohenau, and Grünfeld. Originally each family was allotted 96 acres, increased in 1937 to 240 acres per family, and in 1946 the total colony land holdings averaged 432 acres per family. The first steps of the immigrants were house construction and securing a water supply. Some houses were built temporarily, small and primitive, while others were at once built more permanently, usually 23 x 13 ft., of adobe brick and thatched roof. Today burned brick is usually used, with galvanized or aluminum roofing. The houses are frequently built facing north or northwest for better ventilation from the frequent northeast winds. Glass windows have only begun to appear in recent years. The water situation was and remains one of the gravest problems of the settlement. During the first months only one well was available, and because of the water scarcity, a boy was at times stationed at the bottom of the well to dip the trickling water with a cup and gradually fill the bucket. Digging of wells is dangerous because of the sandy nature of the subsoil. By Jan. 1, 1935, the colony had dug 198 wells, of which 124 had sweet water and 75 salt water. On Jan. 1, 1950, the colony had a total of 255 wells, of which two thirds are sweet wells, turning bitter if excessively used. In addition to the original severe water shortage, the poor transportation facilities resulted in irregular supply of essential foods. This, together with the unaccustomed climate, environment, and food, led to the outbreak of a typhoid epidemic shortly after their arrival in the Chaco, which claimed 65 lives in a few weeks' time, mainly in the villages of Friedensruh, Schönwiese, and Schönbrunn. Hollowed bottle trees (palo boracho) served as coffins.

Many reverses were also experienced in the cultivation of their field crops. Being unaccustomed to a tropical climate and wishing to retain their farming methods of Russia, many suffered severely in the early years. A group of 140 families, feeling that they had little future in the colony, left in August 1937 and settled in East Paraguay, near Rosario, calling their new colony Friesland. After several futile attempts the growing of such crops as wheat and potatoes was abandoned, replaced by sorgo (kafir), sweet potatoes, Paraguayan beans, peanuts, and mandioca (manioc). These furnished their household necessities and provided for the stock and also an occasional surplus for the market. The staple cash crop was and is cotton. In 1950 the total cultivated colony acreage was 6,636 acres. The Indian is the chief source of labor for the cotton crop, but because of increase in acreage and influx of new immigrants to the adjoining colony Neuland, the labor problem is annually becoming more acute. Limited mechanization is now being tried. The watermelon thrives especially well in the Chaco, a single melon sometimes weighing up to 30 pounds. In the two decades 1930-50 the colony has had 11 good crops, 5 average crops, and 4 crop failures. Annual rainfall over a period of 15 years, 1934-48, averaged 28.3 inches. Especially trying are the winter sand storms which usually make their appearance during the months of June to September, being strong north winds from the matto grosso of Brazil.

To provide essential equipment for farm and home small basic industries were established, beginning with wagonmaking in 1931, until today there are several blacksmith shops, a furniture shop, a tinsmith shop, and more recently such industries as a cotton gin, oil press, creamery, and essential oil extraction plants, all of which add considerably to the colony and individual family income. The long-hoped-for etablishing of a spinning and weaving plant has not yet been realized. Further industrial development is hampered by the very inadequate transportation system. All freight must still be hauled 66 miles by wagon or truck to the railhead, then 88 miles by rail to Puerto Casado, where it is reloaded onto river transportation for Asuncion. However, the colony has a good airstrip at Filadelfia, and weekly plane service makes passenger travel considerably easier. Both it and the colony-Asuncion radio communication system have developed in recent years and continue to improve. A direct all-weather road from Asuncion to Filadelfia is under construction with U. S. Point IV aid.

The colony hospital, located at Filadelfia, serves as medical and surgical center for all Chaco Mennonites and consists of 42 beds in a two-story adobe brick building. Doctors have changed frequently, coming from Asuncion, the United States, and more recently from Germany. In 1953 the first native physician, Wilhelm Käthler, returned from a full medical training in the United States to begin practice in the colony. All illness except rare cases and serious eye defects can be treated here. A five-room house for the mentally ill has also been built in Filadelfia, but is proving inadequate, and plans are being made to increase its facilities. A dentist provides all dental care required, including aid to many non-colony individuals.
